Introduction

"WHO SHALL WRITE the history of the American Revolution?" asked John Adams in 1815. "Who can write it? Who will ever be able to write it?" If that task seemed formidable to one who had lived through every moment of it, who had known all the great actors in the turbulent drama, and who had kept the most compendious records, how shall it seem to us today when the actors have long since left the stage, when the flickering light of camp-fires, the whiff of grapeshot and the sound of oratory are merely words on crumbling paper?

The very phrase, the American Revolution, conjures up for us images familiar and heroic: Captain Parker mustering his little band on Lexington Common, Warren and Putnam in the thick of the fight on Bunker's Hill, Washington crossing the ice-flooded Delaware, bloody footprints on the snow of Valley Forge, John Paul Jones closing with the Serapis, Nathan Hale beneath the gallows, Clark's riflemen wading the swollen waters of the Wabash, Morgan smashing Tarleton at Cowpens, the "world turned upside down" at Yorktown, and many others. This is as it should be, for these things have gone into American memory, and into the making of the American character.

Yet, needless to say, the Revolution was not all fighting; indeed the fighting, though essential, was perhaps not the most important part of it. No large armies were ever engaged on either side; there were comparatively few pitched battles; battle casualties were small; and much of the fighting was what we would now call guerrilla warfare. John Adams saw "the real American Revolution" as a "radical change in the principles, opinions, sentiments and affections of the people," and thought it was, above all, "in the minds and hearts of the people." The Revolution was, indeed, a wonderfully complex event, and historians are still exploring its labyrinthine complexities and philosophers its ultimate meaning. The Revolution was a war for political independence—the first great struggle to achieve independence from an imperial connection in modern times—and as such its impact was world-wide. It ushered in an era of revolutions on the European continent, in Latin America, and eventually in Asia and Africa—an era that is still with us. It was the birth of a nation—a nation different in its creation and in its character from the nations of the Old World, and one which was destined to fix the character of much of modern nationalism. It was the formulation of new principles of the relation of men to government, and of the relation of colonies to mother country. It was a series of far-reaching democratic reforms, the inauguration of effective self-government and of social and economic equality.

These are sweeping and abstract concepts; the Revolution was, too, many things that are simple and concrete. It was the Continental Congress debating the Suffolk Resolves; it was Jefferson writing the Declaration of Independence; it was the towns of Massachusetts drawing up the first state constitution; it was the confiscation of Tory estates and their redistribution to Patriots; it was Franklin at the Court of Versailles; it was the breaking of the Indian power on the northern and the southern borderlands; it was Jefferson and Madison toppling the Established Church in Virginia; it was the winning of the West and the settlement of the West; it was Tom Paine and Joel Barlow and Philip Freneau and the beginnings of American literature.

The Revolution was both a war for independence and a civil war. Unlike the War for Southern Independence, however, it was fought not between great sections of the country, but in each state and county and village, where brother opposed brother and father fought against son. Yet it was not a class war, not in the sense in which so many European revolutions were to be class wars. Both rich and poor fought on the Patriot side—large landowners like Washington and Jefferson, the Livingstons, the Schuylers, and the Van Rensselaers; affluent merchants like John Hancock and the Browns of Providence; men of affairs like Robert Morris of Pennsylvania and Henry Laurens of South Carolina; and, along with these, attorneys, clergymen, shopkeepers, farmers, mechanics, apprentices and fishermen. And the Loyalists, too, included large numbers from these very same groups and classes.

Unlike most later revolutions, but like the American Civil War, the War for Independence was distinguished by its concern for and emphasis upon legality. The Americans fought for the rights of Englishmen, as they believed them to be guaranteed by the British Constitution, and for the rights of man as they understood them to be guaranteed by Nature and Nature's God. That this was not a far-fetched or wholly partisan view is clear from the enthusiasm with which it was endorsed by many of the most distinguished British statesmen. Men like Chatham, Burke and Fox asserted, at the time, that the Americans were the champions of English liberties, and throughout the nineteenth century this view was accepted by historians like William E. Lecky, John Richard Green and George Otto Trevelyan.

There was, to be sure, a seamier side to the Revolution—tarring and feathering, lynching, the repudiation of debts and the confiscation of Tory estates, the vindictive persecution of inoffensive Loyalists. But there was no systematic Terror, no Thermidor, no mailed fist, and if the Revolution often seemed wanton and cruel to its victims it was, by comparison with the French, the Russian or the Spanish revolutions of later years, an almost decorous affair. The explanation is not hard to seek. From beginning to end the Revolution was led by an elite, not only benevolent and enlightened, but prosperous and conservative. Washington, John Adams, James Wilson, Hamilton, Jefferson, Franklin, Laurens—these and others like them constituted perhaps the most conservative, respectable and disinterested revolutionary agitators that any revolution ever confessed. These leaders—most of them trained to the law—insisted that the Revolution be managed in an orderly and lawful fashion and that the war be fought according to rules prevailing in civilized nations. They deprecated alike fanaticism and lawlessness, and it is a curious commentary on the American temperament that the eloquent and devoted Tom Paine was distrusted almost as much as the odious Benedict Arnold.

This legalism is prophetic of the America that was to develop in the course of the next century. Nothing is more interesting, indeed, than to detect the emergence, even this early, and in abnormal circumstances, of traits of character we have come to think of as American. The American who emerges from these pages is already—as St. John de Crèvecoeur wrote at the time—a new man. He is independent; he is impatient of discipline; he hopelessly mixes up military, economic and social activities. He is equalitarian, and has little patience with those who claim to be his superiors. He is ambitious and avaricious, and much given to speculation and to getting ahead. He is literate, takes an active part in the business of politics, and carries into camp the habits of self-government. He does not like fighting for its own sake, but fights well when he has to; he has little use for the military hierarchy, and bucks like a colt against taking orders. He is ingenious and practical; prefers a stone wall to an open field, and a timely retreat to a foolhardy advance. He is young and tough, survives hardships and diseases that would wipe out his more vulnerable descendants; he lives simply and unaffectedly. He is on the whole cheerful and good-humored, decent and honest; commits few crimes against persons (unless they are Indians) and, unless our sources deceive us by prudish silence, has a relatively high standard of sexual morality. He is vaguely religious, and already certain that there is a benign Providence whose chief concern is with him and his country.

Had the American Revolution been merely two wars—one against Britain and another to decide who would rule at home—it would still have constituted a formidable challenge to those who would write its history. But in addition the Revolution was a part, and a major part, of a world war. It was fought within sight of the cliffs of Dover, at Gibraltar, off the Cape of Good Hope, and along the Coromandel Coast. It was waged in the British Parliament as well as in the Continental Congress. Its objectives were pursued as relentlessly in Paris and Madrid as on Lake Champlain or the Delaware. And, in one way or another, it drew a large part of Europe into the conflict: thirty thousand German mercenaries, for example, an army and a navy from France, volunteers from most countries of northern Europe, and the Courts of Berlin and Copenhagen, the Hague and St. Petersburg. A roll call which includes Lafayette, Rochambeau, Fersen, von Steuben, Pulaski and Kosciuszko, on the one side, and Knyphausen, André, La Corne, Breymann and Riedesel on the other, proclaims eloquently the international character of the war.

In the eighteenth century, even more than today, soldiers accepted the principle later immortalized by Alfred, Lord Tennyson: "Their's not to reason why, their's but to do and die." That was certainly true of the British soldiers who fought in America and, even more glaringly, of the German mercenaries who fought alongside them. The reader will look in vain for any ideology in the British accounts of the war, for any realization that more was at stake than military victory over upstart rebels. Even British statesmen—with the exception of the handful who championed the American cause—rarely rose to any notion more exalted than that of punishing rebellion, preserving colonies and vindicating privilege. But from the beginning the Americans were conscious of and self-conscious about what they were doing, and throughout the war their fighting was justified by moral and ideological considerations. It was a "decent respect to the opinions of mankind" that persuaded her leaders to set forth the causes that impelled them to separation; what other people or nation had ever bothered with the opinions of mankind? And from beginning to end the Americans appealed to the judgment of posterity, confident that posterity would approve of what they were doing. "We esteem ourselves bound by obligations of respect to the rest of the world to make known the justice of our cause," said the Congress at the very outset of the struggle. "I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure that it will cost us to maintain this declaration and support and defend these States," wrote John Adams of the Declaration of Independence; "I can see that the end is more than worth all the means, and that posterity will triumph in that day's transactions." In the last of his Crisis papers Tom Paine observed that "to see it in our power to make a world happy—to teach mankind the art of being so—to exhibit, on the theatre of the universe, a character hitherto unknown—and to have, as it were, a new creation intrusted to our hands, are honors that command reflection and can neither be too highly estimated nor too greatly received." Down in aristocratic Charleston, Judge Drayton echoed the sentiment: "Thus has suddenly arisen in the world a new empire . . . and bids fair, by the blessing of God, to be the most glorious of any upon record. America hails Europe, Asia and Africa. She proffers peace and plenty." And Washington, in his last wartime circular to the States, reminded his fellow countrymen that "with our fate will the destiny of unborn Millions be involved." The Americans, in short, did not conceive of their struggle as a selfish or parochial one. They fought not for themselves alone, but for all mankind; not for the rewards of the moment, but for the illimitable future. It is this that gives more than dramatic or even patriotic interest to what they said and what they did.

No participant in the American Revolution was more conscious of the challenge it offered to the historian than John Adams. He recognized that before a sound history could be written—if indeed such a history could ever be written—it would be necessary to "search and collect all the records, pamphlets, newspapers, and even handbills"; it was an enterprise to which he invited Hezekiah Niles and other "young men of letters in all the States," promising them a task both "interesting and amusing." Niles himself so far followed Adams' suggestion as to bring out, four years later, a slender volume somewhat grandiosely called Principles and Acts of the Revolution; his purpose, he said, was "to show the feelings that prevailed in the Revolution, not to give a history of events."

A history of events was certainly a more arduous task, and clearly it could not be done until the source material had been assembled. The first undertaking of this nature was that launched by Peter Force, a journalist and printer who had fought in the War of 1812 and later served as mayor of Washington. His was the most ambitious project for collecting the documentary record of the Revolutionary period that has ever been projected. He planned, in all, six extensive series of volumes; he managed to publish only nine volumes in two of the series, but each one contained the equivalent of five or six ordinary volumes. Yet this vast mountain of source material carried the story only through the year 1776. Had Secretary of State Marcy not churlishly cut off appropriations for further volumes—and had his own strength held out—Force would single-handed have given us a compilation like the Acta Sanctorum, the Monumenta Germaniae Historica or the Jesuit Relations.

Other historians of the early national period like the Reverend Jared Sparks and George Bancroft devoted themselves to transcribing, collecting and editing the sources of the American Revolution. The indefatigable Frank Moore—who was later to exploit the Civil War—scanned the newspapers and gleaned many intriguing if unrelated items, and garnered some of the songs and ballads of the war. An extensive compilation of the diplomatic records was carried through to completion by Francis Wharton, who so happily combined theology and international law; and at the end of the century the bibliophile Benjamin Franklin Stevens issued no less than twenty-five volumes of Facsimiles of Manuscripts in European Archives Relating to America, 1773-1783. More recently Edmund C. Burnett has illuminated the formal record provided in the multivolumed Journals of the Continental Congress by compiling eight volumes of Letters, private as well as official, of its members. More valuable for our purposes than any of these somewhat fragmentary collections of sources are the voluminous writings of those men known collectively, and affectionately, as the Founding Fathers. To the earlier generation of scholars who made available selections from the writings of Washington, Jefferson, Franklin, John and Samuel Adams, John Jay, Tom Paine and others, we are deeply indebted, but our sense of obligation cannot blind us to the inadequacies of these editions. Happily new editions of Franklin, John Adams, Hamilton and Madison are promised, and Julian Boyd's Writings of Thomas Jefferson, one of the glories of American scholarship, has already covered the whole period of the Revolution and beyond.

To tell the story of the American Revolution in the words of participants has involved extensive examination of a vast miscellany of sources hitherto discrete: letters, diaries, journals, orderly books, official records of the Congress and of state legislatures, diplomatic correspondence, local histories, Parliamentary debates, the writings of statesmen on both sides of the Atlantic, the voluminous collections and proceedings of historical societies, and many manuscript repositories. It has meant running down countless clues to discover the best account of a battle, or an account written from a new vantage point; the best report of a debate; the most authentic record of a negotiation; the most faithful reflection of an attitude or a mood. When the mountain of material was finally assembled, it required sifting and verification and winnowing until the documents were slimmed down to the dimensions of these two volumes. In that winnowing it was inevitable that some precious things would be sacrificed to the demands of space, but it is perhaps astonishing that though much was taken, much abides.

The source material for the history of the American Revolution differs strikingly from that available for the history of the American Civil War. For one thing, though military participation was as general in all kinds of society, literary participation was not. In the Civil War every soldier, Union and Confederate alike, seemed to carry a notebook in his knapsack and to spend his ample spare time keeping a journal or inditing long letters to family and friends. Not so during the Revolution. The literary contribution from the privates of this war is meager. In the Civil War the best accounts came from privates or minor officers—a Chauncey Cook, a Jenkins Lloyd Jones, an Augustus Buell, a Frank Haskell, a John S. Wise. But in the Revolution those who played the leading political and military roles played, too, the leading literary roles: Washington, Franklin, Jefferson, Hamilton, John Adams, Ethan Allen, George Rogers Clark, Nathanael Greene and their associates. And what is true for the Americans is doubly true for the British and their German allies, where illiteracy was all but universal in the rank and file.

Another and striking difference between the reporting of the Revolution and of later wars is in the place of the newspaper. The Revolution had no Bull Run Russell, no George Alfred Townsend, no Frank Vizetelly. Local news was often ignored by newspaper printers because nobody in the community was presumed to know what had happened. Events were normally covered not by reporters, but by letters, addressed either to the editor or the printer or to leading figures in public life. Major political letters and essays often saw the light of day in the columns of newspapers, but seldom if ever great reporting. Newspaper accounts, then, furnish only a small portion of the story which the participants relate in these pages. The best of the American are garnered in Force's Archives, or in Moore's Diary of the American Revolution; the best British reports are to be found in Dodsley's famous Annual Register, and are probably from the gifted pen of Edmund Burke.

Happily this inadequacy is more than compensated by the richness of other sources, and particularly of the correspondence of that group we call The Fathers. It was an age of great letter-writing—the greatest in our history (and probably in English as well); an age when letter-writing was not so much an art as second nature. The astonishing thing is not only that men like Washington and Franklin, Hamilton and Jefferson, Adams and Jay wrote so well but that they found time to write so much so well. It is at once an exhilarating and a sobering thought that the writings of this single generation of the Fathers outweighs, qualitatively, and almost quantitatively, the writings of all the leading public men of our history in the century and a half since their day.

Their letters bear on every page the imprint of strong personalities; they are the letters of men who were ardent, opinionated, obstinate, brave, imaginative and eloquent. Above all, they are the letters of men who were untroubled by doubts and misgivings, who were sure of themselves and of the cause for which they fought. They could be refreshingly indiscreet, to our delight if not to that of their contemporaries: "A certain great man is most damnably deficient," wrote General Charles Lee of Washington. A Congressman could give even a General a dressing-down; thus Thomas Burke told General John Sullivan after Brandywine that he was "an officer whose evil conduct was forever productive of misfortunes to the army." Many a contemporary suffered from the sharp tongue and sharper pen of John Adams. "A certain great fortune and piddling genius," he wrote of poor John Dickinson, "has given a silly cast to our whole doings." Or consider Franklin, after enormous provocation from the exasperating Arthur Lee, explaining that he had "omitted answering some of your letters, particularly your angry ones, in which you, with very magisterial airs, schooled and documented me, as if I had been one of your domestics." Bluntest of all, when occasion merited it, was Washington himself. To General Heath, after the fiasco of Fort Independence, he wrote: "Your summons, as you did not attempt to fulfill your threat, was not only idle but farcical." To Joseph Reed he exploded, from his camp in Cambridge, that "such a dearth of public spirit, and want of virtue, such stock-jobbing and fertility in all the low arts to obtain advantages of one kind or another in this great change of military arrangement, I never saw before and pray God I may never be witness to again." And of the hapless General Conway, Washington wrote, "He is capable of all the malignity of detraction, and all the meanness of intrigue to gratify the absurd resentment of disappointed vanity, or to answer the purposes of personal aggrandizement and promote the interests of faction."

Another quality that gives these letters vitality and excitement is the courage, even the bravura, that animated their authors. "This is the most magnificent movement of all," wrote young John Adams of the destruction of the tea. Whether or not Ethan Allen actually called for Ticonderoga's surrender "in the name of Jehovah and the Continental Congress" the remark was perfectly in character with the man, as was the answer that John Paul Jones gave to the captain of the Serapis, "I have not yet begun to fight"; and James Mugford's dying words to his crew, "Don't give up the ship! You will beat them off!" So Benedict Arnold after the bloody repulse before Quebec, "I am in the way of my duty, and know no fear." So, too, Colonel McIntosh's reply to Colonel Fuser's demand for the surrender of Fort Morris, "Come and take it." Even the women expressed something of this sense of defiance; when a redcoat pointed his musket at nurse Sarah Tarrant of Salem, she cried, "Fire if you have the courage, but I doubt it." Alas, the women are but poorly represented in these pages. Except for a few, like the sprightly Mercy Warren or the devoted Abigail Adams, they were not much given to letters, or what they wrote was not salvaged for posterity.

It was an age of magnificent oratory, and the echoes of some of the more memorable speeches can be caught in these pages. From the first stirring appeals in the Continental Congress down to Washington's moving rebuke to the authors of the Newburgh Resolves, oratory quickened the spirit of resistance and inspired loyalty to the Patriot cause. "Gentlemen may cry, 'Peace! peace!' but there is no peace," warned Patrick Henry, and "the next gale that blew from the north" brought news of Lexington. Or listen to the mighty Edmund Burke. "An Englishman," he said, "is the unfittest person on earth to argue another Englishman into slavery." Burke could be scorching as well as defiant; note his burlesque of Burgoyne's proclamation threatening the Americans with Indian warfare: "My tender-hearted hyenas go forth." Or listen to the boyish Marquis of Granby on American taxation: "I disavow the whole system. It is commenced in iniquity, it is pursued with resentment; and it can terminate in nothing but blood. Under whatsoever shape in futurity it may be revived . . . it shall from me meet the most constant, determined and invariable opposition." Or, finally, hearken to Washington at Newburgh: "Let me conjure you, in the name of our common country, as you value your own sacred honor, as you respect the rights of humanity, as you regard the military and national character of America, to express your utmost horror and detestation of the man who wishes, under any specious pretences, to overturn the liberties of our country."

Here, then, is the story of the American Revolution as its participants told it or wrote it. It is not the whole story—that would be impossible—nor is it even the story of the whole war. To a large degree the record as we present it here is a fortuitous one: editors are not, after all, free agents, but must content themselves with what is available. It was a literate and a literary generation, but there are, nevertheless, jagged gaps in the record: men busy fighting a war did not always find time to record it. What would we not give for Sam Adams' account of the most famous of all Tea Parties; for Washington's account of the passage of the Delaware; for Jefferson's story—contemporary, not retrospective—of the writing of the Great Declaration; for Morgan's story of his victory at Cowpens! Yet the military record is, on the whole, rich and full. Far more serious are the gaps in the nonmilitary record. It is shocking that so few of the doctors—Benjamin Rush is almost the only exception—left a record of the medical and surgical history of the war. We have no right to expect too much of the story of espionage and counterespionage, but what would we not give for the inner story of the baffling James Rivington, or for a circumstantial account of his change of allegiance from the pen of the gifted Benjamin Thompson, Count Rumford! There are scores of prison narratives, but almost all of them melodramatic; there are—in the orders of Washington and his generals—hundreds of items on discipline, but nobody thought to discuss the problem as a whole. And what of the many other things we would know about: the commissary, the services of supply, arms and ammunition, transportation, finance and currency, morale; the evidence on all these is meager, disjointed and prosaic.

The situation with respect to the British side of the war is nothing less than deplorable. The melancholy fact is that, except in realms of high debate, the British themselves fail us. There are some magnificent speeches in Parliament; but aside from the narratives of a Sergeant Lamb, a Frederick Mackenzie, an Ambrose Serle and a few others, who wrote not too condescendingly about the fighting, the literary record is feeble. The explanation for this is a bit baffling. It is partly that the English were preoccupied with so many other matters; partly that the war was fought by professional soldiers and these were not much given to literature; partly that proportionately far fewer Englishmen were involved than Americans. And let it not be forgotten that though Britain boasted far more men of letters than America, the general level of literacy was substantially lower than in America.

We have tried to present most aspects of the war, the political, the diplomatic, the social and economic, the intellectual and cultural as well as the military and naval; and we have tried to let the British present their own case as fairly as possible. There are of course many omissions, dictated by space: readers who may regret gaps and deformities can console themselves with the thought that these hurt the editors more than they hurt the readers. One major omission is deliberate: the story of the movement toward a closer union. The reader will look in vain here for the writing of the Articles of Confederation, for the many proposals to revise and repair those Articles; or for the evolution of the policies that culminated in the Ordinances of 1784, 1785 and 1787. The explanation of this is simple: the story is much too large and too important to be compressed within the limits of a chapter, and has been reserved, therefore, for a subsequent volume.

The source material is presented as it has come to us; needless to say, it has not always come in virginal form. We have taken few liberties with the text, and those only which scholarly opinion in general approves: we have broken up solid pages of print into paragraphs; spelled out abbreviations; inserted essential punctuation, and occasionally corrected (rather than modernized) spelling where necessary to clarity and understanding. Aside from these minor changes, the misspellings, the flouting of grammar and syntax, are as they were first written down with quill pen on paper. It should not be necessary to add that as we have not attempted to correct minor matters of spelling and punctuation, so we have not sought to correct major matters of fact or interpretation. If we were to attempt to correct every analysis of tactics, every report of casualties, every legal argument, every interpretation of character, the editorial notes would far outstrip the text. Quite aside from this, errors, misconceptions and misinterpretations are themselves an essential part of the record.

Much is said in these two volumes about the powerful forces which were arrayed against the Patriots, about their enemies, external and internal, about their divisions and squabbles, the ravages of selfishness and self-interest, of vanity and greed, which thwarted the Patriot efforts both on the military and on the home fronts. How, then, did it happen that the Patriots did win, and against overwhelming odds? We shall not attempt here a consideration of causation in history, or even an evaluation of the importance of such matters as French assistance, British blunders, or geography. Fundamentally the answer to the question about American victory is to be found in the phrase, commonly assigned to Jefferson, which provides the title for these volumes. The Patriots won because the Spirit of 'Seventy-Six was kept alive in the hearts of common soldiers and commissioned officers and a few dedicated generals and statesmen until the British recognized the impossibility of subduing such a people and acquiesced in their independence.

There is, too, in much of the writing of the Revolution a strain of loftiness, a nobility, a style and spirit of greatness. No man exemplified that spirit better than Washington, who looms large in these pages as an indispensable symbol of selfless patriotism and integrity. We see him quickening the Patriot cause in Virginia on the eve of the crisis, taking command of a rabble in arms at Cambridge and forcing the British out of Boston, outwitted but undismayed at Long Island, delivering lightning blows at Trenton and Princeton, faltering momentarily at Brandywine and Germantown, standing fast through the ordeal of Valley Forge and, the next winter, of Morristown, holding out against jealousy and stupidity and rashness in Congress and in the army, and in the end, by the sheer power of determination and force of personality, keeping the army in being until the day of deliverance at Yorktown. His was the Spirit of 'Seventy-Six, a spirit most eloquently captured by Thomas Paine's first Crisis paper: "These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will shrink from the service of their country. But he who stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman."

In these pages we meet some who did not shrink, who marched with Arnold in that memorable journey to Quebec, who walked with bloody feet at Princeton, or waded the icy waters of the Wabash on the march to Vincennes, or suffered in the Jersey prison ship at New York, or fought with Marion along the Pedee or died at Cowpens or Eutaw Springs, so that their children and their children's children could be free. For they knew, as did the Athenians of old, that "the price of happiness is freedom, and the price of freedom a brave heart." They knew, with John Adams, that "freedom is a counterbalance for poverty, discord and war." They made it possible for Washington to say, in that Inaugural Address which ended one era and ushered in another: "The preservation of the sacred fire of liberty, and the destiny of the republican model of government, are justly considered as deeply, perhaps as finally, staked on the experiment entrusted to the hands of the American people."

The Spirit of 'Seventy-Six

CHAPTER ONE

The Fierce Spirit of Resistance

WE MUST begin somewhere and, notwithstanding John Adams' insistence that the Revolution was in the hearts and minds of men and began with the first plantation in America, we must begin with some decisive act. It is not difficult to find that act: the Boston Tea Party. Earlier issues and conflicts had agitated and even exacerbated relations between the colonies and the mother country—the Stamp Act, the Townshend Acts, the seizure of the sloop Liberty, the Boston Massacre, the burning of the Gaspée—but none of these precipitated an open break. That came over what appeared to be a less serious issue, and one lacking in those constitutional overtones so dear to the American patriots—the Act of Parliament of May 10, 1773, permitting the East India Company to export tea to the colonies with remission of ordinary British duties and with the assurance of a virtual monopoly on the retail sale. It was a clever plan. The Americans would get their tea cheaper than ever before; the company would be rescued from financial ruin; and the principle of a tax—that “peppercorn of principle”—would be vindicated. “It was no purpose making objections, for the King would have it so,” said Lord North.

The East India Company promptly took advantage of the new law by shipping half a million pounds of tea to a picked group of agents in Boston, New York, Philadelphia and Charleston. It was the danger of this monopoly rather than the tax itself—only 3 pence to the pound—that aroused resentment in the colonies. In Charleston the tea was landed but placed in government warehouses and allowed to rot; in Philadelphia, New York and elsewhere the ships were not permitted to land their offensive cargoes. Only in Boston did the authorities, egged on by the stubborn Hutchinson, persist in the attempt to land the tea. It was to prevent this that Samuel Adams, Hancock, Warren, Revere and other leaders of the Massachusetts radicals organized the Boston Tea Party.

It was the end of November 1773 when the first ship bearing tea sailed into Boston harbor—the Dartmouth; she was shortly followed by two others. “The flame is kindled, and like lightning it catches from soul to soul,” wrote Abigail Adams to her husband John. Boston erupted into public meetings and private conferences; “the town is as furious as it was in the time of the Stamp Act,” said Governor Hutchinson. Two mass meetings resolved that the ships must return to England without payment of duty. This Governor Hutchinson refused to permit, and the issue was joined.

I. MOHAWK INDIANS SPILL TEA IN BOSTON HARBOR

December 16, 1773, is one of the fateful days of American history. All day long the people of Boston and surrounding towns, "merchants, yeomen, gentlemen" to the number of 7,000 (it was said), swarmed down to the wharves to look at the three ships, their holds big with history, or milled around the crooked streets of the old town, or gazed into the windows of the Green Dragon Tavern, meeting place of the radicals, or thronged into the Old South Meeting House to listen to their leaders discuss what was to be done if Governor Hutchinson and Captain Rotch proved obdurate. In the afternoon young Josiah Quincy—with John Adams he had defended British soldiers tried for murder at the time of the "massacre"—spoke to the motion that the people of Boston should not suffer the tea to land; we give here a brief extract of that speech as recalled later by the Reverend William Gordon, self-appointed historian of the Revolution.

When Captain Rotch gave his final answer that "if called upon by the proper officers he should attempt, for his own security, to land the tea," there was a war whoop and "prodigious shouting"; the meeting broke up; the crowd poured down to Griffin's wharf; and three bands of Mohawk Indians—or were they Narragansett?—went quietly on board the three ships and threw overboard 342 chests of tea.

We give here an excerpt from Josiah Quincy's speech; a contemporary ballad; an account by the merchant John Andrews, whom we shall meet again; a suspiciously circumstantial account dictated many years later by one of the survivors, George Hewes; and Governor Hutchinson's sedate statement, written twenty years later but bearing all the marks of authenticity which we associate with his judicious mind.

1. JOSIAH QUINCY, JR., EXHORTS THE BOSTONIANS TO FIRMNESS

In Old South Meeting House, to the motion that the people of Boston should not suffer the tea to land.

December 16, 1773

It is not, Mr. Moderator, the spirit that vapors within these walls that must stand us in stead. The exertions of this day will call forth events which will make a very different spirit necessary for our salvation. Whoever supposes that shouts and hosannas will terminate the trials of the day entertains a childish fancy. We must be grossly ignorant of the importance and value of the prize for which we contend; we must be equally ignorant of the power of those who have combined against us; we must be blind to that malice, inveteracy and insatiable revenge which actuate our enemies, public and private, abroad and in our bosom, to hope that we shall end this controversy without the sharpest conflicts, to flatter ourselves that popular resolves, popular harangues, popular acclamations and popular vapor will vanquish our foes. Let us consider the issue. Let us look to the end. Let us weigh and consider before we advance to those measures which must bring on the most trying and terrific struggle this country ever saw.

2. RALLYING SONG OF THE TEA PARTY

Rally, Mohawks! bring out your axes,
And tell King George we'll pay no taxes

On his foreign tea;
His threats are vain, and vain to think
To force our girls and wives to drink

His vile Bohea!
Then rally, boys, and hasten on
To meet our chiefs at the Green Dragon.

Our Warren's there and bold Revere,
With hands to do, and words to cheer,
For liberty and laws;
Our country's "braves" and firm defenders
Shall ne'er be left by true North-Enders

Fighting Freedom's cause!
Then rally, boys, and hasten on
To meet our chiefs at the Green Dragon.

3. "YOU'D HAVE THOUGHT THE INHABITANTS OF THE INFERNAL REGIONS HAD BROKE LOOSE"

Boston, December 18, 1773

However precarious our situation may be, yet such is the present calm composure of the people that a stranger would hardly think that ten thousand pounds sterling of the East India Company's tea was destroyed the night, or rather the evening before last, yet it's a serious truth; and if yours, together with the other Southern provinces, should rest satisfied with their quota being stored, poor Boston will feel the whole weight of ministerial vengeance. However, it's the opinion of most people that we stand an equal chance now whether troops are sent in consequence of it or not; whereas, had it been stored, we should inevitably have had them to enforce the sale of it.

The affair was transacted with greatest regularity and despatch. Mr. Rotch, finding he exposed himself not only to the loss of his ship but for the value of the tea, in case he sent her back with it without a clearance from the custom house, as the Admiral kept a ship in readiness to make a seizure of it whenever it should sail under those circumstances, therefore declined complying with his former promises and absolutely declared his vessel should not carry it without a proper clearance could be procured or he to be indemnified for the value of her: when a general muster was assembled, from this and all the neighboring towns, to the number of five or six thousand, at 10 o'clock

Thursday morning in the Old South Meeting House, where they passed a unanimous vote that the tea should go out of the harbour that afternoon, and sent a committee with Mr. Rotch to the Custom house to demand a clearance, which the collector told them was not in his power to give, without the duties being first paid. They then sent Mr. Rotch to Milton to ask a pass from the Governor, who sent for answer that "consistent with the rules of government and his duty to the King he could not grant one without they produced a previous clearance from the office."

By the time he returned with this message the candles were light in the house, and upon reading it, such prodigious shouts were made that induced me, while drinking tea at home, to go out and know the cause of it. The house was so crowded I could get no farther than the porch, when I found the moderator was just declaring the meeting to be dissolved, which caused another general shout, out doors and in, and three cheers. What with that, and the consequent noise of breaking up the meeting, you'd thought that the inhabitants of the infernal regions had broke loose. For my part, I went contentedly home and finished my tea, but was soon informed what was going forward: but still not crediting it without ocular demonstration, I went and was satisfied.

They mustered, I'm told, upon Fort Hill, to the number of about two hundred, and proceeded, two by two, to Griffin's wharf, where Hall, Bruce and Coffin lay, each with 114 chests of the ill-fated article on board; the two former with only that article, but the latter, arrived at the wharf only the day before, was freighted with a large quantity of other goods, which they took the greatest care not to injure in the least, and before nine o'clock in the evening, every chest from on board the three vessels was knocked to pieces and flung over the sides. They say the actors were Indians from Narragansett. Whether they were or not, to a transient observer they appeared as such, being cloathed in blankets with the heads muffled, and copper-colored countenances, being each armed with a hatchet or axe, and pair pistols, nor was their dialect different from what I conceive these geniusses to speak, as their jargon was unintelligible to all but themselves. . . .

Should not have troubled you with this, by this post, hadn't I thought you would be glad of a more particular account of so important a transaction than you could have obtained by common report; and if it affords my brother but a temporary amusement, I shall be more than repaid for the trouble of writing it. . . .

4. "NO ATTEMPT WAS MADE TO RESIST US"

Recollections of George Hewes.

The tea destroyed was contained in three ships, lying near each other at what was called at that time Griffin's wharf, and were surrounded by armed ships of war, the commanders of which had publicly declared that if the rebels, as they were pleased to style the Bostonians, should not withdraw their opposition to the landing of the tea before a certain day, the 17th day of December, 1773, they should on that day force it on shore, under the cover of their cannon's mouth. On the day preceding the seventeenth, there was a meeting of the citizens of the county of Suffolk, convened at one of the churches in Boston, for the purpose of consulting on what measures might be considered expedient to prevent the landing of the tea, or secure the people from the collection of the duty. At that meeting a committee was appointed to wait on Governor Hutchinson, and request him to inform them whether he would take any measures to satisfy the people on the object of the meeting. To the first application of this committee, the Governor told them he would give them a definite answer by five o'clock in the afternoon. At the hour appointed, the committee again repaired to the Governor's house, and on inquiry found he had gone to his country seat at Milton, a distance of about six miles. When the committee returned and informed the meeting of the absence of the Governor, there was a confused murmur among the members, and the meeting was immediately dissolved, many of them crying out, "Let every man do his duty, and be true to his country"; and there was a general huzza for Griffin's wharf.

It was now evening, and I immediately dressed myself in the costume of an Indian, equipped with a small hatchet, which I and my associates denominated the tomahawk, with which, and a club, after having painted my face and hands with coal dust in the shop of a blacksmith, I repaired to Griffin's wharf, where the ships lay that contained the tea. When I first appeared in the street after being thus disguised, I fell in with many who were dressed, equipped and painted as I was, and who fell in with me and marched in order to the place of our destination.

When we arrived at the wharf, there were three of our number who assumed an authority to direct our operations, to which we readily submitted. They divided us into three parties, for the purpose of boarding the three ships which contained the tea at the same time. The name of him who commanded the division to which I was assigned was Leonard Pitt. The names of the other commanders I never knew. We were immediately ordered by the respective commanders to board all the ships at the same time, which we promptly obeyed. The commander of the division to which I belonged, as soon as we were on board the ship, appointed me boatswain, and ordered me to go to the captain and demand of him the keys to the hatches and a dozen candles. I made the demand accordingly, and the captain promptly replied, and delivered the articles; but requested me at the same time to do no damage to the ship or rigging. We then were ordered by our commander to open the hatches and take out all the chests of tea and throw them overboard, and we immediately proceeded to execute his orders, first cutting and splitting the chests with our tomahawks, so as thoroughly to expose them to the effects of the water.

In about three hours from the time we went on board, we had thus broken and thrown overboard every tea chest to be found in the ship, while those in the other ships were disposing of the tea in the same way, at the same time. We were surrounded by British armed ships, but no attempt was made to resist us.

We then quietly retired to our several places of residence, without having any conversation with each other, or taking any measures to discover who were our associates; nor do I recollect of our having had the knowledge of the name of a single individual concerned in that affair, except that of Leonard Pitt, the commander of my division, whom I have mentioned. There appeared to be an understanding that each individual should volunteer his services, keep his own secret, and risk the consequence for himself. No disorder took place during that transaction, and it was observed at that time that the stillest night ensued that Boston had enjoyed for many months.

During the time we were throwing the tea overboard, there were several attempts made by some of the citizens of Boston and its vicinity to carry off small quantities of it for their family use. To effect that object, they would watch their opportunity to snatch up a handful from the deck, where it became plentifully scattered, and put it into their pockets. One Captain O'Connor, whom I well knew, came on board for that purpose, and when he supposed he was not noticed, filled his pockets, and also the lining of his coat. But I had detected him and gave information to the captain of what he was doing. We were ordered to take him into custody, and just as he was stepping from the vessel, I seized him by the skirt of his coat, and in attempting to pull him back, I tore it off; but, springing forward, by a rapid effort he made his escape. He had, however, to run a gauntlet through the crowd upon the wharf, each one, as he passed, giving him a kick or a stroke.

Another attempt was made to save a little tea from the ruins of the cargo by a tall, aged man who wore a large cocked hat and white wig, which was fashionable at that time. He had slightly slipped a little into his pocket, but being detected, they seized him and, taking his hat and wig from his head, threw them, together with the tea, of which they had emptied his pockets, into the water. In consideration of his advanced age, he was permitted to escape, with now and then a slight kick.

The next morning, after we had cleared the ships of the tea, it was discovered that very considerable quantities of it were floating upon the surface of the water; and to prevent the possibility of any of its being saved for use, a number of small boats were manned by sailors and citizens, who rowed them into those parts of the harbor wherever the tea was visible, and by beating it with oars and paddles so thoroughly drenched it as to render its entire destruction inevitable.

5. HUTCHINSON PRESERVES THE CONSTITUTION RATHER THAN THE TEA

The people were summoned, by notifications posted in different quarters, to meet at the tree of liberty, to hear the resignation of the consignees of the tea, which was then daily expected. The consignees also, by a letter left at one of their houses, were required to attend at the same time at their peril. The people met, but, the consignees not appearing, a committee was appointed to acquaint them at one of their warehouses where they had met that, as they had neglected to attend, the people thought themselves warranted to consider them as their enemies. They treated the message with contempt, and the people, many of whom had followed the committee, forced open the doors of the warehouse and attempted to enter a room in which the consignees, with some of their friends, were shut up; but, meeting with resistance, they soon after dispersed, and the body of the people who remained at the tree, upon the return of their committee, dispersed also. This seems to have been intended only as an intimation to the consignees of what they had to expect.

Two days after, what was called a "legal" meeting of the inhabitants was held in Faneuil Hall. Here the resolves which had been passed by the people of Philadelphia were first adopted; and then a further resolve passed that the inhabitants of the town, by all means in their power, will prevent the sale of the teas exported by the East India Company, and that they justly expect no merchant will, on any pretence whatever, import any tea liable to the duty. Committees were also appointed to wait on the several persons to whom the teas were consigned, and in the name of the town to request them from a regard to their characters, and to the peace and good order of the town, immediately to resign their trust. Each of the consignees gave an answer of the same import, that, as they were not yet acquainted with the terms upon which the teas were consigned to them, they were not able to give a definite answer to the request of the town. The answers were all voted to be daringly affrontive to the town, and the meeting was immediately after dissolved.

Three vessels were expected every hour with the teas. The consignees were afraid of exposing themselves and their bondsmen to damages, which might arise from a refusal or neglect to execute their trust; on the other hand, they were anxiously concerned for their personal safety, and made their application to the governor. He foresaw that this would prove a more difficult affair than any which had preceded it since he had been in the chair. The controversies with the council and house had a tendency to deprive him of the esteem and favour of the people; but he had not been apprehensive of injury to his person. He was now to encounter with bodies of the people collected together, and a great proportion of them the lowest part of the people, from whom, when there is no power to restrain them, acts of violence are to be expected. He knew that the council would give him no aid. . . . He had no expectations of being able to protect the persons of the consignees or the property under their care. He considered that, if the ships came into the harbour above the castle, they could not pass by it again without a permit under his hand, and that his granting such permit would be more than he should be able to justify. He therefore advised to their anchoring without the castle, and their waiting for orders; and this advice was approved of by the consignees, and by the owner of the ship first expected, if not by the owners of the other ships; and orders were given to the pilots accordingly.

All design of riots and acts of violence had been disclaimed by the conductors of measures for preventing the tea from being landed. A great number of rioters assembled, notwithstanding, before the house of Mr. Clarke, one of the consignees, in the evening, and attempted to force their way in, broke the windows to pieces, and otherwise damaged it, so as to cause the occupiers to remove out of it. One of the consignees fired with ball upon the mob from one of the windows, soon after which the rioters dispersed. . . .

castle. Notification in a form* proper to inflame the people was posted up, calling upon them to assemble; and while the governor and council were sitting on the Monday in the council chamber, and known to be consulting upon means for preserving the peace of the town, several thousands, inhabitants of Boston and other towns, were assembled in a publick meeting-house at a small distance, in direct opposition and defiance. The council, when they had considered the exception which the governor had made, ordered a recommitment of the report; but it was returned without any material alteration, all advice to secure the tea upon its being landed being expressly refused, because such advice would be a measure for procuring payment of the duty. Three or four of the council in the debate appeared to disapprove of the report, but, when the question was put, it passed unanimously; and the last and senior councilor, though he had argued very strongly against it, gave his voice for it, adding that it would not do for him to be alone. The council advised the governor's calling upon the magistrates to meet, and to take necessary care for the preservation of the peace; which advice being complied with, the people, in a few hours after, passed a vote, which they caused to be printed, declaring that "the conduct of Governor Hutchinson, in requiring the justices of peace in the town to meet and use their endeavours to suppress routs, riots, etc., carried a designed reflection upon the people there met together, and was solely calculated to serve the views of administration." The council, declining any further advice, were dismissed; the people continued together, in possession of all the power of government, for any purpose they thought fit. . . .

The governor, seeing the powers of government thus taken out of the hands of the legally established authority, could not justify a total silence, though he knew he could say nothing which would check the usurpers. He sent the sheriff with a proclamation to be read in the meeting, bearing testimony against it as an unlawful assembly, and requiring the moderator and the people present forthwith to separate at their peril. The sheriff desired leave to read the directions he had received from the governor, which was granted; but the reading of the proclamation was opposed, until Mr. Adams signified his acquiescence. Being read, a general hiss followed, and then a question whether they would surcease all further proceedings, as the governor required, which was determined in the negative, nemine contradicente. . . .

As a permit or pass was always required at the castle for all vessels except small coasters, and there were several men of war in the harbour, which it was supposed would stop the ship from proceeding any other way, the destruction of the tea was considered as necessary to prevent payment of the duty. A demand was made from the collector, in form, of a clearance for the ship, which he could not grant until the goods which were imported, and regularly entered, were landed, and the duties paid or secured; and the like demand of a permit was made of the naval officer, with whom blank permits were intrusted by the governor, to be filled up and delivered to such vessels only as had been cleared at the custom-house, and, therefore, in this case was refused. It was expected that in twenty days after the arrival of the tea a demand of the duty would be made by the collector, and the ship or goods be seized; which would occasion additional difficulties.

* "Friends! brethren! countrymen!—That worst of plagues, the detested tea, shipped for this port by the East India Company, is now arrived in this harbour—the hour of destruction or manly opposition to the machinations of tyranny stare you in the face. Every friend to his country, to himself, and posterity, is now called upon to meet at Faneuil Hall, at nine o'clock this day, at which time the bells will ring, to make an united and successful resistance to this last, worst, and most destructive measure of administration."

Another meeting of the body was, therefore, called, in order to inquire the reason of the delay in sending the ship back to England. The people came into Boston from the adjacent towns within twenty miles, from some, more, from others, less, as they were affected; and, as soon as they were assembled [December 14, 1773], enjoined the owner of the ship, at his peril, to demand of the collector of the customs a clearance for the ship, and appointed ten of their number a committee to accompany him; and adjourned for two days to receive the report.

Being reassembled and informed by the owner that a clearance was refused, he was then enjoined immediately to apply to the governor for a pass by the castle. He made an apology to the governor for coming upon such an errand, having been compelled to it; and received an answer that no pass ever had been, or lawfully could be, given to any vessel which had not first been cleared at the custom-house, and that, upon his producing a clearance, such pass would immediately be given by the naval officer. The governor inquired of him whether he did not apprehend his ship in danger from the people, and offered him a letter to Admiral Montagu, desiring him to afford all necessary protection. He said he had been advised to remove his vessel under the stern of the admiral's ship, but, among other reasons for not doing it, mentioned his fears of the rage of the people; that his concern was not for his ship, which he did not believe was in danger, but he could not tell what would be the fate of the tea on board. He declined taking any letter to the admiral, and returned to the people. The governor was unable to judge what would be the next step. The secretary had informed him that a principal leader of the people had declared, in the hearing of the deputy secretary, that, if the governor should refuse a pass, he would demand it himself, at the head of one hundred and fifty men, etc.; and he was not without apprehensions of a further application. But he was relieved from his suspense, the same evening, by intelligence from town of the total destruction of the tea.

It was not expected that the governor would comply with the demand; and, before it was possible for the owner of the ship to return from the country with an answer, about fifty men had prepared themselves and passed by the house where the people were assembled to the wharf where the vessels lay, being covered with blankets and making the appearance of Indians. The body of the people remained until they had received the governor's answer; and then, after it had been observed to them that, everything else in their power having been done, it now remained to proceed in the only way left, and that, the owner of the ship having behaved like a man of honour, no injury ought to be offered to his person or property, the meeting was declared to be dissolved, and the body of the people repaired to the wharf and surrounded the immediate actors, as a guard and security, until they had finished their work. In two or three hours they hoisted out of the holds of the ships three hundred and forty-two chests of tea and emptied them into the sea. . . .

This was the boldest stroke which had yet been struck in America. The people in all parts of the province shewed more or less concern at the expected consequences. They were, however, at a distance; something might intervene to divert them. Besides, the thing was done: there was no way of nullifying it. Their leaders feared no consequences. To engage the people in some desperate measure had long been their plan. They never discovered more concern than when the people were quiet upon the repeal of an act of Parliament, or upon concessions made or assurances given; and never more satisfaction than when government had taken any new measures, or appeared to be inclined to them, tending, or which might be improved, to irritate and disturb the people. They had nothing to fear for themselves. They had gone too far to recede. If the colonies were subject to the supreme authority and laws of Great Britain, their offences, long since, had been of the highest nature. Their all depended upon attaining to the object which first engaged them. There was no way of attaining to it but by involving the body of the people in the same circumstances they were in themselves. And it is certain that ever after this time an opinion was easily instilled, and was continually increasing, that the body of the people had also gone too far to recede, and that an open and general revolt must be the consequence; and it was not long before actual preparations were visibly making for it in most parts of the province.

II. PARLIAMENT PUNISHES THE BOSTONIANS

"This," wrote young John Adams in his Diary, "is the most significant movement of all. There is a dignity, a majesty, a sublimity, in this last effort of the patriots that I greatly admire. This destruction of the tea is so bold, so daring, so firm, intrepid and inflexible, and it must have important consequences, and so lasting that I cannot but consider it as an epocha in history."

As usual John Adams was right. The destruction of the tea did indeed have important consequences. Americans generally applauded the boldness of the Bostonians, though even among them there were yet voices of disapprobation; but in Britain the reaction was sharp and violent. Parliament met on March 7 in an angry mood, and Lord North, reflecting faithfully George III's determination to make an example of the wicked Americans, asked for a series of acts to punish the Bostonians: the notorious Intolerable Acts. The first of these, the Boston Port Bill, laid before Parliament March 14, precipitated a debate which was to continue for seven years. The friends of America—Chatham, Burke, Conway, Johnstone, Fox and their followers—had eloquence and logic on their side, but Lord North had numbers. The act closing the port of Boston passed the Commons March 25 and received the royal assent a week later. North followed it with a series of other acts: the Massachusetts Government Act, the Administration of Justice Act, the Quartering Act and—in a somewhat different category—the Quebec Act. Taken together these were named, by Patriots, the Intolerable Acts.

We give here some excerpts of the debates in the Commons, and two letters from William Lee (brother of the more famous Richard Henry Lee, Arthur Lee and Francis Lightfoot Lee of Virginia) who at the time served as alderman of the city of London, the only American ever to hold that office.

1. THE FATEFUL DEBATE

A. LORD NORTH CALLS FOR SWIFT PUNISHMENT

... As soon as the House had resumed its former tranquillity, his Majesty's speech of the 7th instant was read. Upon which, Lord North rose. He said it contained two propositions: the one to enable his Majesty to put an end to the present disturbances in America, the other to secure the just dependence of the colonies on the crown of Great Britain. His lordship observed that the present disorders originated in Boston, in the province of Massachusetts Bay; and hoped that the method he should propose to the House would be adopted. He should confine himself particularly to those disturbances which had been created since the 1st of December. He said that it was impossible for our commerce to be safe whilst it continued in the harbour of Boston, and it was highly necessary that some port or other should be found for the landing of our merchandize where our laws would give full protection; he therefore hoped that the removal of the custom-house officers from the town of Boston would be thought a necessary step; and that the consequence of that would produce one other proposition, which would be the preventing any shipping from endeavouring to land their wares and merchandize there by blocking up the use of that harbour; he said he should move for leave to bring in a bill for those two purposes.

He observed that this was the third time the officers of the customs had been prevented from doing their duty in the harbour of Boston; he thought the inhabitants of the town of Boston deserved punishment. He said, Perhaps it may be objected that some few individuals may suffer on this account who ought not; but where the authority of a town had been, as it were, asleep and inactive, it was no new thing for the whole town to be fined for such neglect: he instanced the city of London in King Charles the Second's time, when Dr. Lamb was killed by unknown persons, the city was fined for such; and the case of Edinburgh, in Captain Porteous's affair, when a fine was set upon the whole; and also at Glasgow, when the house of Mr. Campbell was pulled down, part of the revenue of that town was sequestered to make good the damage.

He observed that Boston did not stand in so fair a light as either of the three before mentioned places, for that Boston had been upwards of seven years in riot and confusion, and associations had been held against receiving British merchandize so long ago. He observed that proceedings were openly carried on in the beginning of last November, to the 17th of December, denying the force or efficacy of the laws of this country to be exerted in the harbour of Boston; that during the above time there was not the least interposition offered by the inhabitants of the town; that at their public meetings they had regularly given orders for nightly watches to be appointed, consisting of a large body of persons, which were to prevent the landing of the tea. As the merchandize of Great Britain, this surely was highly criminal, and a direct opposition to the execution of an act of parliament; and as the tea belonging to the India Company had remained twenty days in the harbour without a clearance, they were afraid lest it should be seized by the custom-house officers, and by that means landed; they therefore destroyed it on the 20th day. That this appeared to be a violent and outrageous proceeding done to our fellow subjects by a set of people who could not, in any shape, claim more than the natural privilege of trading with their fellow-subjects. That Boston had been the ringleader in all riots, and had at all times shewn a desire of seeing the laws of Great Britain attempted in vain in the colony of Massachusetts Bay.

B. MR. VAN ARGUES THAT BOSTON OUGHT TO BE KNOCKED ABOUT THE EARS

Lord North said: The test of the Bostonians will not be the indemnification of the East India Company alone; it will remain in the breast of the King not to restore the port until peace and obedience shall be observed in the port of Boston. I am ready to admit a clause to secure those wharfs and quays which are now in use, to see the same when the port shall be restored.

He observed, he had been charged with changing his opinion; that the declaration which he had made tended chiefly to the punishment of the Bostonians, and that the Bill particularly adhered to the views of making the India Company satisfaction. He believed the House would do him the justice to say that he had declared both those measures to be his intention at the first setting out of the business, as well as to restore the trade to a proper footing; that he hoped he had never deviated from them, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman [Mr. Fox] had charged him with; that he should never be ashamed, at any time, to give up his opinion to better judgement.

Mr. Van said he agreed to the flagitiousness of the offence in the Americans, and therefore was of opinion that the town of Boston ought to be knocked about their ears and destroyed. Delenda est Carthago. Said he, I am of opinion you will never meet with that proper obedience to the laws of this country until you have destroyed that nest of locusts.

C. LORD GEORGE GERMAIN: "PUT AN END TO THEIR TOWN MEETINGS"

Lord George Germain said: I could have wished that the noble lord, when he was forming this scheme of salvation to this country, would have at least considered that there were other parts of the internal government necessary to be put under some regulation. I mean particularly the internal government of the province of Massachusetts Bay. I wish to see the council of that country on the same footing as other colonies. There is a degree of absurdity, at present, in the election of the council. I cannot, Sir, disagree with the noble lord, nor can I think he will do a better thing than to put an end to their town meetings. I would not have men of a mercantile cast every day collecting themselves together and debating about political matters; I would have them follow their occupations as merchants, and not consider themselves as ministers of that country. I would also wish that all corporate powers might be given to certain people in every town, in the same manner that corporations are formed here; I should then expect to see some subordination, some authority and order. I do not know by what power those are to be formed, but I wish that they may be formed by some. . . .

I would wish to bring the constitution of America as similar to our own as possible. I would wish to see the council of that country similar to a House of Lords in this. I would wish to see chancery suits determined by a court of chancery, and not by the assembly of that province. At present, their assembly is a downright clog upon all the proceedings of the governor, and the council are continually thwarting and opposing any proposition he may make for the security and welfare of that government. You have, Sir, no government, no governor; the whole are the proceedings of a tumultuous and riotous rabble, who ought, if they had the least prudence, to follow their mercantile employment and not trouble themselves with politics and government, which they do not understand.

We are told by some gentlemen, Oh! do not break the charter; do not take away their rights that are granted to them by the predecessors of the crown. Whoever, Sir, wishes to preserve such charters without a due correction and regulation; whoever, Sir, wishes for such subjects, I wish them no worse than to govern them. Put this people, Sir, upon a free footing of government; do not let us be every day asserting our rights by words, and they denying our authority and preventing the execution of our laws. Let us, Sir, persevere in refining that government which cannot support itself, and proceed on in the manner we have begun, and I make no doubt but, by a manly and steady perseverance, things may be restored from a state of anarchy and confusion to peace, quietude and due obedience to the laws of this country.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVII, 1195-1196.

D. "WE MUST RISK SOMETHING; IF WE DO NOT IT IS ALL OVER": LORD NORTH

Debate on the bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, April 22, 1774.

Lord North said: . . . Gentlemen say, Let the colony come to your bar and be heard in their defence; though it is not likely that they will come, when they deny your authority in every instance. Can we remain in this situation long? We must effectually take some measure to correct and amend the defects of that government. I have heard so many different opinions in regard to our conduct in America, I hardly know how to answer them. The hon. gentleman who spoke last formerly blamed the tame and insipid conduct of government; now he condemns this measure as harsh and severe. The Americans have tarred and feathered your subjects, plundered your merchants, burnt your ships, denied all obedience to your laws and authority; yet so clement and so long forbearing has our conduct been that it is incumbent on us now to take a different course. Whatever may be the consequence, we must risk something; if we do not, all is over. The measure now proposed is nothing more than taking the election of counsellors out of the hands of those people who are continually acting in defiance and resistance of your laws.

It has also been said by gentlemen, Send for the Americans to your bar—give them redress a twelvemonth hence. Surely, Sir, this cannot be the language that is to give effectual relief to America; it is not, I say again, political convenience, it is political necessity that urges this measure. If this is not the proper method, shew me any other which is preferable, and I will postpone it.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVII, 1280-1281.

E. CHARLES JAMES FOX: "CONSIDER WHETHER IT IS MORE PROPER TO GOVERN BY FORCE OR BY MANAGEMENT"

Debate in the Commons on the bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, May 2, 1774.

Mr. Charles Fox said: I take this to be the question, whether America is to be governed by force or management? I never could conceive that the Americans could be taxed without their consent. Just as the House of Commons stands to the House of Lords with regard to taxation and legislation, so stands America with Great Britain. There is not an American but who must reject and resist the principle and right of our taxing them. The question, then, is shortly this: Whether we ought to govern America on these principles? Can this country gain strength by keeping up such a dispute as this? Tell me when America is to be taxed, so as to relieve the burthens of this country. I look upon this measure to be in effect taking away their charter; if their charter is to be taken away, for God's sake let it be taken away by law, and not by a legislative coercion. But I cannot conceive that any law whatever, while their charter continues, will make them think that you have a right to tax them. If a system of force is to be established, there is no provision for that in this Bill; it does not go far enough; if it is to induce them by fair means, it goes too far. The only method by which the Americans will ever think they are attached to this country will be by laying aside the right of taxing. I consider this Bill as a Bill of pains and penalties, for it begins with a crime and ends with a punishment; but I wish gentlemen would consider whether it is more proper to govern by military force or by management.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVII, 1313.

F. EDMUND BURKE: "A GREAT MANY RED COATS WILL NEVER GOVERN AMERICA"

Debate in the Commons on the bill for regulating the government of Massachusetts Bay, May 2, 1774.

Mr. Edmund Burke said: The question that is before you is a great one; it is no less than the proscription of provinces, and cities, and nations, upon their trial. Except that when the saints of God are to judge the world, I do not know one of greater importance. . . .

If you govern America at all, Sir, it must be by an army; but the Bill before us carries with it the force of that army; and I am of opinion they never will consent without force being used.

I have to protest against this Bill because you refuse to hear the parties aggrieved. Consider what you are doing when you are taking the trial over the Atlantic seas, 3,000 miles to Great Britain; witnesses may be subpoenaed, and called upon by the prisoner, as many as he pleases. Let me, for God's sake, wish that gentlemen would think a little more that a fair trial may be had in America; and that while the King appoints the judge, there is a degree of fairness that people should the jury.

Repeal, Sir, the Act which gave rise to this disturbance; this will be the remedy to bring peace and quietness and restore authority; but a great black book and a great many red coats will never be able to govern it. It is true, the Americans cannot resist the force of this country, but it will cause wranglings, scuffling and discontent. Such remedies as the foregoing will create disturbances that can never be quieted.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVII, 1314-1315.

2. "THE INTENTION OF THIS ACT IS TOTALLY TO ANNIHILATE BOSTON"

London, 17 March 1774

My dear Brother:

I must give you a little dissertation on Politics. The American business engages at present the whole attention of every one here, from the King to the shopkeeper. The inclosed paper will give you a sketch of the bill that is to be brought into the House of Commons to-morrow respecting Boston, but I am told by several members (for none but members are admitted when American affairs are on the carpet) that Lord North said, in the bill some alteration of the charter of the Massachusetts Bay would be introduced, and declared that the punishment of Boston was intended as an example to all the other Colonies, who should be treated in the same manner whenever they dared to resist the shackles which the King is determined they shall wear (perhaps the last sentiment was not conveyed in my words, but the meaning was truly the same), but that it was necessary and prudent to punish one Colony at a time, and Boston being the foremost in asserting their rights, it was proper to begin with it first. This you may be assured is the language of every ministerial scoundrel. The intention of this act is totally to annihilate the town of Boston, which will most effectually be done, if the people there permit it to be carried into execution. Lord North, Dartmouth and, some say, Lord Mansfield have been against these measures; but the King with his usual obstinacy and tyrannical disposition is determined, if it be possible, to enslave you all; the Bedford Party, Lord Temple and the remnant of the Grenville Party, Lord Suffolk and Wedderburne, wish the same as well as to make their court to the King, so that Lords North and Dartmouth have been over ruled in the cabinet, where the whole business is settled, and Parliament made the instrument when it is thought convenient; for the mode of business is quite changed in this country from what it was formerly. Neither King nor Minister ever do anything wrong, because Parliament is very ready to sanctify what the King or Minister determines to be right.

These violent measures would never have been attempted (for there is not a more certain truth in nature than that tyrants are always cowards) but upon the following principles or reasons: from the conduct of the Bostonians in admitting the troops in 1768 to land and be quartered in the town without any resistance—though they had an act of Parliament in their favor, and after they had made the world believe by a great deal of blustering, and everybody here firmly expected, they would proceed to extremities, in so much that the stocks here fell upon it, as if war had been actually declared against France or Spain—the King and his friends, as they are called, think there will be no resistance now. Secondly, they believe that the other Colonies will look on quietly and see Boston destroyed.

In both these conjectures I flatter myself they will be mistaken. The people of Boston seem to me to have been preparing for such a stroke for some time: I think they are now provided, and the less they talk the more I expect they will do, especially as they know the European powers are ready at any moment to give them any assistance they want. As to the second reason, I cannot believe the other Colonies will not interfere, and that very warmly. Everything at present seems to me to be very properly situated in N. York, Pennsylvania and So. Carolina, and if the Virginia Assembly does but stir in the business, I have no doubt there will be a perfect union among all the Colonies, which is indeed more absolutely necessary now than at any time before, as the attack is intended against the whole, and I am of opinion it will check the sanguinary spirit of your enemies here, if they find the Colonies are firm and closely united. Indeed, it is evident you have no alternative but to resist united and most probably be free, or to submit and be slaves at once.

The plan I leave to you. You have many friends here upon principle, as you will perceive from the inclosed printed letter to Lord North, signed E. B., which is supposed to be Edmund Burke's, who is the mouth of the Rockingham Party; which should be reprinted in all the American papers. Write me often, especially from your Assembly.

—FORD, ed., Letters of William Lee, I, 81-85.

3. "A SETTLED PLAN TO SUBVERT THE CONSTITUTION OF THIS COUNTRY"

William Lee to Richard Henry Lee.

London, 10 September 1774

My dear Brother:

I have perused your letter to our brother, Arthur Lee, as he is absent on a tour to Italy. I find from a letter of our brother, Francis Lightfoot Lee, an idea has been entertained in Virginia of paying for the East India Company's tea destroyed at Boston; I cannot think such a measure will be adopted at the Congress. In my judgment it is totally wrong and cannot be supported on any principle of Policy or Justice; my reasons for this opinion are too numerous to be set down here, especially as they can be of little use, since the measure must be fully canvassed before this gets to hand; . . . I will give some hints of what in my opinion ought to be your conduct.

A settled plan is laid to subvert the liberties and constitution of this country, as well as that of America. You are personally obnoxious to the King and his Junto, as having shown more spirit in support of your rights than the people of this country, who are immersed in riches, luxury and dissipation.

Therefore, every nerve will be exerted to subdue your spirit, and make you first bow your necks to the yoke, which will prove a useful example to the people at home. The plan is deeply laid by the King, Lords Bute, Mansfield and Wedderburne; for which purpose they employ the most useful tools in the kingdom: Lord North, a tyrant from principle, cunning, treacherous and persevering, a perfect adept; and his brother-in-law, Lord Dartmouth, who will whine, preach and cry, while he is preparing privately a dagger to stab you to the heart. Under this direction, the several acts against Boston, the Massachusetts Bay and Quebec act, have passed the last sessions; to enforce them soldiers and ships of war have already been sent to Boston, and many more will follow on the least occasion. General Carleton, the ablest officer in the British service, is sent to his Government of Quebec, to embody 30,000 Roman Catholics there. The Ministers have offered to General Amherst the command in chief of America, and to General Sir William Draper, the government of New York. General Amherst has not yet agreed to accept, but has it now in consideration. Amherst, Gage, Carleton and Draper are to be employed against you.

From these facts it is evident that open war is intended against you, provided the people here sit still, and the question is, how are you to oppose it? In my opinion every method is lawfully warrantable. As the first blow is struck by the Ministry, and every tie of allegiance is broken by the Quebec Act, which is absolutely a dissolution of this Government, the compact between the King and the people is totally done away with. The people of New England have been prudently providing for the worst event, lately having two entire vessels, privately loaded with arms and ammunitions from Scotland, with twice as many small arms and double the amount of powder that was usual, shipt from hence. I wish every Colony had been as provident, but I do not find that they have. However, let us consider what peaceable steps should be first pursued, that your last efforts may be warrantable in the eyes of God and Man. . . .

—FORD, ed., Letters of William Lee, I, 87-90.

III. INTOLERABLE ACTS UNITE THE COLONIES

The Boston Port Bill received the royal signature the last day of March, 1774, but was not to go into effect until the first of June; in the interval, it was hoped, the Americans would come to their senses. Instead the Bostonians greeted the Act with defiance. "Should Europe empty all her force we'll meet her in array," wrote the Patriot Joseph Warren, soon to die at Bunker's Hill; while Sam Adams, who bore some responsibility for the crisis, assured Arthur Lee over in London that the people of Boston would "sustain the shock with dignity and . . . gloriously defeat the designs of their enemies." From New England towns and then from all the colonies came a ground swell of defiance and support. A thousand people assembled in Farmington, Connecticut, resolved that "we are the sons of freedom," and "till time shall be no more, that godlike virtue shall blazon our hemisphere." Patriots in Baltimore sent encouragement and pledged themselves to stop all trade with the mother country; New Hampshire inaugurated resistance; Jersey spoke for suspension of trade; South Carolina resolved that "the whole continent must be animated with one great soul and all Americans must resolve to stand by one another even unto the position of death."

Virginia, the largest colony, was of crucial importance. There Jefferson, Henry, Richard Henry Lee and Francis Lightfoot Lee, convinced of "the necessity of arousing our people from the lethargy into which they had fallen," cooked up a resolution—as Jefferson put it—calling for a general day of prayer; this was duly passed. Three days later 89 members of the Burgesses resolved that an attack on one colony was an attack on all, and on May 31 the Burgesses concluded a nonimportation agreement. And the freeholders of Albemarle County drew up a series of resolutions, drafted by Jefferson, which stated among other things that "no other legislature whatever can rightly exercise authority over them" except the one of their own choosing. More important was the steady drift of George Washington toward the patriot cause. Rich, respectable, conservative and moderate, Washington found himself as outraged by the Intolerable Acts as Sam Adams or Thomas Jefferson. "Shall we supinely sit and see one province after another fall a prey to despotism?" he rhetorically asked his friend Bryan Fairfax who, like Galloway in Pennsylvania, looked with alarm on the rapid course of events. Washington's own answer—"we must assert our rights or submit to every imposition that can be heaped upon us"—was big with significance for the future of America.

1. "FREE AMERICA"

Ascribed to Joseph Warren, 1774.

That seat of science, Athens,
And earth's proud mistress, Rome;
Where now are all their glories?
We scarce can find a tomb.
Then guard your rights, Americans,
Nor stoop to lawless sway;
Oppose, oppose, oppose, oppose,
For North America.

We led fair Freedom hither,
And lo, the desert smiled!
A paradise of pleasure
Was opened in the wild!
Your harvest, bold Americans,
No power shall snatch away!
Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza,
For free America.

Torn from a world of tyrants,
Beneath this western sky,
We formed a new dominion,
A land of liberty:

The world shall own we're masters here;
Then hasten on the day:
Huzza, huzza, huzza, huzza,
For free America. . . .

Lift up your hands, ye heroes,
And swear with proud disdain,
The wretch that would ensnare you Shall lay his snares in vain:
Should Europe empty all her force,
We'll meet her in array,
And fight and shout, and shout and fight
For North America.

Some future day shall crown us
The masters of the main,
Our fleets shall speak in thunder
To England, France and Spain;
And the nations over the ocean spread
Shall tremble and obey
The sons, the sons, the sons, the sons
Of brave America. . . .

2. "FRUSTRATE THE DIABOLICAL DESIGNS OF OUR ENEMIES"

Samuel Adams to Arthur Lee.

Boston, May 18, 1774

My Dear Sir: The edict of the British Parliament, commonly called the Boston Port Act, came safely to my hand. For flagrant injustice and barbarity, one might search in vain among the archives of Constantinople to find a match for it. But what else could have been expected from a Parliament too long under the dictates and controul of an Administration which seems to be totally lost to all sense and feeling of morality, and governed by passion, cruelty and revenge?

For us to reason against such an Act would be idleness. Our business is to find means to evade its malignant design. The inhabitants view it not with astonishment, but with indignation. They discover the utmost contempt of the framers of it; while they are yet disposed to consider the body of the nation (though represented by such a Parliament) in the character they have sustained heretofore, humane and generous. They resent the behaviour of the merchants in London—those, I mean, who receive their bread from them—in infamously deserting their cause at the time of extremity. They can easily believe that the industrious manufacturers, whose time is wholly spent in their various employments, are misled and imposed upon by such miscreants as have ungratefully devoted themselves to an abandoned Ministry, not regarding the ruin of those who have been their best benefactors. But the inhabitants of this town must and will look to their own safety, which they see does not consist in a servile compliance with the ignominious terms of this barbarous edict. Though the means of preserving their liberties should distress and even ruin the British manufacturers, they are resolved (but with reluctance) to try the experiment. To this they are impelled by motives of self-preservation. They feel humanely for those who must suffer, but, being innocent, are not the objects of their revenge. They have already called upon their sister Colonies (as you will see by the enclosed note) who not only feel for them as fellow-citizens, but look upon them as suffering the stroke of Ministerial vengeance in the common cause of America; that cause which the Colonists have pledged themselves to each other not to give up.

In the meantime, I trust in God this devoted town will sustain the shock with dignity; and, supported by their brethren, will gloriously defeat the designs of their common enemies. Calmness, courage and unanimity prevail. While they are resolved not tamely to submit, they will, by refraining from any acts of violence, avoid the snare that they discover to be laid for them by posting regiments so near them.

I heartily thank you for your spirited exertions. Use means for the preservation of your health. Our warmest gratitude is due to Lords Camden and Shelburne. Our dependence is upon the wisdom of the few of the British nobility. We suspect studied insult in the appointment of the person who is Commander-in-chief of the troops in America to be our Governour; and I think there appears to be in it more than a design to insult upon any specious pretence. We will endeavour, by circumspection and sound prudence, to frustrate the diabolical designs of our enemies.

3. "WE ARE THE SONS OF FREEDOM"

Proceedings of Farmington, Connecticut, on the Boston Port Act.
May 19, 1774.

Early in the morning was found the following handbill, posted up in various parts of the town, viz:

To pass through the fire at six o'clock this evening, in honour to the immortal goddess of Liberty, the late infamous Act of the British Parliament for farther distressing the American Colonies; the place of execution will be the public parade, where all Sons of Liberty are desired to attend.

Accordingly, a very numerous and respectable body were assembled of near one thousand people, when a huge pole, just forty-five feet high, was erected and consecrated to the shrine of liberty; after which the Act of Parliament for blocking up the Boston harbour was read aloud, sentenced to the flames and executed by the hands of the common hangman; then the following resolves were passed, nem. con.:

1st. That it is the greatest dignity, interest and happiness of every American to be united with our parent State, while our liberties are duly secured, maintained and supported by our rightful Sovereign, whose person we greatly revere; whose government, while duly administered, we are ready with our lives and properties to support.

2D. That the present ministry, being instigated by the devil and led on by their wicked and corrupt hearts, have a design to take away our liberties and properties and to enslave us forever.

3D. That the late Act which their malice hath caused to be passed in Parliament, for blocking up the port of Boston, is unjust, illegal and oppressive; and that we and every American are sharers in the insults offered to the town of Boston.

4TH. That those pimps and parasites who dared to advise their master to such detestable measures be held in utter abhorrence by us and every American, and their names loaded with the curses of all succeeding generations.

5TH. That we scorn the chains of slavery; we despise every attempt to rivet them upon us; we are the sons of freedom and resolved that, till time shall be no more, godlike virtue shall blazon our hemisphere.

4. PHILADELPHIA RALLIES TO THE AID OF BOSTON

Pennsylvania Resolutions on the Boston Port Act.

Philadelphia, June 20, 1774

At a very large and respectable meeting of the freeholders and freemen of the city and county of Philadelphia, on June 18, 1774. Thomas Willing, John Dickinson, chairmen.

I. Resolved, That the act of parliament for shutting up the port of Boston is unconstitutional, oppressive to the inhabitants of that town, dangerous to the liberties of the British colonies, and therefore, considering our brethren at Boston as suffering in the common cause of America:

II. That a congress of deputies from the several colonies in North America is the most probable and proper mode of procuring relief for our suffering brethren, obtaining redress of American grievances, securing our rights and liberties, and re-establishing peace and harmony between Great Britain and these colonies, on a constitutional foundation.

III. That a large and respectable committee be immediately appointed for the city and county of Philadelphia, to correspond with the sister colonies and with the several counties in this province, in order that all may unite in promoting and endeavoring to attain the great and valuable ends mentioned in the foregoing resolution.

IV. That the committee nominated by this meeting shall consult together, and on mature deliberation determine what is the most proper mode of collecting the sense of this province, and appointing deputies for the same, to attend a general congress, and having determined thereupon, shall take such measures as by them shall be judged most expedient, for procuring this province to be represented at the said congress in the best manner that can be devised for promoting the public welfare.

V. That the committee be instructed immediately to set on foot a subscription for the relief of such poor inhabitants of the town of Boston as may be deprived of their means of subsistence. . . .

VI. That the committee consist of forty-three persons. . . .

5. VIRGINIA FALLS INTO LINE

Resolution of the House of Burgesses, Tuesday, May 24.

This House, being deeply impressed with Apprehension of the great Dangers to be derived to British America, from the hostile Invasion of the City of Boston, . . . whose Commerce and Harbour are on the 1st Day of June next to be stopped by an armed Force, deem it highly necessary that the said first Day of June be set apart by the Members of this House as a Day of Fasting, Humiliation, and Prayer, devoutly to implore the divine Interposition for averting the heavy Calamity, which threatens Destruction to our civil Rights, and the Evils of civil War; to give us one Heart and one Mind firmly to oppose, by all just and proper Means, every Injury to American Rights, and that the Minds of his Majesty and his Parliament may be inspired from above with Wisdom, Moderation, and Justice, to remove from the loyal People of America all Cause of Danger from a continued Pursuit of Measures pregnant with their Ruin.

Ordered, therefore, that the Members of this House do attend in their Places at the Hour of ten in the Forenoon, on the said 1st Day of June next, in Order to proceed with the Speaker and the Mace to the Church in this City for the Purposes aforesaid, and that the Reverend Mr. Price be appointed to read Prayers, and the Reverend Mr. Gwatkin to preach a Sermon suitable to the Occasion.

6. JEFFERSON ARGUES THAT PARLIAMENT HAS NO AUTHORITY

Resolutions of freeholders of Albemarle County, Virginia.

July 26, 1774

At a meeting of the Freeholders of the County of Albemarle, assembled in their collective body, at the Court House of the said County, on the 26th of July, 1774:

Resolved, That the inhabitants of the Several States of British America are subject to the laws which they adopted at their first settlement, and to such others as have been since made by their respective Legislatures, duly constituted and appointed with their own consent. That no other Legislature whatever can rightly exercise authority over them; and that these privileges they hold as the common rights of mankind, confirmed by the political constitutions they have respectively assumed, and also by several charters of compact from the Crown.

Resolved, That these their natural and legal rights have in frequent instances been invaded by the Parliament of Great Britain and particularly that they were so by an act lately passed to take away the trade of the inhabitants of the town of Boston, in the province of Massachusetts Bay; that all such assumptions of unlawful power are dangerous to the right of the British empire in general, and should be considered as its common cause, and that we will ever be ready to join with our fellow-subjects in every part of the same, in executing all those rightful powers which God has given us, for the re-establishment and guaranteeing such their constitutional rights, when, where, and by whomsoever invaded.

It is the opinion of this meeting, that the most eligible means of effecting these purposes, will be to put an immediate stop to all imports from Great Britain, . . . and to all exports thereto, after the first day of October, 1775; and immediately to discontinue all commercial intercourse with every part of the British Empire which shall not in like manner break off their commerce with Great Britain.

It is the opinion of this meeting, that we immediately cease to import all commodities from every part of the world, which are subjected by the British Parliament to the payment of duties in America.

It is the opinion of this meeting, that these measures should be pursued until a repeal be obtained of the Act for blocking up the harbour of Boston; of the Acts prohibiting or restraining internal manufactures in America; of the Acts imposing on any commodities duties to be paid in America; and of the Act laying restrictions on the American trade; and that on such repeal it will be reasonable to grant to our brethren of Great Britain such privileges in commerce as may amply compensate their fraternal assistance, past and future.

Resolved, However, that this meeting do submit these their opinions to the Convention of Deputies from the several counties of this Colony, and appointed to be held at Williamsburg on the first day of August next, and also to the General Congress of Deputies from the several American States, when and wheresoever held; and that they will concur in these or any other measures which such Convention or such Congress shall adopt as most expedient for the American good; and we do appoint Thomas Jefferson and John Walker our Deputies to act for this county at the said Convention, and instruct them to conform themselves to these our Resolutions and Opinions.

7. WASHINGTON TAKES HIS STAND AGAINST BRITISH TYRANNY

A. "GOD ONLY KNOWS WHAT IS TO BECOME OF US"

Williamsburg, June 10, 1774

. . . Our Assembly met at this place the 4th. Ulto. according to Prorogation, and dissolved the 26th. for entering into a resolve of which the Inclosed is a Copy, and which the Govr. thought reflected too much upon his Majesty, and the British Parliament to pass over unnoticed; this Dissolution was as sudden as unexpected for there were other resolves of a much more spirited nature ready to be offerd to the House wch. would have been unanimously adopted respecting the Boston Port Bill as it is calld but were withheld till the Important business of the Country could be gone through. As the case stands the assembly sat In 22 days for nothing. . . .

The day after this Event the Members convend themselves at the Raleigh Tavern and enterd into the Inclosed Association which being followed two days after by an Express from Boston accompanied by the Sentiments of some Meetings in our Sister Colonies to the Northwd. the proceedings mentiond in the Inclos'd Papers were had thereupon and a general meeting requested of all the late Representatives in this City on the first of August when it is hopd, and expected that some vigorous (and effectual) measures will be effectually adopted to obtain that justice which is denied to our Petitions and Remonstrances (and Prayers); in short the Ministry may rely on it that Americans will never be tax'd without their own consent that the cause of Boston the despotick Measures in respect to it I mean now is and ever will be considerd as the cause of America (not that we approve their conduct in destroyg. the Tea) and that we shall not suffer ourselves to be sacrificed by piece meals though god only knows what is to become of us, threatned as we are with so many hoverg. evils as hang over us at present; having a cruel and blood thirsty Enemy upon our Backs, the Indians, between whom and our Frontier Inhabitants many Skirmishes have happnd, and with whom a general War is inevitable whilst those from whom we have a right to seek protection are endeavouring by every piece of Art and despotism to fix the Shackles of Slavery upon us.

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, III, 223-224.

B. "SHALL WE WHINE AND CRY FOR RELIEF WHEN WE HAVE ALREADY TRIED IT IN VAIN?"

... The conduct of the Boston people could not justify the rigor of their measures, unless there had been a requisition of payment and refusal of it; nor did that measure require an act to deprive the government of Massachusetts Bay of their charter, or to exempt offenders from trial in the place where offences were committed, as there was not, nor could not be, a single instance produced to manifest the necessity of it. Are not all these things self evident proofs of a fixed and uniform plan to tax us? If we want further proofs, do not all the debates in the House of Commons serve to confirm this? And has not General Gage's conduct since his arrival, (in stopping the address of his Council, and publishing a proclamation more becoming a Turkish bashaw, than an English governor, declaring it treason to associate in any manner by which the commerce of Great Britain is to be affected,) exhibited an unexampled testimony of the most despotic system of tyranny, that ever was practised in a free government? In short, what further proofs are wanted to satisfy one of the designs of the ministry, than their own acts, which are uniform and plainly tending to the same point, nay, if I mistake not, avowedly to fix the right of taxation? What hope then from petitioning, when they tell us, that now or never is the time to fix the matter? Shall we, after this, whine and cry for relief, when we have already tried it in vain? Or shall we supinely sit and see one province after another fall a prey to despotism? If I was in any doubt, as to the right which the Parliament of Great Britain had to tax us without our consent, I should most heartily coincide with you in opinion, that to petition, and petition only, is the proper method to apply for relief; because we should and our constitution, we are, in my opinion, indubitably entitled to. I should even think it criminal to go further than this, under such an idea; but none such I have. I think the Parliament of Great Britain hath no more right to put their hands into my pocket, without my consent, than I have to put my hands into yours for money; and this being already urged to them in a firm, but decent manner, by all the colonies, what reason is there to expect any thing from their justice?

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, III, 232-233.

C. "THE CRISIS IS ARRIVED WHEN WE MUST ASSERT OUR RIGHTS"

Mount Vernon, August 24, 1774

... In truth, persuaded as I am, that you have read all the political pieces, which compose a large share of the Gazette at this time, I should think it, but for your request, a piece of inexcusable arrogance in me, to make the least essay towards a change in your political opinions; for I am sure I have no new lights to throw upon the subject, or any other arguments to offer in support of my own doctrine, than what you have seen; and could only in general add, that an innate spirit of freedom first told me, that the measures, which administration hath for some time been, and now are most violently pursuing, are repugnant to every principle of natural justice; whilst much abler heads than my own hath fully convinced me, that it is not only repugnant to natural right, but subversive of the laws and constitution of Great Britain itself, in the establishment of which some of the best blood in the kingdom hath been spilt. Satisfied, then, that the acts of a British Parliament are no longer governed by the principles of justice, that it is trampling upon the valuable rights of Americans, confirmed to them by charter and constitution they themselves boast of, and convinced beyond the smallest doubt, that these measures are the result of deliberation, and attempted to be carried into execution by the hand of power, is it a time to trifle, or risk our cause upon petitions, which with difficulty obtain access, and afterwards are thrown by with the utmost contempt? Or should we, because heretofore unsuspicious of design, and then unwilling to enter into disputes with the mother country, go on to bear more, and forbear to enumerate our just causes of complaint? For my own part, I shall not undertake to say where the line between Great Britain and the colonies should be drawn; but I am clearly of opinion, that one ought to be drawn, and our rights clearly ascertained. I could wish, I own, that the dispute had been left to posterity to determine, but the crisis is arrived when we must assert our rights, or submit to every imposition, that can be heaped upon us, till custom and use shall make us as tame and abject slaves, as the blacks we rule over with such arbitrary sway....

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, III, 240-242.

IV. BOSTON BELEAGUERED AND SAVED

The Boston Port Bill went into effect June 1; it closed the port of Boston not only to overseas trade, but even to coastal shipping. The fateful day was observed with fasting and prayer; public buildings were draped in black, and church bells tolled from morning to night. Soon regiments of redcoats turned the town into a garrison. By November 1774, 11 regiments were quartered in the city. Meantime thousands of the inhabitants fled to the country or near-by towns; trade was at a standstill; stores closed; property fell in value, and only British expenditures kept up the economic life of the town.

Hutchinson had been permitted to return to England and General Gage was acting governor. It was Gage who had hoped to bring Boston to her knees by this Draconian program. But the Massachusetts House resolved that the city should be succored, and the town itself broadcast an appeal for aid. "I find," wrote Gage in surprise, "that they have some warm friends in New York and Philadelphia." They had, indeed, and elsewhere too. Soon food and supplies were pouring in from all the colonies: flour, fish, sheep, beef cattle, pork, grain, rice, provisions of all kinds. "In God's name," said the Tory preacher Samuel Seabury, "are not the people of Boston able to relieve their own poor? Must they go begging from Nova Scotia to Georgia to support a few poor people whom their perverseness and ill conduct have thrown into distress?"

By trying to isolate Boston the British government had made the city a martyr and contributed greatly to unifying colonial sentiment in her behalf.

The best description of Boston during these difficult months comes from the pen of the Whig merchant, John Andrews, who stayed in the beleaguered city to guard his property and his mercantile business. In his letters to William Barrell, who kept a store in Philadelphia, we can read the story of hard times, of the flood of aid, of frequent brushes between soldiers and inhabitants, of mounting discontent, and of the crisis which threatened to explode into open war. The most dangerous of these came the first week of September. General Gage had sent out a small force to seize a store of gunpowder at Quarry Hill, in Charlestown; news of the expedition flew like fire from town to town, growing as it spread into monstrous tales of pillage and rapine. Within twenty-four hours 4,000 minutemen marched on Boston—a number larger than the army Gage commanded—and during the next day or two, thousands more straggled in: the total number was rumored to be around 20,000. When it became clear that the rumor was false, the minutemen drifted home again. The lesson was lost on the purblind Gage—who made the same mistake eight months later—but not on the members of the Continental Congress, even then gathering in the City of Brotherly Love.

1. JOHN ANDREWS DESCRIBES THE SUFFERINGS AND THE HEROISM OF BOSTON TO William Barrell.

Imagine to yourself the horror painted in the faces of a string of slaves condemned by the Inquisition to perpetual drudgery at the oar! Such is the dejection imprinted on every countenance we meet in this once happy, but now totally ruined town.

Yes, Bill, nothing will save us but an entire stoppage of trade, both to England and the West Indies. throughout the continent: and that must be de-terminated as speedily as absolutely. The least hesitancy on your part to the southward, and the matter is over; we must acknowledge and ask forgiveness for all past offences, whether we have been guilty of any or no; give up the point so long contested, and acknowledge the right of Parliament to do—n us whenever they please; and to add to all this, we must pay for an article unjustly forced upon us with a sole view to pick our pockets (not that I would by any means justify the destruction of that article). When that is done, where are we? Why, in much the same situation as before, without one flattering hope of relief: entirely dependant on the will of an arbitrary Minister, who'd sacrifice the Kingdom to gratify a cursed revenge. A more convincing proof we can't have than in the present Act for blocking up our Port, which could not have been more severely and strongly expressed if all the Devils in the infernal regions had had a hand in the draughting it.

Shall endeavor to content myself to stay here till I see what turn affairs will take. If to my liking, well; if not, shall look out for some other place of residence, as I sincerely believe they intend to put their threats in execution; which is, to make the town a desolate wilderness, and the grass to grow in our streets.

Our Militia was yesterday mustered for the reception of General Gage, who was proclaimed Governor amid the acclamations of the people. He expressed himself as sensible of the unwelcome errand he came upon, but as a servant of the Crown he was obliged to see the Act put in execution; but would do all in his power to serve us. Whether they were only words of course or not, can't say; am a little doubtful. There was an elegant entertainment provided for him at Faneuil Hall, and after a number of toasts gave by him, in which the prosperity of the town of Boston was included, he gave "Governor Hutchinson," which was received by a general hiss. Such is the detestation in which that tool of tyrants is held among us. . . . The damned arch traitor, as he is called, is very much chagrined at being superseded, as it's only last Thursday when he gave orders for repairs to his houses in town and country, and upon the workman's suggestions that he would be succeeded soon, he said it was like many other reports that prevailed, for that he had all the satisfaction he could wish for or expect from home, and every part of his conduct was entirely approved of, and left to his option whether to enjoy the Government or go to England. But now a guilty conscience has induced him to take refuge at the Castle.

It's reported here that your Government, as well as New York, is to be changed and removed, the one to Burlington and the other to Amboy, with requisitions made upon both, and more particularly upon Rhode Island.

If my last was in a desponding stile, I'm sure I have much more reason to be so now; as ought else than poverty and distress stare us in the face. . . . Animosities run higher than ever, each party charging the other as bringing ruin upon their country; that unless some expediency is adopted to get the Port open by paying for the tea (which seems to be the only one) am afraid we shall experience the worst of evils, a civil war, which God avert!

The trading part promised themselves a general compliance with the tenor of the Act . . . but . . . those who have governed the town for years past and were in a great measure the authors of all our evils by their injudicious conduct are grown more obstinate than ever, and seem determined to bring total destruction upon us: which may be sufficiently evinced by all their conduct. They not only intend to deprive us of trade in future, but render us utterly incapable of contributing that assistance which will be absolutely necessary for the support of the indigent the approaching fall and winter, by their cruel endeavors to stop the little inland trade we expected.

Our wharfs are intirely deserted; not a topsail vessel to be seen either there or in the harbour, save the ships of war and transport, the latter of which land their passengers in this town tomorrow. Four regiments are already arrived, and four more are expected. How they are to be disposed of, can't say. It's gave out that if the General Court don't provide barracks for them, they are to be quartered on the inhabitants in the fall: if so, am determined not to stay in it. The executors of the Act seem to strain points beyond what was ever intended, for they make all the vessels, both with grain and wood, entirely unload at Marblehead before they'll permit them to come in here, which conduct, in regard to the article of wood, has already greatly enhanced the price, and the masters say they won't come at all, if they are to be always put to such trouble, as they are obliged to hire another vessel to unload into, and then to return it back again, as they have no wharves to admit of their landing it on. Nor will they suffer any article of merchandize to be brought or carried over Charles River ferry, [so] that we are obliged to pay for 28 miles land carriage to get our goods from Marblehead or Salem.

Could fill up a number of sheets to enumerate all our difficulties.

The country people, being vastly more vigilant and spirited than the town, did not fail to visit Brattle and Sewall's house last evening, but not finding either of 'em at home, they quietly went off. But a report having prevailed through the country (by reason of the seizure of the powder yesterday) that the same game had been played here, and the inhabitants disarmed, has raised such a spirit as will require the utmost prudence to allay; for they are in arms at all quarters, being determined to see us redressed.

At eight o'clock this morning there were about three thousand under their regular leaders at Cambridge common, and continually increasing; had left their arms at a little distance, when Judge Lee and Danforth waited upon 'em, and gave them the fullest assurances that they had resigned their seats at the board and would not act in any capacity whatever that was disagreeable to the people.

Lieutenant Governor Oliver is come to town and Brattle is gone to the Castle, which, I believe, is the only place of safety for him in the province.

Four or five expresses have come down to Charlestown and here, to acquaint us that between Sudbury and this, above ten thousand men are in arms, and are continually coming down from the country back: that their determination is to collect about forty or fifty thousand by night (which they are sure of accomplishing) when they intend to fling in about fifteen thousand by the way of the Neck, and as many more over the ferry: when once got possession, to come in like locusts and rid the town of every soldier. But such a scheme is so big with mischief and calamity that the committee of correspondence, selectmen and every prudent man in the town of Charlestown set off to appease 'em early in the morning; and the committee of correspondence from this town also went at the same time. Since which, accounts have been so alarming that between ten and eleven o'clock the selectmen set out from here, to try what they could do to satisfy and disperse 'em.

Ruthy set out this morning for Hingham, in company with my mother, Mr. Breck and Ben. Am rejoiced that she is out of the way, just at this time.

A guard of soldiers is set upon the powder house at the back of the Common, so that people are debarred from selling their own property; and the guard upon the Neck is doubled, as well as that the whole battalions have had new flints, etc., delivered out to them. . . .

September 25th, 1774

. . . The example of our worthy brethren of New York in not letting their vessels for Government service, as well as that their carpenters would not engage in any work for 'em, has induced the country people to think seriously whether they were right in supplying with timber, joice and straw for the barracks here. They accordingly met and determined in the negative; sent committees to the several contractors to let them know if they supplied any further they would incur the resentment of the whole country; and at the same time signified to our committee of correspondence that they did not think it eligible for the workmen here to go on with building barracks or preparing houses for the reception of the troops, as we might possibly, by persisting, not only incur blame from our sister colonies, but essentially affect the union now subsisting between town and country; which circumstance caused the committee to get together Saturday P.M., when they passed a vote that it was not prudent for the workmen to go on with the frames, etc., nor in any shape to contribute towards the accomodation of the soldiery, as they might themselves give offence to their country brethren.

The purport of which coming to the Governor, he sent his compliments to the selectmen, and begged their attendance at six o'clock this evening, when he requested of them that they would not take any measures to prevent the workmen from going on with the barracks.

They replied it was not in their power to influence the country, and it lay principally with them whether the workmen should proceed or not: that they themselves were disposed to have the barracks go on, as they conceived it much more for the benefit of the town (if the soldiery must be here) to have them kept together, rather than to be scattered over the town, as in that case it would be a very difficult matter to keep them in order.

The Governor seemed a great deal worried about the affair, and am told that in the course of the conversation he expressed himself thus—"Good G—d! for G—d's sake, Gentlemen! they have got two months work to do, and the soldiers ought to be in barracks in one. Do consider, Gentlemen!"

Thus the tables are in some measure turned. Formerly they solicited the Governor, but now it seems he solicits them. A pretty good mess for Sunday, Bill, don't you think it is?

October 1, 1774

It's common for the soldiers to fire at a target fixed in the stream at the bottom of the common. A countryman stood by a few days ago, and laughed very heartily at a whole regiment's firing, and not one being able to hit it. The officer observed him, and asked why he laughed.

"Perhaps you'll be affronted if I tell you," replied the countryman.

No, he would not, he said.

"Why then," says he, "I laugh to see how awkward they fire. Why, I'll be bount I hit it ten times running."

"Ah! will you?" replied the officer. "Come try. Soldiers, go and bring five of the best guns, and load 'em for this honest man."

"Why, you need not bring so many: let me have any one that comes to hand," replied the other, "but I chuse to load myself." He accordingly loaded, and asked the officer where he should fire. He replied, "To the right,"—when he pulled tricker, and drove the ball as near the right as possible. The officer was amazed—and said he could not do it again, as that was only by chance.

He loaded again. "Where shall I fire?"

"To the left,"—when he performed as well as before.

"Come! Once more," says the officer.

He prepared the third time. "Where shall I fire naow?"

"In the center."

He took aim, and the ball went as exact in the middle as possible. The officers as well as soldiers stared, and thought the Devil was in the man. "Why," says the countryman, "I'll tell you naow. I have got a boy at home that will toss up an apple and shoot out all the seeds as it's coming down."

The country towns, in general, have chose their own officers and muster for exercise once a week at least—when the parson as well as the squire stands in the ranks with a firelock. In particular at Marblehead, they turn out three or four times a week, when Col. Lee as well as the clergymen there are not ashamed to appear in the ranks, to be taught the manual exercise in particular.

One more anecdote, and I'll close this barren day. When the 59th Regiment came from Salem and were drawn up on each side the Neck, a remarkable tall countryman, near eight feet high, strutted between 'em at the head of his waggon, looking very sly and contemptuously on one side and t'other, which attracted the notice of the whole regiment.

"Ay, ay," says he, "you don't know what boys we have got in the country. I am near nine feet high, and one of the smallest among 'em"—which caused much merriment to the spectators, as well as surprise to the soldiers.

Indeed, Bill! were I to tell you of all the jokes and wittisisms of the country people, I would have little else to do.

January 21st, 1775

Last evening a number of drunken officers attacked the town house watch between eleven and 12 o'clock, when the assistance of the New Boston watch was called, and a general battle ensued; some wounded on both sides. A party from the main guard was brought up with their captain together with another party from the Governor's. Had it not been for the prudence of two officers that were sober, the captain of the main guard would have acted a second tragedy to the 5th March, as he was much disguised with liquor and would have ordered the guard to fire on the watch had he not been restrained. His name is Gore, being a captain in the 5th or Earl Peirce's Regiment. He was degraded not long since for some misdemeanour.

This afternoon there was a general squabble between the butchers in the market and a number of soldiers. It first began by a soldier's tripping up the heels of a fisherman who was walking through the market with a piece of beef in his hands. A guard from the 47th barracks appeared and carried off the soldiers, together with one butcher who was most active, the officer taking him by the collar. He was able to have crushed the officer, but was advised to be quiet. Young Ned Gray insisted on it that he should not be carried into the guard house, upon which many hard words passed between him and the captain of the guard. However, Gray prevailed, and they carried the man into Miss Foster's store close by the barracks, from whence the officer dismissed him after finding upon deliberation that his conduct was not justifiable—and seemed to be much afraid lest the butcher should take advantage of him by law or complaint.

2. ALL AMERICA RALLIES TO THE AID OF BELEAGUERED BOSTON

A. WINDHAM, CONNECTICUT

To the Committee of Correspondence, Boston.

28th June, 1774

Gentlemen,

'Tis with pity, mixed with indignation, that we have beheld the cruel and unmanly attacks made by the British Parliament on the loyal and patriotic Town of Boston, who seem destined to feel the force of ministerial wrath, the whole weight of parliamentary vengeance levelled at them in a manner so replete with cruelty and injustice as must strike every heart with horror, and fill every breast with rage that is not entirely void of every sentiment of honor and justice and callous to all the common feelings of humanity. But when we consider the cause of all these calamities, that it is nothing less, on your part, than a strict adherence to the fundamental principles of the Constitution, which, when attacked, you dared openly to assert and vindicate, and stand foremost in the glorious cause of Liberty, in which you are contending not only for your own, but ours and the common rights of every American; when we reflect that it is this for which you are suffering such horrid cruelties, for which your streets have been stained with blood, and for which you now feel the horrors of a military government, we are overwhelmed with a conflict of tumultuous passions, and filled with that manly ardor which bids us join you hand in hand and suffer with you in the common cause; nay, even, if the sad exigence of affairs should ever require it, to determine, in defence of every thing for which life is worth enjoying, to meet that death which will be glorious and infinitely preferable to a life dragged on in that low, servile state which is evidently planned for us, and which nothing less than the most heroic fortitude and the highest exertions of every civil and Christian virtue can prevent.

Give us leave, therefore, gentlemen, to entreat, to beg, to conjure you, by everything that is dear, by everything that is sacred, by the venerable names of our pious forefathers, who suffered, who bled in the defence of Liberty, not to desert the cause at this trying crisis, but to use your utmost influence in pursuing and persevering in every measure which may have a tendency to produce the desired effect.

... As a testimony of our commiseration of your misfortunes, the Town, on the 23d instant, at a legal and very full meeting, unanimously chose a committee to procure subscriptions for your present relief. Accordingly, we have procured a small flock of sheep, which at this season are not so good as we could wish, but are the best we had, and the people of this Town were almost unanimous in contributing to this purpose.

B. BALTIMORE, MARYLAND

To Committee of Correspondence in the Town of Boston.

Aug. 4, 1774

Gentlemen,

By order of the Committee of Correspondence for this Town, we have shipped on board the sloop America, Perkins Allen, master, three thousand bushels of corn, twenty barrels of rye flour, two barrels of pork and twenty barrels of bread, for the relief of our brethren, the distressed inhabitants of your Town, being in virtue of a subscription raised by the inhabitants of Baltimore Town, on that account.

In the bill of lading for said articles is also included one thousand bushels of corn, which we have purchased and shipped for the same account, on the strength of a subscription now making by the inhabitants of Annapolis, which a gentleman of their Committee has assured us should be paid to us when their collections are made. As there was spare room in the vessel, we were glad of an opportunity of furthering to you a part of their benevolent intentions. We flatter ourselves the good people of this Province, who have in general discovered a hearty disposition to sympathy in your grievances, will generously contribute, according to their articles, to maintain and support every sufferer in your and their common cause. If we can be in the least instrumental in furthering any contributions made in favor of your inhabitants, it will give us the most sincere pleasure and some opportunity of exercising the grateful sense of many obligations which, as individuals, we are under to many good people of your Province. We are, with the highest respect,

Gentlemen, your most humble servants,

SAM'L. AND ROB'T PURVIANCE

C. BROOKLYN IN POMFRET, CONNECTICUT

To Samuel Adams, Esq., Chairman to the Committee of Correspondence.

August 11, 1774

Gentlemen,

With our hearts deeply impressed with the feelings of humanity towards our near and dear brethren of Boston, who are now suffering under a ministerial, revengeful hand, and at the same time full of gratitude to the patriotic inhabitants for the noble stand which they have made against all oppressive innovations, and with unfeigned love for all British America, who must, if Boston is subjugated, alternately fall a prey to ministerial ambition, send you one hundred and twenty-five sheep, as a present from the inhabitants of the parish of Brooklyn, hoping thereby you may be enabled to stand more firm (if possible) in the glorious cause in which you are embarked, notwithstanding the repeated, unheard of daring attacks which the British Parliament are making upon the rights which you ought to enjoy as English-born subjects; and if so, we shall of consequence contribute our mite towards the salvation of British America, which is all our ambition.

In zeal in our country's cause, we are exceeded by none; but our abilities and opportunities do not admit of our being of that weight in the American scale as we would to God we were.

We mean, in the first place, to attempt to appease the fire (raised by your committing the India tea to the watery element as a merited oblation to Neptune) of an ambitious and vindictive minister, by the blood of rams and of lambs; if that do not answer the end, we are ready to march in the van and to sprinkle the American altars with our hearts blood, if occasion should be.

The latent seeds of destruction which are implanted in the constitution of almost every state or empire have grown in England, in these last nine years, with amazing rapidity, and now are mature for harvest; and ere long we shall see reapers flocking from all parts of Europe, who will sweep their fields with the besom of destruction. This thought occasions a cloud of melancholy to arise in the breast of every descendant from Britain, which is only dissipated by the pleasing prospect every American has before him! Here we have an unbounded, fertile country, worth contending for with blood! Here bribery and corruption, which are certain forebodings of a speedy dissolution, are as yet only known by names. To us, ere long, Britain's glory will be transferred, where it will shine with accumulated brilliancy.

We cannot but rejoice with you on account of the union and firmness of the Continent. The public virtue now exhibited by the Americans exceeds all of its kind that can be produced in the annals of the Greeks and Romans. Behold them from North to South, from East to West, striving to comfort the Town of Boston, both by publishing their sentiments in regard to the present tyrannical administration, and by supporting their poor with provision, who, otherwise, in this present stagnation of business, would have reduced the opulent to a state of penury and despair in a short time.

You are held up as a spectacle to the whole world. All Christendom are longing to see the event of the American contest. And do, most noble citizens, play your part manfully, of which, we make no doubt, your names are either to be held in eternal veneration or execration. If you stand out, your names cannot be too much applauded by all Europe and all future generations, which is the hearty desire and wish of us, who are, with utmost respect, your most obedient and humble servants.

ISRAEL PUTNAM, [et al.], Committee of Correspondence for the Parish of Brooklyn

D. KINGSTON, NEW HAMPSHIRE

To the Overseers of the Town of Boston.

Sept. 14th., 1774

Gentlemen,

The inhabitants of Kingston, in the Province of New Hampshire, see with deep concern the unhappy misunderstanding and disagreement that now subsists between Great Britain and these American Colonies, being fully sensible the happiness of both countries depend on an union, harmony and agreement to be established between them on a just, equitable and permanent foundation. But when we consider the new, arbitrary and unjust claims of our brethren in Great Britain to levy taxes upon us at their sovereign will and pleasure, and to make laws to bind us in all cases whatsoever, we view and consider ourselves and our posterity under the operations of these claims as absolute slaves; for what is a slave but one who is bound in all cases whatsoever by the will and command of another? And we look on the late unjust, cruel, hostile and tyrannical Acts of the British Parliament, respecting the Massachusetts Bay in general, and the Town of Boston in particular, as consequences of these unrighteous claims, and from them clearly see what the whole continent has to expect under their operation. . . .

We wish the Town of Boston wisdom and prudence to conduct them in these trying and critical times, and that their struggle for liberty may be crowned with abundant success. We look on the cause in which you are engaged as a common cause, and that we and our posterity are equally interested with you in the event. We beg leave to assure that this Town will readily assist the Town of Boston to the utmost of their ability, in every prudent measure that may be taken for regaining their just rights and privileges from all unjust invaders. We heartily sympathize with the poor of the Town of Boston under their present distress, and as an earnest of our readiness to assist you, this Town have contributed and sent by the bearers hereof, one hundred sheep as a present for their relief, to be disposed of for their use in such way and manner as you shall think best.

We are, in behalf of the donors, Your most obedient humble servants,

JACOB HOOKE, [et al.]

E. ESSEX COUNTY, VIRGINIA

John Hancock, Esq., or the Overseers of the Poor of the Town of Boston.

Sept. 19th, 1774

Gentlemen:

This serves to inform you that we have consigned to you, by the schooner Sally, James Perkins, master, one thousand and eighty-seven bushels of Indian corn, for the use of our suffering brethren in your Town, it being a part only of the contribution by the people in this County for their relief. The remainder, amounting to four or five hundred bushels, shall come by the first opportunity. We can venture to assure you that the Virginians are warmly disposed to assist them, and hope for their steady and prudent perseverance in the common cause of our country, from whence only we can hope for a happy termination of our distresses. We pray God for an happy issue to our virtuous struggles, and we beg leave to assure you that we have the most sincere regard for our northward brethren, and are,

Gentlemen, your most obedient servants,

JOHN UPSHAW, [et al.]

F. DURHAM, NEW HAMPSHIRE

Nov. 21st, 1774

Gentlemen,

We take pleasure in transmitting to you, by Mr. Scammel, a few cattle, with a small sum of money, which a number of persons in this place, tenderly sympathizing with our suffering brethren in Boston, have contributed towards their support. With this, or soon after, you will receive the donations of a number in Lee, a parish lately set off from this Town, and in a few days those of Dover, Newmarket and other adjacent Towns. What you herewith receive comes not from the opulent, but mostly from the industrious yeomanry in this parish. We have but a few persons of affluent fortunes among us, but those have most cheerfully contributed to the relief of the distressed in your metropolis.

This is considered by us, not as a gift or an act of charity, but of justice, as a small part of what we are in duty bound to communicate to those truly noble and patriotic advocates of American freedom who are bravely standing in the gap between us and slavery, defending the common interests of a whole continent and gloriously struggling in the cause of Liberty. Upon you the eyes of all America are fixed. Upon your invincible patience, fortitude and resolution (under God) depends all that is dear to them and their prosperity. May that superintendent gracious Being, whose ears are ever open to the cry of the oppressed, in answer to the incessant prayers of his people defend our just cause, turn the counsels of our enemies into foolishness, deliver us from the hands of our oppressors, and make those very measures, by which they are endeavoring to compass our destruction, the means of fixing our invaluable rights and privileges upon a more firm and lasting basis. . . .

3. A BRITISH OFFICER COMPLAINS OF BOREDOM AND DISORDER

1775, Jany. 1st. Nothing remarkable but the drunkenness among the soldiers, which is now got to a very great pitch; owing to the cheapness of the liquor, a man may get drunk for a copper or two. Still a hard frost. . . .

12th. The frost is broke up and today it rains and thaws. Gaming having got to a very great length among many of the officers, the Genl. lately expressed his disapprobation of a club they have instituted for that purpose; but finding that of no effect, he has set on foot a subscription for a card assembly, which will be very reasonable, as there are rules that no person is to play for above a certain sum; a number of people have subscribed; they call it the Anti-Gambling-Club. I fancy the Genl. is trying to shame the other club, but I don't believe he will succeed, as it's very rare seeing a person alter who is once entered into that way, unless it is by being incapable of continuing it, which I dare say will be the case of many of them before the winter is over.

On the 9th inst. Govr. Wentworth issued a proclamation couched in the most spirited terms, accusing those people who had forcibly entered the Castle of William and Mary at Portsmouth and taken from thence barrels of powder, cannon and small arms, of treason and rebellion; and exhorting all His Majesty's loyal subjects in that Province to exert themselves in the detection of those high offenders, and to use every means of bringing them to a punishment equal to their crimes. Yesterday evening was a ball by subscription; seven of each corps was the number fixed, and the ladies were invited by the managers; this scheme was proposed by Mrs. G—e and carried into execution by her favorites, by which she enjoyed a dance and an opportunity of seeing her friends at no expense. . . .

14th. Cards sent from the Loyal Society of the Blue and Orange to Genls. Gage and Haldiman, Brigadiers Earl Percy, Pigott and Jones, and to the Adml., inviting them to dine with the Society on the Queen's Birthday. Ordered this day that for the future the troops are to receive 4 days salt provision and 3 days fresh, all except the marines and regimental hospitals. We have been fortunate in having only fresh for so long a time; the troops in America used always to have salt before this time. . . .

21st. Last night there was a riot in King Street in consequence of an officer having been insulted by the watchmen, which has frequently happened, as those people suppose from their employment that they may do it with impunity; the contrary, however, they experienced last night. A number of officers as well as townsmen were assembled, and in consequence of the watch having brandished their hooks and other weapons, several officers drew their swords and wounds were given on both sides, some officers slightly; one of the watch lost a nose, another a thumb, besides many others by the points of swords, but less conspicuous than those above mentioned. A court of enquiry is ordered to set next Monday, consisting of five field officers, to enquire into the circumstances of the riot. . . .

March 6th. This day an oration was delivered by Dr. Warren, a notorious Whig, at the great South Meeting opposite the Governor's House; it was in commemoration of what they term the Massacre on the 5th of March, 1770. It was known for some days that this was to be delivered; accordingly a great number of officers assembled at it, when after he had finished a most sedition, inflammatory harangue, John Hancock stood up and made a short speech in the same strain, at the end of which some of the officers cried out, "Fie! Fie!" which being mistaken for the cry of fire an alarm immediately ensued, which filled the people with such consternation that they were getting out as fast as they could by the doors and windows. It was imagined that there would have been a riot, which if there had would in all probability have proved fatal to Hancock, Adams, Warren and the rest of those villains, as they were all up in the pulpit together, and the meeting was crowded with officers and seaman in such a manner that they could not have escaped; however, it luckily did not turn out so. It would indeed have been a pity for them to have made their exit in that way, as I hope we shall have the pleasure before long of seeing them do it by the hands of the hangman. The General, hearing there was to be a procession at night upon the same occasion, sent for the selectmen and told them that they had better not have any such thing, as most likely it would produce a disturbance, from which if any bad consequences ensued he would make them answerable; this put a stop to it and they did not put it in execution; the General in case they should had ordered all the regts. to be in readiness to turn out at a moment's warning, and strengthened some of the guards. . . .

March 30th. The 1st Brigade marched into the country at 6 o'clock in the morning; it alarmed the people a good deal. Expresses were sent to every town near; at Watertown about 9 miles off, they got 2 pieces of cannon to the bridge and loaded 'em, but nobody would stay to fire them; at Cambridge they were so alarmed that they pulled up the bridge. However, they were quit for their fears, for after marching about the country for five hours we returned peaceably home. . . .

CHAPTER TWO

Congress Asserts the Rights of Americans

SHORTLY AFTER the occupation of Boston by the redcoats, in July 1774, Ezra Stiles of New Haven wrote prophetically that "if oppression proceeds, despotism may force an annual congress; and a public spirit of enterprise may originate in an American Magna Charta and Bill of Rights, supported by such intrepid and persevering importunity as even sovereignty may hereafter judge it not wise to withstand. There will be a Runnymede in America." The first Continental Congress was not a Runnymede, but the second was, so the future President of Yale College was right, as usual.

A congress of the American states was very much in the minds of the Patriot leaders; it was less than ten years, after all, since the Stamp Act Congress had organized successful resistance to obnoxious Parliamentary acts. As early as May 17, 1774, the freemen of Providence recommended an intercolonial convention to consider the rights of Americans; and a number of other communities quickly endorsed this proposal, some of them in order to fend off more drastic measures. Again, as back in the days of the Stamp Act crisis, it was the action of Virginia and of Massachusetts that proved decisive. On May 27, 89 Burgesses, among them Washington, Jefferson, Randolph, Pendleton and Henry, met in the Raleigh Tavern at Williamsburg, announced that the cause of one colony was the cause of all, and called for a general congress. On June 17 Samuel Adams moved in the Massachusetts House to call a congress of all the colonies at Philadelphia on the first day of September next; the resolution was passed with but eleven negative votes, and Governor Gage promptly dissolved the House.

Massachusetts selected James Bowdoin, Thomas Cushing, Robert Treat Paine and the "brace of Adamses" to represent her at the first Continental Congress. John Adams, the youngest of the delegates, proved the most important; certainly for our purposes he is, for we rely on him for the most interesting and perceptive account of the Congress. Not quite forty, Adams had already developed most of those traits of character which were to distinguish him throughout a long life of public and literary service: passionate devotion to duty, self-conscious rectitude and a deep suspicion of the rectitude of others, immense learning allied with immense industry, pedantry, agonized introspection, faith in liberty and distrust of the ability of ordinary men to exercise it, indefatigable literary energy, and a style at once idiosyncratic, muscular and luminous. In his letters to his friend and counselor, James Warren (husband to the redoubtable Mercy Otis), and in his justly famous Diary, Adams debated the issues of the forthcoming Congress, and etched, sometimes in acid, portraits of his fellow members.

I. UNION FOR RESISTANCE

1. VIRGINIA: "AN ATTACK ON ONE COLONY IS AN ATTACK ON ALL"

May 27, 1774

... We are further clearly of opinion, that an attack, made on one of our sister colonies, to compel submission to arbitrary taxes, is an attack made on all British America, and threatens ruin to the rights of all, unless the united wisdom of the whole be applied. And for this purpose it is recommended to the committee of correspondence, that they communicate, with their several corresponding committees, on the expediency of appointing deputies from the several colonies of British America, to meet in general Congress, at such place annually as shall be thought most convenient; there to deliberate on those general measures which the united interests of America may from time to time require.

—BOYD, ed., Papers of Thomas Jefferson, I, 108.

2. MASSACHUSETTS ACTS

In the House of Representatives, June 17, 1774

This House having duly considered, and being deeply affected with the unhappy differences which have long subsisted and are increasing between Great Britain and the American Colonies, do resolve, that a meeting of Committees from the several Colonies on this Continent is highly expedient and necessary, to consult upon the present state of the Colonies and the miseries to which they are and must be reduced by the operation of certain Acts of Parliament respecting America; and to deliberate and determine upon wise and proper measures to be by them recommended to all the Colonies for the recovery and establishment of their just rights and liberties, civil and religious, and the restoration of union and harmony between Great Britain and the Colonies, most ardently desired by all good men.

Therefore resolved, That the Honourable James Bowdoin, Esq., the Honourable Thomas Cushing, Esq., Mr. Samuel Adams, John Adams and Robert Treat Paine be . . . appointed a Committee . . . for the purposes aforesaid . . . to meet in the City of Philadelphia . . . on the first day of September next. . . .

3. "IT WILL BE A NURSERY OF AMERICAN STATESMEN"

John Adams to James Warren.

The principal topic was the enterprise to Philadelphia. I view the assembly that is to be there as I do the court of Areopagus, the council of the Amphictyons, a conclave, a sanhedrin, a divan, I know not what. I suppose you sent me there to school. I thank you for thinking me an apt scholar, or capable of learning. For my own part, I am at a loss, totally at a loss, what to do when we get there; but I hope to be there taught.

It is to be a school of political prophets, I suppose, a nursery of American statesmen. May it thrive and prosper and flourish, and from this fountain may there issue streams which shall gladden all the cities and towns in North America forever! I am for making it annual, and for sending an entire new set every year, that all the principal geniuses may go to the university in rotation, that we may have politicians in plenty. Our great complaint is the scarcity of men fit to govern such mighty interests as are clashing in the present contest. A scarcity indeed! For who is sufficient for these things? Our policy must be to improve every opportunity and means for forming our people, and preparing leaders for them in the grand march of politics. We must make our children travel. You and I have too many cares and occupations, and therefore we must recommend it to Mrs. Warren, and her friend Mrs. Adams, to teach our sons the divine science of the politics; and to be frank, I suspect they understand it better than we do.

There is one ugly reflection. Brutus and Cassius were conquered and slain. Hampden died in the field, Sidney on the scaffold, Harrington in jail, etc. This is cold comfort. Politics are an ordeal path among red-hot ploughshares. Who, then, would be a politician for the pleasure of running about barefoot among them? Yet somebody must. And I think those whose characters, circumstances, educations, etc., call them, ought to follow.

Yet I do not think that one or a few men are under any moral obligation to sacrifice for themselves and families all the pleasures, profits and prospects of life, while others for whose benefit this is to be done lie idle, enjoying all the sweets of society, accumulating wealth in abundance, and laying foundations for opulent and powerful families for many generations. No. I think the arduous duties of the times ought to be discharged in rotation, and I never will engage more in politics but upon this system. . . .

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, IX, 338-339.

4. "WHAT AVAILS PRUDENCE, WISDOM, FORTITUDE, WITHOUT LEGIONS?"

John Adams to James Warren.

Among many other agreeable things which occurred to me on my return from my eastern circuit, I found your letter of the fourteenth instant. Your sentiments always inspire and animate me; but never more upon any occasion than on this. I believe with you that the confidence of the people in the Congress is so great that they will support its decisions as far as possible. And, indeed, it may well be expected that many men of sound judgment will be of that assembly. But what avails prudence, wisdom, policy, fortitude, integrity, without power, without legions? When Demosthenes (God forgive the vanity of recollecting his example!) went ambassador from Athens to the other states of Greece, to excite a confederacy against Philip, he did not go to propose a non-importation or non-consumption agreement!

You "presume the greater part of the number will be masters in politicks," "prophets replete with the true spirit of prophecy." I hope it will be so. But I must say I am not one of those masters. I must be a scholar. I feel my own insufficiency for this important business. I confess myself ignorant of the characters which compose the Court of Great Britain as well as of the people who compose the nation; at least I have not that minute and accurate knowledge of either which an American senator ought to have of both. I have not that knowledge of the commerce of the several Colonies, nor even of my own Province, which may be necessary.

In short, as comprehensive knowledge of arts and sciences, especially of law and history, of geography, commerce, war and of life, is necessary for an American statesman at this time as was ever necessary for a British or a Roman senator, or a British or Roman general.

Our New England educations are quite unequal to the production of such great characters.

There is one point in which most men seem to be agreed, viz—that it is in our power so to distress the commercial and manufacturing interests in G. Britain as to make them rise up and become importunate petitioners for us to the King, Parliament and Ministry. But others deny this. Some of the higher Tories say that all we can do of this kind will be despised—ridiculed—and that they can live longer without us than we can without them. That the distresses we can occasion would be of but a few individuals and the clamours or miseries of these will be disregarded as trifling considerations in comparison of the loss of the obedience of the Colonies, etc., etc., etc.

That nothing short of such distresses as should produce convulsions would effect any thing at all.

However, I have no faith in these doctrines. The national debts and taxes are so excessive that it seems to me impossible the people should bear the loss of so great a part of their trade.

But what do you think of a non-exportation to Great Britain? Is it expedient to advise to a general non-exportation? Will not such a measure hurt ourselves? What will be the consequence? Must not fish, rice, wheat, tobacco, etc., etc., etc., perish on our hands, or must not thousands of families perish who once lived by raising and producing those commodities in America?

Your maxim, that we have nothing to expect from their justice but everything to hope from their fears, I have ever thought is just as “any of Solomon”; but I confess I have grown more scrupulous of late than ever—more disposed to discuss, examine and minutely weigh every political position than usual. I have employed the best force of my understanding in considering this apophthegm; and the result is that we have indeed nothing to expect from their justice. The Ministry, the beggarly prostituted voters, high and low, have no principles of public virtue on which we can depend, and they are interested to plunder us. But I am not so clear that we have everything to hope from their fears. They are a gallant brave high-spirited people still; and if any means can be found to make the chastisement of the Colonies popular, a Minister, who means nothing by serving in a public station but to make a fortune in wealth and titles, may push a measure to dreadful extremities.

5. JOSEPH HAWLEY URGES JOHN ADAMS TO KEEP IN THE BACKGROUND

... You cannot, Sir, but be fully apprised that a good issue of the Congress depends a good deal on the harmony, good understanding, and I had almost said brotherly love, of its members; and everything tending to beget and improve such mutual affection, and indeed to cement the body, ought to be practiced; and every thing in the least tending to create disgust or strangeness, coldness, or so much as indifference, carefully avoided. Now there is an opinion which does in some degree obtain in the other colonies, that the Massachusetts gentlemen, and especially of the town of Boston, do affect to dictate and take the lead in continental measures; that we are apt, from an inward vanity and self-conceit, to assume big and haughty airs. Whether this opinion has any foundation in fact, I am not certain. Our own Tories propagate it, if they did not at first suggest it. Now I pray that every thing in the conduct and behaviour of our gentlemen which might tend to beget or strengthen such an opinion, might be most carefully avoided.

It is highly probable, in my opinion, that you will meet gentlemen from several of the other colonies fully equal to yourselves or any of you in their knowledge of Great Britain, the colonies, law, history, government, commerce, etc. I know some of the gentlemen of Connecticut are very sensible, ingenious, solid men. Who will go from New York, I have not heard, but I know there are very able men there; and by what we from time to time see in the public papers, and what our assembly and committees have received from the assemblies and committees of the more southern colonies, we must be satisfied that they have men of as much sense and literature as any we can or ever could boast of. But enough of this sort, and I ask pardon that I have said so much of it.

Another thing I beg leave just to hint—that it is very likely that you may meet divers gentlemen in Congress who are of Dutch, or Scotch, or Irish extract. Many more there are in those southern colonies of those descents than in these New England colonies, and many of them very worthy, learned men. Quaere, therefore, whether prudence would not direct that every thing should be very cautiously avoided which could give any the least umbrage, disgust or affront to any of such pedigree. For as of every nation and blood, he that feareth God and worketh righteousness is accepted of Him, so they ought to be of us. Small things may have important effects in such a business. That which disparages our family ancestors or nation is apt to stick by us, if cast up in comparison, and their blood you will find as warm as ours. . . .

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, IX, 344-345.

6. ON TO PHILADELPHIA

From the Diary of John Adams.

August 10, 1774, Wednesday. The committee for the Congress took their departure from Boston, from Mr. Cushing's house, and rode to Coolidge's, where they dined in company with a large number of gentlemen, who went out and prepared an entertainment for them at that place. A most kindly and affectionate meeting we had, and about four in the afternoon we took our leave of them, amidst the kind wishes and fervent prayers of every man in the company for our health and success. This scene was truly affecting, beyond all description affecting. I lodged at Colonel Buck's. . . .

16. Tuesday. This morning, Dr. Eliot Rawson, Mr. Alsop, Mr. Mortimer and others, the committee of correspondence, Mr. Henshaw and many other gentlemen came to pay their respects to us, and to assure us that they thought we had their all in our hands, and that they would abide by whatever should be determined on, even to a total stoppage of trade to Europe and the West Indies. . . .

At four we made for New Haven. Seven miles out of town, at a tavern, we met a great number of carriages and of horsemen who had come out to meet us. The sheriff of the county and constable of the town and the justices of peace were in the train. As we were coming, we met others to the amount of I know not what number, but a very great one. As we came into the town, all the bells in town were set to ringing, and the people, men, women and children, were crowding at the doors and windows as if it was to see a coronation. At nine o'clock the cannon were fired, about a dozen guns, I think.

These expressions of respect to us are intended as demonstrations of the sympathy of this people with the Massachusetts Bay and its capital, and to show their expectations from the Congress and their determination to carry into execution whatever shall be agreed upon. No governor of a province, nor general of an army, was ever treated with so much ceremony and assiduity as we have been throughout the whole colony of Connecticut, hitherto, but especially all the way from Hartford to New Haven inclusively.

Nothing shows to me the spirit of the town of New Haven in a stronger point of light than the politeness of Mr. Ingersoll, Judge of Admiralty for the Pennsylvanian Middle District, who came over with his neighbors this evening and made his compliments very respectfully to Tom Cushing, Sam Adams, John Adams and Bob Paine. The numbers of gentlemen who have waited on us from Hartford to this place, the heat of the weather and the shortness of the time have made it impossible for me to learn their names.

17. Wednesday. At New Haven. We are told here that New York is now well united and very firm. This morning, Roger Sherman, Esquire, one of the delegates for Connecticut, came to see us at the tavern, Isaac Bears's. He is between fifty and sixty, a solid, sensible man. He said he read Mr. Otis's Rights, etc., in 1764, and thought that he had conceded away the rights of America. He thought the reverse of the declaratory act was true, namely, that the Parliament of Great Britain had authority to make laws for America in no case whatever. He would have been very willing that Massachusetts should have rescinded that part of their Circular Letter where they allow Parliament to be the supreme Legislative over the Colonies in any case. . . .

20. Saturday. . . . We breakfasted at Day's, and arrived in the city of New York at ten o'clock, at Hull's, a tavern, the sign the Bunch of Grapes. We rode by several very elegant country seats before we came to the city. This city will be a subject of much speculation to me. From Hull's we went to private lodgings at Mr. Tobias Stoutenberg's, in King Street, very near the City Hall one way, and the French Church the other. Mr. McDougall and Mr. Platt came to see us. Mr. Platt asked us to dinner next Monday. Mr. McDougall staid longer and talked a good deal. He is a very sensible man, and an open one. He has none of the mean cunning which disgraces so many of my countrymen. He offers to wait on us this afternoon to see the city. . . .

22. Monday. This morning we took Mr. McDougall into our coach, and rode three miles out of town to Mr. Morin Scott's to breakfast—a very pleasant ride. Mr. Scott has an elegant seat there, with Hudson's River just behind his house, and a rural prospect all around him. Mr. Scott, his lady and daughter, and her husband, Mr. Litchfield, were dressed to receive us. We sat in a fine airy entry till called into a front room to breakfast. A more elegant breakfast I never saw—rich plate, a very large silver coffee-pot, a very large silver tea-pot, napkins of the very finest materials, toast, and bread and butter in great perfection. After breakfast a plate of beautiful peaches, another of pears, and another of plums, and a muskmelon were placed on the table. . . .

Mr. McDougall gave a caution to avoid every expression here which looked like an allusion to the last appeal. He says there is a powerful party here who are intimidated by fears of a civil war, and they have been induced to acquiesce by assurances that there was no danger, and that a peaceful cessation of commerce would effect relief. Another party, he says, are intimidated lest the levelling spirit of the New England Colonies should propagate itself into New York. Another party are prompted by Episcopalian prejudices against New England. Another party are merchants largely concerned in navigation, and therefore afraid of non-importation, non-consumption and non-exportation agreements. Another party are those who are looking up to Government for favors.

About eleven o'clock, four of the delegates for the city and county of New York came to make their compliments to us—Mr. Duane, Mr. Livingston, Mr. Low and Mr. Alsop. Mr. Livingston is a downright, straightforward man. Mr. Alsop is a soft, sweet man. Mr. Duane has a sly, surveying eye, a little squint-eyed; between forty and forty-five, I should guess; very sensible, I think, and very artful. He says their private correspondence and their agent's letters, Mr. Burke, are that the nation is against us; that we cannot depend upon any support of any kind from thence; that the merchants are very much against us; that their pride is touched, and what they call rights, by our turning away their ships from our ports. A question arose whether it was a prerogative of the Crown at common law to license wharves. I thought it was by statutes at home, which were never extended to America before the Boston Port Bill. Mr. Duane was of my opinion. Mr. Livingston thought it was a prerogative of the Crown at common law; said it had been so understood here; that all the public wharves in this town were by charter from the Governor. He questioned whether the officers of the customs were obliged to attend any wharves but licensed ones.

Mr. Morin Scott called upon us at our lodgings and politely insisted upon our taking a seat in his chariot to Mr. Platt's. We accepted the invitation, and, when we came there, were shown into as elegant a chamber as ever I saw—the furniture as rich and splendid as any of Mr. Boylston's. Mr. Low, Mr.

Peter Vanbrugh Livingston, Mr. Philip Livingston, Dr. Treat, a brother of the minister, and Mr. McDougall, Mr. Scott and Mr. Litchfield dined with us and spent the afternoon.

P. V. Livingston is a sensible man and a gentleman. He has been in trade, is rich, and now lives upon his income. Phil. Livingston is a great, rough, rapid mortal. There is no holding any conversation with him. He blusters away; says if England should turn us adrift, we should instantly go to civil wars among ourselves, to determine which Colony should govern all the rest; seems to dread New England, the levelling spirit, etc. Hints were thrown out of the Goths and Vandals; mention was made of our hanging the Quakers, etc. I told him the very existence of the Colony was at that time at stake—surrounded with Indians at war, against whom they could not have defended the Colony if the Quakers had been permitted to go on.

23. Tuesday. . . . Went to the Coffee House and saw the Virginia Paper; the spirit of the people is prodigious; their resolutions are really grand. We then went to Mr. Peter Vanbrugh Livingston's, where, at three o'clock, we dined with Scott, McDougall, Philip Livingston, Mr. Thomas Smith and a young gentleman, son of Mr. Peter Livingston. Smith and young Livingston seem to be modest, decent and sensible men.

The way we have been in, of breakfasting, dining, drinking coffee, etc., about the city, is very disagreeable on some accounts. Although it introduces us to the acquaintance of many respectable people here, yet it hinders us from seeing the college, the churches, the printers' offices and booksellers' shops, and many other things which we should choose to see.

With all the opulence and splendor of this city, there is very little good breeding to be found. We have been treated with an assiduous respect; but I have not seen one real gentleman, one well-bred man, since I came to town. At their entertainments there is no conversation that is agreeable; there is no modesty, no attention to one another. They talk very loud, very fast, and all together. If they ask you a question, before you can utter three words of your answer they will break out upon you again, and talk away.

II. THE FIRST CONGRESS DEBATES THE RIGHTS OF AMERICANS

Fifty-five delegates to the first Continental Congress met in Philadelphia September 5, 1774, and set in force motions which eventuated in American independence. Dr. Johnson called them "zealots of anarchy" and "dictators of sedition," while Lord Chatham described the body as "the most honourable assembly of statesmen since those of ancient Greeks and Romans, in the most virtuous times." Actually the Congress was a distinguished group of men, most of them long associated with resistance against the new policy inaugurated in 1764. Massachusetts sent the two Adamses and Bowdoin; Connecticut, Roger Sherman; from New York came John Jay and Philip Livingston; and from New Jersey another Livingston, William. Pennsylvania's delegation included Joseph Galloway, who eventually threw in his lot with the Loyalists, and John Dickinson, "penman of the Revolution." From Delaware came Caesar Rodney, from Maryland Samuel Chase, and from South Carolina two Rutledges and Christopher Gadsden. The Virginia delegation was the most illustrious of all: George Washington, Richard Henry Lee, Peyton Randolph, Richard Bland, Edmund Pendleton and Patrick Henry; Randolph was chosen President of the Congress. Here, as John Adams said, "are fortunes, abilities, learning, eloquence, acuteness, equal to any I ever met with in my life."

It is John Adams who has given us not only sketches of the members and of social life in the pleasant little city of Philadelphia, but the record of the debate as well, and if he tended to give undue prominence to John Adams, that can perhaps be forgiven. In the beginning the Congress seemed pretty evenly divided between the radicals, who wanted action, and the moderates—Adams called them "trimmers and timeservers"—who preferred petitions. The radicals seized the initiative and held it. They won two initial victories: the choice of Carpenter's Hall, rather than the State House, as the meeting place, and the election of the Philadelphia radical, Charles Thomson, as secretary. Then came a decisive test.

Hard on the heels of Gage's expedition to seize gunpowder on Quarry Hill, outside Boston, delegates from every town and district of Suffolk County, which included Boston and environs, met at Woodward's Tavern in Dedham, and there, on September 9, passed a series of resolutions which had been drawn up by Joseph Warren. Riding night and day, Paul Revere, who gallops through the Revolution like a centaur, brought these Suffolk Resolves to Philadelphia on the seventeenth. There was a sharp debate; then Congress adopted them and thereby endorsed them. "This was one of the happiest days of my life," wrote John Adams. "In Congress we had generous, noble sentiments and manly eloquence. This day convinced me that America will support Massachusetts or perish with her."

What elated Adams, alarmed the conservatives. Their leader was Joseph Galloway, a rich Philadelphia merchant and lawyer long active in colonial politics, speaker of the Pennsylvania Assembly, and a man of parts. On September 28 Galloway introduced his famous Plan of Union, a plan designed to give the American colonies something like dominion status in the empire. "Among all the difficulties in the way of effective and united action in 1774," wrote John Adams, "no more alarming one happened than the plan presented by Mr. Joseph Galloway." After a sharp tussle the plan was defeated by a vote of six to five, and subsequently expunged from the minutes of the Congress. We give here not the plan itself, but Benjamin Franklin's droll comment on it. Galloway drifted into loyalism, joined Howe when that general occupied Philadelphia, and departed for the mother country where he became the leading spokesman for the Loyalist position.

With the Galloway Plan out of the way, Congress settled down to business and endorsed in rapid succession a series of notable state papers. On October 14 came the Declaration and Resolves, which included a declaration of the rights of the colonies. Four days later Congress adopted the Association which has some claim to be considered the first true American union: it provided for non-importation, nonconsumption and a cessation of slave trade. Other papers included an Address to the People of Great Britain, drafted by young John Jay of New York; an Address to the Inhabitants of Quebec, and a Petition to the King, both largely the work of Dickinson.

What authority did the Congress have to pass these far-reaching acts and resolutions? It is a question that has intrigued the historian and the political theorist from that day to this. A writer in the Essex Gazette answered the question with infectious simplicity: "The American Congress derives all its power, wisdom and justice, not from scrawls of parchment signed by kings, but from the people. . . . A freeman in honoring and obeying the Congress honors and obeys himself. The least deviation from the resolves of the Congress will be treason." But a Tory asked,

*Could the Inquisition, Venice, Rome or Japan
Have devised so horrid, so wicked a Plan?*

Within a few months assemblies, conventions, or town and county meetings of eleven colonies had approved or ratified the proceedings of the Congress. The New York Assembly rejected ratification; that of Georgia did not get a chance to act on it.

1. JOHN ADAMS LISTS MEMBERS OF THE FIRST CONTINENTAL CONGRESS

September 1, 1774. Thursday. We dined at Friend Collins's, Stephen Collins's, with Governor Hopkins, Governor Ward, Mr. Galloway, Mr. Rhoades, etc. In the evening, all the gentlemen of the Congress who were arrived in town met at Smith's, the new city tavern, and spent the evening together. Twenty-five members were come. Virginia, North Carolina, Maryland and the city of New York were not arrived. Mr. William Livingston, from the Jerseys, lately of New York, was there. He is a plain man, tall, black, wears his hair; nothing elegant or genteel about him. They say he is no public speaker, but very sensible and learned, and a ready writer. Mr. Rutledge, the elder, was there, but his appearance is not very promising. There is no keenness in his eye, no depth in his countenance; nothing of the profound, sagacious, brilliant or sparkling in his first appearance.

Yesterday we removed our lodgings to the house of Miss Jane Port, in Arch Street, about half way between Front Street and Second Street. I find that there is a tribe of people here exactly like the tribe in Massachusetts of Hutchinsonian Addressers. There is, indeed, a set in every colony. We have seen the revolutions of their sentiments. Their opinions have undergone as many changes as the moon. At the time of the Stamp Act, and just before it, they professed to be against the parliamentary claim of right to tax Americans, to be friends to our constitutions, our charter, etc. Bernard was privately, secretly, endeavoring to procure an alteration of our charter. But he concealed his designs until his letters were detected. Hutchinson professed to be a staunch friend to liberty and to our charter until his letters were detected. A great number of good people thought him a good man, and a sincere friend to the Congregational interest in religion, and to our charter privileges. They went on with this Machiavelian dissimulation until those letters were detected. After that, they waited until the Boston Port Bill was passed, and then, thinking the people must submit immediately and that Lord North would carry his whole system triumphantly, they threw off the mask. Dr. Smith, Mr. Gallo-way, Mr. Vaughan and others in this town are now just where the Hutchinsonian faction were in the year 1764, when we were endeavoring to obtain a repeal of the Stamp Act.

2. Friday. Dined at Mr. Thomas Mifflin's, with Mr. Lynch, Mr. Middleton and the two Rutledges with their ladies. The two Rutledges are good lawyers. Governor Hopkins and Governor Ward were in company. Mr. Lynch gave us a sentiment: "The brave Dantzickers, who declare they will be free in the face of the greatest monarch in Europe." We were very sociable and happy. After coffee we went to the tavern, where we were introduced to Peyton Randolph, Esquire, Speaker of Virginia, Colonel Harrison, Richard Henry Lee, Esquire, and Colonel Bland. Randolph is a large, well-looking man; Lee is a tall, spare man; Bland is a learned, bookish man.

These gentlemen from Virginia appear to be the most spirited and consistent of any. Harrison said he would have come on foot rather than not come. Bland said he would have gone, upon this occasion, if it had been to Jericho.

3. Saturday. Breakfasted at Dr. Shippen's; Dr. Witherspoon was there. Col. R. H. Lee lodges there; he is a masterly man. This Mr. Lee is a brother of the sheriff of London, and of Dr. Arthur Lee, and of Mrs. Shippen; they are all sensible and deep thinkers. Lee is for making the repeal of every revenue law, the Boston Port Bill, the bill for altering the Massachusetts constitution, and the Quebec Bill, and the removal of all the troops, the end of the Congress, and an abstinence from all dutied articles, the means—rum, molasses, sugar, tea, wine, fruits, etc. He is absolutely certain that the same ship which carries home the resolution will bring back the redress. If we were to suppose that any time would intervene, he should be for exceptions. He thinks we should inform his Majesty that we never can be happy while the Lords Bute, Mansfield and North are his confidants and counsellors. He took his pen and attempted a calculation of the numbers of people represented by the Congress, which he made about two millions two hundred thousand; and of the revenue, now actually raised, which he made eighty thousand pounds sterling. He would not allow Lord North to have great abilities; he had seen no symptoms of them; his whole administration had been blunder. He said the opposition had been so feeble and incompetent hitherto that it was time to make vigorous exertions.

Mrs. Shippen is a religious and a reasoning lady. She said she had often thought that the people of Boston could not have behaved through their trials with so much prudence and firmness at the same time, if they had not been influenced by a superior power. Mr. Lee thinks that to strike at the Navigation Acts would unite every man in Britain against us, because the kingdom could not exist without them, and the advantages they derive from these regulations and restrictions of our trade are an ample compensation for all the protection they have offered us, or will afford us. Dr. Witherspoon enters with great spirit into the American cause. He seems as hearty a friend as any of the natives, an animated Son of Liberty. This forenoon, Mr. Caesar Rodney of the lower counties on Delaware River, two Mr. Tilghmans from Maryland were introduced to us. We went with Mr. William Barrell to his store, and drank punch, and eat dried smoked sprats with him; read the papers and our letters from Boston; dined with Mr. Joseph Reed, the lawyer, with Mrs. Deberdt and Mrs. Reed, Mr. Willing, Mr. Thomas Smith, Mr. Dehart, etc.; spent the evening at Mr. Mifflin's, with Lee and Harrison from Virginia, the two Rutledges, Dr. Witherspoon, Dr. Shippen, Dr. Steptoe and another gentleman; an elegant supper, and we drank sentiments till eleven o'clock. Lee and Harrison were very high. Lee had dined with Mr. Dickinson and drank Burgundy the whole afternoon.

Harrison gave us for a sentiment, "A constitutional death to the Lords Bute, Mansfield and North." Paine gave us, "May the collision of British flint and American steel produce that spark of liberty which shall illumine the latest posterity." "Wisdom to Britain, and firmness to the Colonies; may Britain be wise, and America free." "The friends of America throughout the world." "Union of the Colonies." "Unanimity to the Congress." "May the result of the Congress answer the expectations of the people." "Union of Britain and the Colonies on a constitutional foundation," and many other such toasts.

Young Rutledge told me he studied three years at the Temple. He thinks this a great distinction; says he took a volume of notes which J. Quincy transcribed; says that young gentlemen ought to travel early, because that freedom and ease of behavior which is so necessary cannot be acquired but in early life. This Rutledge is young, sprightly, but not deep; he has the most indistinct, inarticulate way of speaking; speaks through his nose; a wretched speaker in conversation. How he will shine in public, I don't yet know. He seems good-natured, though conceited. His lady is with him, in bad health. His brother still maintains the air of reserve, design and cunning, like Duane and Galloway and Bob Auchmuty.

Caesar Rodney is the oddest-looking man in the world; he is tall, thin and slender as a reed, pale; his face is not bigger than a large apple, yet there is sense and fire, spirit, wit and humor in his countenance. He made himself very merry with Ruggles and his pretended scruples and timidities at the last Congress. Mr. Reed told us at dinner that he never saw greater joy than he saw in London when the news arrived that the non-importation agreement was broke. They were universally shaking hands and congratulating each other. . . .

2. HENRY: "ALL AMERICA IS THROWN INTO ONE MASS"

Notes of John Adams on the debates in the Continental Congress.

September 5, 1774

Mr. [Patrick] Henry. Government is dissolved. Fleets and armies and the present state of things show that government is dissolved. Where are your landmarks, your boundaries of Colonies? We are in a state of nature, sir. I did propose that a scale should be laid down; that part of North America which was once Massachusetts Bay, and that part which was once Virginia, ought to be considered as having a weight. Will not people complain? Ten thousand Virginians have not outweighed one thousand others.

I will submit, however; I am determined to submit if I am overruled.

A worthy gentleman (ego) near me seemed to admit the necessity of obtaining a more adequate representation.

I hope future ages will quote our proceedings with applause. It is one of the great duties of the democratical part of the constitution to keep itself pure. It is known in my Province that some other Colonies are not so numerous or rich as they are. I am for giving all the satisfaction in my power.

The distinctions between Virginians, Pennsylvanians, New Yorkers and New Englanders are no more. I am not a Virginian, but an American.

Slaves are to be thrown out of the question, and if the freemen can be represented according to their numbers, I am satisfied.

Mr. Lynch. I differ in one point from the gentleman from Virginia, that is, in thinking that numbers only ought to determine the weight of Colonies. I think that property ought to be considered, and that it ought to be a compound of numbers and property that should determine the weight of the Colonies.

I think it cannot be now settled.

Mr. Rutledge. We have no legal authority; and obedience to our determinations will only follow the reasonableness, the apparent utility and necessity of the measures we adopt. We have no coercive or legislative authority. Our constituents are bound only in honor to observe our determinations.

Governor Ward. There are a great number of counties in Virginia very unequal in point of wealth and numbers, yet each has a right to send two members.

Mr. Lee. But one reason which prevails with me, and that is, that we are not at this time provided with proper materials. I am afraid we are not.

Mr. Gadsden. I can't see any way of voting, but by Colonies.

Colonel Bland. I agree with the gentleman (ego) who spoke near me, that we are not at present provided with materials to ascertain the importance of each Colony. The question is whether the rights and liberties of America shall be contended for or given up to arbitrary powers.

Mr. Pendleton. If the committee should find themselves unable to ascertain the weight of the Colonies by their numbers and property, they will report this, and this will lay the foundation for the Congress to take some other steps to procure evidence of numbers and property at some future time.

Mr. Henry. I agree that authentic accounts cannot be had, if by authenticity is meant attestations of officers of the Crown.

I go upon the supposition that government is at an end. All distinctions are thrown down. All America is thrown into one mass. We must aim at the minutiae of rectitude.

Mr. Jay. Could I suppose that we came to frame an American constitution, instead of endeavoring to correct the faults in an old one—I can't yet think that all government is at an end. The measure of arbitrary power is not full, and I think it must run over before we undertake to frame a new constitution.

To the virtue, spirit and abilities of Virginia, we owe much. I should always, therefore, from inclination as well as justice, be for giving Virginia its full weight.

I am not clear that we ought not to be bound by a majority, though ever so small, but I only mentioned it as a matter of danger, worthy of consideration.

3. THE RIGHTS OF AMERICANS

Notes of John Adams.

September 8, [1774]

In the Committee for stating rights, grievances and means of redress.

Colonel Lee. The rights are built on a fourfold foundation: on nature, on the British constitution, on charters, and on immemorial usage. The Navigation Act, a capital violation.

Mr. Jay. It is necessary to recur to the law of nature and the British constitution to ascertain our rights. The constitution of Great Britain will not apply to some of the charter rights.

A mother country surcharged with inhabitants, they have a right to emigrate. It may be said, if we leave our country, we cannot leave our allegiance. But there is no allegiance without protection, and emigrants have a right to erect what government they please.

Mr. J. Rutledge. Emigrants would not have a right to set up what constitution they please. A subject could not alienate his allegiance.

Lee. Can't see why we should not lay our rights upon the broadest bottom, the ground of nature. Our ancestors found here no government.

Mr. Pendleton. Consider how far we have a right to interfere with regard to the Canada constitution. If the majority of the people there should be pleased with the new constitution, would not the people of America and of England have a right to oppose it, and prevent such a constitution being established in our neighborhood?

Lee. It is contended that the Crown had no right to grant such charters as it has to the Colonies, and, therefore, we shall rest our rights on a feeble foundation if we rest them only on charters; nor will it weaken our objections to the Canada bill.

Mr. Rutledge. Our claims, I think, are well founded on the British constitution, and not on the law of nature.

Colonel Dyer. Part of the country within the Canada bill is a conquered country, and part not. It is said to be a rule that the King can give a conquered country what law he pleases.

Mr. Jay. I can't think the British constitution inseparably attached to the person of every subject. Whence did the constitution derive its authority? from compact; might not that authority be given up by compact?

Mr. William Livingston. A corporation cannot make a corporation; charter governments have done it. King can't appoint a person to make a justice of peace; all governors do it. Therefore it will not do for America to rest wholly on the laws of England.

Mr. Sherman. The ministry contend that the Colonies are only like corporations in England, and therefore subordinate to the legislature of the king.

dom. The Colonies not bound to the King or Crown by the act of settlement, but by their consent to it. There is no other legislative over the Colonies but their respective assemblies.

The Colonies adopt the common law, not as the common law, but as the highest reason.

Mr. Duane. Upon the whole, for grounding our rights on the laws and constitution of the country from whence we sprung, and charters, without recurring to the law of nature; because this will be a feeble support. Charters are compacts between the Crown and the people, and I think on this foundation the charter governments stand firm.

England is governed by a limited monarchy and free constitution. Privileges of Englishmen were inherent, their birthright and inheritance, and cannot be deprived of them without their consent.

Objection: that all the rights of Englishmen will make us independent. I hope a line may be drawn to obviate this objection.

James was against Parliament interfering with the Colonies. In the reign of Charles II the sentiments of the Crown seem to have been changed. The Navigation Act was made; Massachusetts denied the authority, but made a law to enforce it in the Colony.

Lee. Life, and liberty which is necessary for the security of life, cannot be given up when we enter into society.

Mr. Rutledge. The first emigrants could not be considered as in a state of nature; they had no right to elect a new king.

Mr. Jay. I have always withheld my assent from the position that every subject discovering land (does it) for the state to which he belongs.

Mr. Galloway. I never could find the rights of Americans in the distinction between taxation and legislation, nor in the distinction between laws for revenue and for the regulation of trade. I have looked for our rights in the law of nature, but could not find them in a state of nature, but always in a state of political society.

I have looked for them in the constitution of the English government, and there found them. We may draw them from this source securely.

Power results from the real property of the society. The states of Greece, Macedon, Rome were founded on this plan. None but landholders could vote in the comitia or stand for offices.

English constitution founded on the same principle. Among the Saxons, the landholders were obliged to attend, and shared among them the power. In the Norman period, the same. When the landholders could not all attend, the representatives of the freeholders came in. Before the reign of Henry IV an attempt was made to give the tenants in capite a right to vote. Magna Charta—archbishops, bishops, abbots, earls and barons, and tenants in capite held all the lands in England.

It is of the essence of the English constitution that no laws shall be binding but such as are made by the consent of the proprietors in England.

How, then, did it stand with our ancestors when they came over here? They could not be bound by any laws made by the British Parliament, excepting those made before. I never could see any reason to allow that we are bound to any law made since, nor could I ever make any distinction between the sorts of law.

I have ever thought we might reduce our rights to one—an exemption from all laws made by British Parliament since the emigration of our ancestors. It follows, therefore, that all the acts of Parliament made since are violations of our rights.

These claims are all defensible upon the principles even of our enemies—Lord North himself, when he shall inform himself of the true principles of the constitution, etc.

I am well aware that my arguments tend to an independency of the Colonies, and militate against the maxims that there must be some absolute power to draw together all the wills and strength of the empire.

4. DELEGATES FROM SUFFOLK COUNTY DEFY THE POWER OF BRITAIN

THE SUFFOLK RESOLVES

(drafted by Joseph Warren)

Whereas the power but not the justice, the vengeance but not the wisdom of Great-Britain, which of old persecuted, scourged, and exiled our fugitive parents from their native shores, now pursues us, their guiltless children, with unrelenting severity: And whereas, this, then savage and uncultivated desert, was purchased by the toil and treasure, or acquired by the blood and valor of those our venerable progenitors; to us they bequeathed the dearbought inheritance, to our care and protection they consigned it, and the most sacred obligations are upon us to transmit the glorious purchase, unfettered by power, unclogged with shackles, to our innocent and beloved offspring. . . . If we arrest the hand which would ransack our pockets, if we disarm the paricide which points the dagger to our bosoms, if we nobly defeat that fatal edict which proclaims a power to frame laws for us in all cases whatsoever, thereby entailing the endless and numberless curses of slavery upon us, our heirs and their heirs forever; if we successfully resist that unparalleled usurpation of unconstitutional power, whereby our capital is robbed of the means of life; whereby the streets of Boston are thronged with military executioners; whereby our coasts are lined and harbours crouded with ships of war; whereby the charter of the colony, that sacred barrier against the encroachments of tyranny, is mutilated and, in effect, annihilated; whereby a murderous law is framed to shelter villains from the hands of justice; whereby the unalienable and inestimable inheritance, which we derived from nature, the constitution of Britain, and the privileges warranted to us in the charter of the province, is totally wrecked, annulled, and vacated, posterity will acknowledge that virtue which preserved them free and happy; and while we enjoy the rewards and blessings of the faithful, the torrent of panegyrists will roll our reputations to that latest period, when the streams of time shall be absorbed in the abyss of eternity.

Therefore, we have resolved, and do resolve: . . .

3. That the late acts of the British parliament for blocking up the harbour of Boston, for altering the established form of government in this colony, and for screening the most flagitious violators of the laws of the province from a legal trial, are gross infractions of those rights to which we are justly entitled by the laws of nature, the British constitution, and the charter of the province.

4. That no obedience is due from this province to either or any part of the acts above-mentioned, but that they be rejected as the attempts of a wicked administration to enslave America. . . .

7. That it be recommended to the collectors of taxes, constables and all other officers, who have public monies in their hands, to retain the same, and not to make any payment thereof to the provincial county treasurer until the civil government of the province is placed upon a constitutional foundation, or until it shall otherwise be ordered by the proposed provincial Congress. . . .

10. That the late act of parliament for establishing the Roman Catholic religion and the French laws in that extensive country, now called Canada, is dangerous in an extreme degree to the Protestant religion and to the civil rights and liberties of all America; and, therefore, as men and Protestant Christians we are indispensably obliged to take all proper measures for our security.

11. That whereas our enemies have flattered themselves that they shall make an easy prey of this numerous, brave and hardy people, from an apprehension that they are unacquainted with military discipline; we, therefore, for the honour, defence and security of this county and province, advise, as it has been recommended to take away all commissions from the officers of the militia, that those who now hold commissions, or such other persons, be elected in each town as officers in the militia, as shall be judged of sufficient capacity for that purpose, and who have evidenced themselves the inflexible friends to the rights of the people; and that the inhabitants of those towns and districts, who are qualified, do use their utmost diligence to acquaint themselves with the art of war as soon as possible, and do, for that purpose, appear under arms at least once every week. . . .

14. That until our rights are fully restored to us, we will, to the utmost of our power, and we recommend the same to the other counties, to withhold all commercial intercourse with Great-Britain, Ireland, and the West-Indies, and abstain from the consumption of British merchandise and manufactures, and especially of East-India teas and piece goods, with such additions, alterations, and exceptions only, as the General Congress of the colonies may agree to. . . .

—Journals of the Continental Congress, I, 31-36.

5. THE CONTINENTAL CONGRESS ENDORSES THE SUFFOLK RESOLVES

Saturday, September 18, 1774

The Congress, taking the foregoing into consideration,

Resolved unan., That this assembly deeply feels the suffering of their countrymen in the Massachusetts-Bay, under the operation of the late unjust, cruel and oppressive acts of the British Parliament—that they most thoroughly approve the wisdom and fortitude with which opposition to these wicked ministerial measures has hitherto been conducted, and they earnestly recommend to their brethren a perseverance in the same firm and temperate conduct as expressed in the resolutions determined upon at a meeting of the delegates for the county of Suffolk on Tuesday, the 6th instant, trusting that the effect[s] of the united efforts of North America in their behalf will carry such conviction to the British nation of the unwise, unjust and ruinous policy of the present administration as quickly to introduce better men and wiser measures. . . .

—Journals of the Continental Congress, I, 39.

6. FRANKLIN DEPRECATES THE GALLOWAY PLAN

Benjamin Franklin to Joseph Galloway.

London, Feb. 25, 1775

Dear Friend,

In my last per Falconer I mentioned to you my showing your Plan of Union to Lords Chatham and Camden. I now hear that you had sent it to Lord Dartmouth. Lord Gower I believe alluded to it, when in the House he censured the Congress severely, as first resolving to receive a Plan for uniting the Colonies to the Mother Country, and afterwards rejecting it and ordering their first Resolution to be erased out of their minutes. Permit me to hint to you that it is whispered here by ministerial people that yourself and Mr. Jay of New York are friends to their measures and give them private intelligence of the views of the popular or country party in America. I do not believe this; but I thought it a duty of friendship to acquaint you with the report.

I have not heard what objections were made to the plan in the Congress, nor would I make more than this one, that, when I consider the extream corruption prevalent among all orders of men in this old rotten State, and the glorious publick virtue so predominant in our rising country, I cannot but apprehend more mischief than benefit from a closer union. I fear they will drag us after them in all the plundering wars which their desperate circumstances, injustice and rapacity may prompt them to undertake; and their wide-wasting prodigality and profusion is a gulph that will swallow up every aid we may distress ourselves to afford them.

Here numberless and needless places, enormous salaries, pensions, perquisites, bribes, groundless quarrels, foolish expeditions, false accounts or no accounts, contracts and jobbs devour all revenue, and produce continual necessity in the midst of natural plenty. I apprehend, therefore, that to unite us intimately will only be to corrupt and poison us also. It seems like Mezen-tius's coupling and binding together the dead and the living.

"tormenti genus, et sanie taboque fuentes, Complexu in misero, longa sic morte necabat."

However, I would try any thing, and bear any thing that can be borne with safety to our just liberties, rather than engage in a war with such near relations, unless compelled to it by dire necessity in our own defence. . . .

—SMYTH, ed., Writings of Franklin, VI, 311-312.

III. THE DECLARATION OF RIGHTS

1. JOHN ADAMS DRAFTS THE DECLARATION

After some days of general discussion, two committees were appointed of twelve members each, one from each state, Georgia not having yet come in. The first committee was instructed to prepare a bill of rights, as it was called, or a declaration of the rights of the Colonies; the second, a list of infringements or violations of those rights. Congress was pleased to appoint me on the first committee, as the member for Massachusetts.

It would be endless to attempt even an abridgement of the discussions in this committee, which met regularly every morning for many days successively, till it became an object of jealousy to all the other members of Congress. It was, indeed, very much against my judgment that the committee was so soon appointed, as I wished to hear all the great topics handled in Congress at large in the first place. They were very deliberately considered and debated in the committee, however. The two points which labored the most were:

1. Whether we should recur to the law of nature, as well as to the British constitution and our American charters and grants. Mr. Galloway and Mr. Duane were for excluding the law of nature. I was very strenuous for retaining and insisting on it, as a resource to which we might be driven by Parliament much sooner than we were aware.

2. The other great question was, what authority we should concede to Parliament; whether we should deny the authority of Parliament in all cases; whether we should allow any authority to it in our internal affairs; or whether we should allow it to regulate the trade of the empire with or without any restrictions. These discussions spun into great length, and nothing was decided. After many fruitless essays, the committee determined to appoint a sub-committee to make a draught of a set of articles that might be laid in writing before the grand committee, and become the foundation of a more regular debate and final decision. I was appointed on the sub-committee, in which, after going over the ground again, a set of articles were drawn and debated one by one. After several days deliberation, we agreed upon all the articles excepting one, and that was the authority of Parliament, which was indeed the essence of the whole controversy; some were for a flat denial of all authority; others for denying the power of taxation only; some for denying internal but admitting external, taxation. After a multitude of motions had been made, discussed, negatived, it seemed as if we should never agree upon any thing.

Mr. John Rutledge of South Carolina, one of the committee, addressing himself to me, was pleased to say, "Adams, we must agree upon something; you appear to be as familiar with the subject as any of us, and I like your expressions—'the necessity of the case' and 'excluding all ideas of taxation, external and internal.' I have a great opinion of that same idea of the necessity of the case, and I am determined against all taxation for revenue. Come, take the pen and see if you can't produce something that will unite us."

Some others of the committee seconding Mr. Rutledge, I took a sheet of paper and drew up an article. When it was read, I believe not one of the committee was fully satisfied with it; but they all soon acknowledged that there was no hope of hitting on any thing in which we could all agree with more satisfaction. All therefore agreed to this, and upon this depended the union of the Colonies. . . .

Another long debate ensued, especially on this article, and various changes and modifications of it were attempted, but none adopted.

2. DECLARATION AND RESOLVES OF THE FIRST CONGRESS

October 14, 1774

That the inhabitants of the English Colonies in North America, by the immutable laws of nature, the principles of the English constitution, and the several charters or compacts, have the following Rights:

Resolved, N. C. D.

1. That they are entitled to life, liberty, and property, and they have never ceded to any sovereign power whatever, a right to dispose of either without their consent.

2. That our ancestors, who first settled these colonies, were at the time of their emigration from the mother country, entitled to all the rights, liberties, and immunities of free and natural-born subjects within the realm of England.

3. That by such emigration they by no means forfeited, surrendered, or lost any of those rights, but that they were, and their descendants now are entitled to the exercise and enjoyment of all such of them, as their local and other circumstances enable them to exercise and enjoy.

4. That the foundation of English liberty, and of all free government, is a right in the people to participate in their legislative council: and as the English colonists are not represented, and from their local and other circumstances, cannot properly be represented in the British parliament, they are entitled to a free and exclusive power of legislation in their several provincial legislatures, where their right of representation can alone be preserved, in all cases of taxation and internal polity, subject only to the negative of their sovereign, in such manner as has been heretofore used and accustomed. But, from the necessity of the case, and a regard to the mutual interest of both countries, we cheerfully consent to the operation of such acts of the British parliament, as are bona fide restrained to the regulation of our external commerce, for the purpose of securing the commercial advantages of the whole empire to the mother country, and the commercial benefits of its respective members excluding every idea of taxation, internal or external, for raising a revenue on the subjects in America without their consent.

5. That the respective colonies are entitled to the common law of England, and more especially to the great and inestimable privilege of being tried by their peers of the vicinage, according to the course of that law.

6. That they are entitled to the benefit of such of the English statutes, as existed at the time of their colonization; and which they have, by experience, respectively found to be applicable to their several local and other circumstances.

7. That these, his majesty's colonies, are likewise entitled to all the immunities and privileges granted and confirmed to them by royal charters, or secured by their several codes of provincial laws.

8. That they have a right peaceably to assemble, consider of their grievances, and petition the King; and that all prosecutions, prohibitory proclamations, and commitments for the same, are illegal.

9. That the keeping a standing army in these colonies, in times of peace, without the consent of the legislature of that colony in which such army is kept, is against law.

10. It is indispensably necessary to good government, and rendered essential by the English constitution, that the constituent branches of the legislature be independent of each other; that, therefore, the exercise of legislative power in several colonies, by a council appointed during pleasure, by the crown, is unconstitutional, dangerous, and destructive to the freedom of American legislation.

CHAPTER THREE

The War Begins

IN ONE SENSE it is doubtless true that nobody, in 1775, wanted war; in another sense it is almost equally clear that both the Americans and the British were aching for a showdown. The quarrel between the colonies and the mother country, or between the more intransigent elements in them, had dragged on so long that patience was worn thin, and some kind of explosion was almost inevitable. All the summer and fall of 1774 and into the winter, the redcoats occupied Boston, sallying out from time to time to show their strength, but mostly wondering whether they were an occupying army or a besieged garrison. And all during these months Patriots trained and drilled, collected powder and stores, voiced their sympathy with the Bostonians and their contempt for the British, and carried on a ceaseless propaganda which cast the Bostonians in the role of martyrs and the British in the role of tyrants and banditti. Though it was against the Bostonians that the Intolerable Acts were chiefly directed, the British were not clever enough to localize the conflict, but with astonishing shortsightedness persuaded all the colonies to make the cause of Boston their own. And they made clear, too, that they had no solution except force. The Continental Congress made equally clear that Americans were not to be intimidated—the adoption of the Suffolk Resolves settled that. Even more outrageous, from the British point of view, was the success of the Association. This organization, to which every colony but Georgia acceded, was dedicated to nonintercourse with the mother country as well as a discontinuance of the slave trade. Under its terms the Continental Congress—itself an extralegal body—authorized the creation of Committees of Safety to enforce the nonimportation and nonconsumption agreements, and these were speedily set up in most of the colonies. Moderates opposed them, with some success, in New York and Philadelphia, but on the whole they commanded cooperation and obedience. English importations into New York, for example, which had reached £437,937 in 1774, fell to £1,228 the following year! No wonder merchants in Leeds, Manchester, Birmingham, Glasgow and other manufacturing towns petitioned Parliament to abandon their policy of coercion.

To these petitions Lord North and the King turned a deaf ear. American resistance merely stiffened their determination to bring Massachusetts to her knees. On November 18 George III wrote Lord North that "New England governments are in a state of rebellion, blows must decide."

Thereafter intimidation rather than persuasion, repression rather than conciliation, became the formal policy. General Gage, inclined to be easy-going, hardened his heart and will. Speaking of the Patriot leaders, he declared that "until they are sent home prisoners, I fear we shall have no peace," and the expedition to seize the stores at Concord was also designed to apprehend Hancock and Adams. Soon Gage was calling for reinforcements. "If you think ten thousand men sufficient, send twenty," he wrote to Lord Barington, and in December requested "a sufficient force to command the country by marching into it." To make all this official, so to speak, Massachusetts was proclaimed in a state of rebellion on February 9, 1775, and in April not only the Bay Colony but five other colonies were cut off from trade with Europe and from the North Atlantic fisheries. That was punishment with a vengeance!

It would have been a miracle had all this not exploded into violence, and there was no miracle. It was a dress rehearsal for violence in September 1774, when militiamen gathered threateningly outside Cambridge. There was a little prologue in Salem in February, when Colonel Leslie marched up to the bridge and then marched back again. Then, because Gage had learned nothing from these two warnings, or because he chose to disregard them, came the fateful expedition to Lexington and Concord, and the war was on.

It was not really clear at the time that Lexington and Concord meant war. The moderates in the Second Continental Congress, which met less than a month after Lexington, still hoped for reconciliation, as did the moderates in Parliament, and not until the following August were the colonies formally proclaimed in a state of rebellion. Could the fighting have been isolated at Boston, war might still have been avoided, but British intransigence combined with American determination to spread it. The impetus for the attack on Fort Ticonderoga came from New England, to be sure—from the Massachusetts Committee of Safety and the Green Mountain boys of Vermont—but the attack was significant because it marked the beginning of offensive rather than merely defensive action by the Americans, and because it spread the fighting into New York, then striving to remain neutral. And that spring, too, Virginians took the road, mildly and hesitatingly, to rebellion. There Lord Dunmore was even more obtuse than Gage; not content with dissolving the Burgesses and seizing the gunpowder in Williamsburg, he went to the extremes of inciting Negro slaves to rebel against their masters, and firing the little metropolis of Norfolk.

I. WILL THE AMERICANS FIGHT?

The freemen of Massachusetts had bared their teeth, as it were, in September 1774 when they gathered, 20,000 strong, to resist and overawe General Gage. And, in adopting the Suffolk Resolves, the Continental Congress had put the stamp of approval on their conduct. All through the winter of 1774-1775 the training of militia, the making of arms and munitions, the organization for defense, and for offense too, went forward. And, as a contemporary observed, "sedition flowed copiously from the pulpits." Early in February 1775 the second Provincial Congress of Massachusetts charged its Committee of Safety to make preparation for war, and appointed general officers for the as yet nonexistent army.

Did the British, did Gage, read aright the signs of the times? Nothing is more revealing than the general contempt in which British soldiers and statesmen, who should have known better, held the Americans. Lord Jeffrey Amherst said that with 5,000 men he could march from one end of the colonies to the other without opposition, and Franklin heard one General Clarke boast that with but a thousand Grenadiers he would undertake to march from Maine to Georgia and geld all the males, some by force and the rest by a little coaxing! And in the course of the debate on cutting off New England from the fisheries, the Earl of Sandwich—again in Franklin's hearing—assured the House that the Americans were raw, undisciplined and cowardly. Major Pitcairn, who originally shared this view, soon learned better. But Captain Evelyn could write his father in Ireland that "the rebels are the most absolute cowards on the face of the earth."

1. "BLOWS MUST DECIDE"

The King to Lord North.

Queens House Novr. 18th, 1774

I am not sorry that the line of conduct seems now chalked out, which the enclosed dispatches thoroughly justify; the New England governments are in a state of rebellion, blows must decide whether they are to be subject to this country or independent.

—DONNE, ed., Correspondence of George III with Lord North, I, 214-215.

2. "RAW, UNDISCIPLINED, COWARDLY"

In the House of Commons.

February 10, 1775

The Earl of Sandwich. The noble Lord mentions the impracticability of conquering America; I cannot think the noble Lord can be serious on this matter. Suppose the Colonies do abound in men, what does that signify? They are raw, undisciplined, cowardly men. I wish instead of forty or fifty thousand of these brave fellows they would produce in the field at least two hundred thousand; the more the better, the easier would be the conquest; if they did not run away, they would starve themselves into compliance with our measures. . . . Are these the men to fright us from the post of honour? Believe me, my Lords, the very sound of a cannon would carry them off . . . as fast as their feet could carry them. This is too trifling a part of the argument to detain your Lordships any longer.

3. "I MEAN TO SEIZE THEM ALL AND SEND THEM TO ENGLAND"

Major John Pitcairn to the Earl of Sandwich.

Boston, 14th February, 1775

My Lord—I have taken the liberty to write twice to your Lordship before this, since I came here: one letter I sent by Colonel Prescott, the other by the packet from New York.

I think many of the people of this country begin to think they have gone too far. The behaviour of the New York people will have a very good effect: the General thinks he sees it already, and all the friends to Government are of opinion that vigorous measures at present would soon put an end to this rebellion. The deluded people are made believe that they are invincible. A very impudent publication, lately come out, asserts that they are an over-match for all Europe in their own country. When this army is ordered to act against them, they will soon be convinced that they are very insignificant when opposed to regular troops. I have sent your Lordship enclosed with this the newspaper with the late resolves of the Provincial Congress; impudent enough they are. . . .

I often march out with our battalion six or seven miles into the country. The people swear at us sometimes, but that does us no harm. I often wish to have orders to march to Cambridge and seize those impudent rascals that have the assurance to make such resolves. They sometimes do not know what to think of us; for we march into the town where they are all assembled, but we have no orders to do what I wish to do, and what I think may easily be done—I mean to seize them all and send them to England.

I have sent your Lordship some of the publications of this country. There is one I am sorry I can't get: it is called "What do you think of the Congress now?" If I can get it before the ship sails, I shall certainly send it.

4. "WHAT FOOLS YOU ARE TO RESIST THE POWER OF GREAT BRITAIN!"

Major John Pitcairn to the Earl of Sandwich.

Boston, 4th March, 1775

. . . Orders are anxiously expected from England to chastise those very bad people. The General had some of the Great Whigs, as they are called here, with him two days ago, when he took that opportunity of telling them, and swore to it by the living God, that if there was a single man of the King's troops killed in any of their towns he would burn it to the ground. "What fools you are," said he, "to pretend to resist the power of Great Britain; she maintained last war three hundred thousand men, and will do the same now rather than suffer the ungrateful people of this country to continue in their rebellion." This behaviour of the General's gives great satisfaction to the friends of Government. I am satisfied that one active campaign, a smart action, and burning two or three of their towns, will set everything to rights. Nothing now, I am afraid, but this will ever convince those foolish bad people that England is in earnest. What a sad misfortune it was to this country, the repealing the Stamp Act; every friend to Government here asserts in the strongest terms that this had been the cause of all their misfortunes. . . .

II. COLONEL LESLIE'S EXPEDITION TO SALEM

Though Gage never expressed himself contemptuously toward the Americans, he did in the end adopt a contemptuous view: "They will be lyons whilst we are lambs, but if we take the resolute part they will undoubtedly prove very meek." As if to try out this theory, on February 26 he ordered Colonel Leslie to Salem to seize some stores and cannon which the Patriots had collected there. This Salem expedition, which might have been the opening battle of the war, turned out to be an opéra bouffe. Early on the morning of the twenty-sixth Leslie sailed with 240 men for Marblehead; after disembarking there, he marched on the ancient town of Salem, only to be denied passage over the drawbridge by the unterrified townspeople.

What happened is told in the accounts by Mrs. Story and William Gavett, and celebrated in the mock heroics of John Trumbull. What is fascinating is that we hear, in this first episode of the war, the notes of "The World Turned Upside Down," and that we hear, too, in the shrill voice of nurse Sarah Tarrant the original version of what was much later to emerge as the story of Barbara Frietchie.

1. COLONEL LESLIE IS TURNED BACK AT SALEM BRIDGE

On Sunday, 26 Feb'y, 1775, my father came home from church rather sooner than usual, which attracted my notice, and said to my mother, "The reg'lars are come and are marching as fast as they can towards the Northfields bridge"; and looking towards her with a very solemn face, remarked, "I don't know what will be the consequence but something very serious, and I wish you to keep the children home." I looked out of the window just at this time and saw the troops passing the house. My father then stepped out and stood at the foot of the yard looking into the street. While there our minister Mr. Barnard came along and took my father by the arm, and they walked down towards the bridge beside the troops. My father was very intimate with Mr. Barnard, but was not a deacon of his church. . . .

Colonel David Mason had received tidings of the approach of the British troops and ran into the North Church, which was contiguous to his dwelling, during service in the afternoon, and cried out, at the top of his voice, "The reg'lars are coming after the guns and are now near Malloon's Mills!" One David Boyce, a Quaker who lived near the church, was instantly out with his team to assist in carrying the guns out of the reach of the troops, and they were conveyed to the neighborhood of what was then called Buffum's Hill, to the northwest of the road leading to Danvers. . . . My father looked in between the platoons . . . to see if he could recognize any of the soldiers who had been stationed at Fort William on the Neck, many of whom were known to him, but he could discover no familiar faces—was blackguarded by the soldiers for his inquisitiveness, who asked him, with oaths, what he was looking after. The northern leaf of the draw was hoisted when the troops approached the bridge, which prevented them from going any further.

Their commander, Col. Leslie . . . then remarked to Capt. [John] Felt, or in his hearing, that he should be obliged to fire upon the people on the northern side of the bridge if they did not lower the leaf. Captain Felt told him if the troops did fire they would all be dead men, or words to that effect. It was understood afterwards that if the troops fired upon the people, Felt intended to grapple with Col. Leslie and jump into the river, for, said he, "I would willingly be drowned myself to be the death of one Englishman." . . .

The people soon began scuttling two gondolas which lay on the western side of the bridge, and the troops also got into them to prevent it. One Joseph Whicher, the foreman in Col. Sprague's distillery, was at work scuttling the colonel's gondola, and the soldiers ordered him to desist, and threatened to stab him with their bayonets if he did not—whereupon he opened his breast and dared them to strike. They pricked his breast so as to draw blood. . . .

It was a very cold day, and the soldiers were without any overcoats, and shivered excessively and shewed signs of being cold. Many of the inhabitants climbed upon the leaf of the draw and blackguarded the troops. Among them was a man who cried out as loud as possible, "Soldiers, red-jackets, lobster-coats, cowards, damnation to your government!" The inhabitants rebuked him for it and requested nothing should be done to irritate the troops. Colonel Leslie now spoke to Mr. Barnard, probably observing by his canonical dress that he was a clergyman, and said, "I will get over this bridge before I return to Boston, if I stay here till next autumn." Mr. Barnard replied, he prayed to Heaven there might be no collision, or words of a similar import. Then the colonel remarked, he should burst into the stores of William West and Eben Bickford and make barracks of them for his troops until he could obtain a passage; and turning to Captain Felt, said, "By God! I will not be defeated"; to which Captain Felt replied, "You must acknowledge you have already been baffled."

In the course of the debate between Colonel Leslie and the inhabitants, the colonel remarked that he was upon the King's Highway and would not be prevented passing over the bridge.

Old Mr. James Barr, an Englishman and a man of much nerve, then replied to him: "It is not the King's Highway; it is a road built by the owners of the lots on the other side, and no king, country or town has anything to do with it."

The colonel replied, "There may be two words to that."

And Mr. Barr rejoined, "Egad, I think that will be the best way for you to conclude the King has nothing to do with it."

Then the colonel asked Captain Felt if he had any authority to order the leaf of the draw to be lowered, and Captain Felt replied there was no authority in the case, but there might be some influence. Colonel Leslie then promised, if they would allow him to pass over the bridge, he would march but fifty rods and return immediately, without troubling or disturbing anything. Captain Felt was at first unwilling to allow the troops to pass over on any terms, but at length consented, and requested to have the leaf lowered. In this he was joined by Mr. Barnard and Colonel Pickering, and the leaf was lowered down. The troops then passed over and marched the distance agreed upon without violating their pledge, then wheeled and marched back again, and continued their march through North Street in the direction of Marblehead.

A nurse named Sarah Tarrant, in one of the houses near the termination of their route, in Northfields, placed herself at the open window and called out to them: "Go home and tell your master he has sent you on a fool's errand and broken the peace of our Sabbath. What," said she, "do you think we were born in the woods, to be frightened by owls?" One of the soldiers pointed his musket at her, and she exclaimed, "Fire if you have the courage, but I doubt it."

2. COLONEL LESLIE RETREATS: "THE WORLD TURNED UPSIDE DOWN"

Account dictated by the mother of Justice Joseph Story.

In the year 1774 some of the most influential men in the colonies received information that Gov. Gage had received orders and was determined to disarm the colonists by seizing their arms and ammunition. Many persons who were friendly to Great Britain were determined to resist all acts of usurpation and tyranny on the part of the Crown. They did not believe the Governor would attempt to enforce this order, but were very watchful and jealous of every movement made by him.

Some Tories in Salem gave Gov. Gage notice that there were some cannon and military stores in a certain place in Salem which they pointed out and described. On the 26 February, 1775, the Governor ordered from Castle William Lieut.-Col. Leslie with the 64th Regiment in a transport, to land at Marblehead, and from thence to march to Salem and seize the cannon and munitions of war. His orders were peremptory—he landed his troops upon Marblehead Neck in a very quiet manner, expecting not to be discovered or his movements suspected in such an obscure spot; but he little knew the jealous watchfulness of the Americans. By the time their feet touched the land, a man went into the town of Marblehead who saw them land, and the alarm was immediately given by a dozen men running to the door of the new meetinghouse and beating the alarm signal agreed upon, and crying out, "To arms, to arms!" A person on the watch saw the soldiers come out of the Neck lane in single file, form upon Burbier's plain and then march to Salem, playing "Yankee Doodle". . . . After the draw was lowered, Col. Leslie and his men passed over and advanced upon the road the number of paces agreed upon, wheeled about, the music playing the old-fashioned tune of "The World's Turned Upside Down," and marched to Marblehead Neck, whence they embarked.

3. LESLIE LOST NO TIME OR MEN

Through Salem straight, without delay,
The bold battalion took its way;
Marched o'er a bridge, in open sight
Of several Yankees armed for fight;

Then, without loss of time or men,
 Veered round for Boston back again,
 And found so well their projects thrive
 That every soul got home alive.

III. THE MIDNIGHT RIDE OF PAUL REVERE

Thanks largely to Longfellow, no episode in the history of the Revolution is more familiar than that of the midnight ride of Paul Revere. Although Revere was not the only messenger to sound the alarm—William Dawes, for example, was across the narrow neck even before Revere shoved off by boat—it is more than the accident of a poetic name that has assured him fame. He was a man of parts: a skillful engraver, a master silversmith, an ardent Patriot, friend to the Adamses and Hancock and Warren. He had been one of the Mohawks who boarded the Dartmouth; and then he had carried the news of the Tea Party to near-by towns; as official courier of the Provincial Congress he had carried the Suffolk Resolves to Philadelphia and gone on many another errand.

The immediate background of Lexington and Concord is, in a way, a comedy of espionage. General Gage had decided to seize military stores at Concord as early as April 15; thanks to an elaborate system of intelligence, the Patriots had wind of this at once, and on the morning of the sixteenth Revere was off to spread the alarm. Gage, in turn, knew that the Patriots had been alerted. It was on his return from Concord on the sixteenth that Revere made the famous agreement for a signal from the steeple of the North Church: one if by land and two if by sea. Gage had determined on the night of the eighteenth for his expedition. Late that night—before the grenadiers were under way—Dr. Warren sent William Dawes across the Boston Neck to Cambridge and Lexington, and arranged for Revere to be rowed over to Charlestown and there mount and spread the alarm. Revere later wrote two accounts of this famous ride, a rather short one in 1783, and a longer one, in a letter to Dr. Jeremy Belknap, in 1798. It is from this second and more circumstantial version that we take our excerpt.

Revere continued to serve as a courier and in many other capacities as well. He seemed to have a special talent for associating himself with historic events: he designed the official seal for the new nation; engraved the first Continental money; cast, in his foundry, the spikes and copper accessories for "Old Ironsides"; and made the copper plate for the dome of the Boston State House, and for the boilers of Robert Fulton's steam ferryboats.

TWO BY WATER AND ONE BY LAND

Paul Revere to Dr. Jeremy Belknap.

In the fall of 1774 and winter of 1775, I was one of upwards of thirty, chiefly mechanics, who formed ourselves into a committee for the purpose of watching the movements of the British soldiers, and gaining every intelligence of the movements of the Tories. We held our meetings at the Green Dragon tavern. We were so careful that our meetings should be kept secret that every time we met, every person swore upon the Bible that they would not discover any of our transactions but to Messrs. Hancock, Adams, Doctors Warren, Church and one or two more.

. . . In the winter, towards the spring, we frequently took turns, two and two, to watch the soldiers by patrolling the streets all night. The Saturday night preceding the 19th of April, about 12 o'clock at night, the boats belonging to the transports were all launched and carried under the sterns of the men-of-war. (They had been previously hauled up and repaired.) We likewise found that the grenadiers and light infantry were all taken off duty.

From these movements we expected something serious was to be transacted. On Tuesday evening, the 18th, it was observed that a number of soldiers were marching towards the bottom of the Common. About 10 o'clock, Dr. Warren sent in great haste for me and begged that I would immediately set off for Lexington, where Messrs. Hancock and Adams were, and acquaint them of the movement, and that it was thought they were the objects.

When I got to Dr. Warren's house, I found he had sent an express by land to Lexington—a Mr. William Daws. The Sunday before, by desire of Dr. Warren, I had been to Lexington, to Messrs. Hancock and Adams, who were at the Rev. Mr. Clark's. I returned at night through Charlestown; there I agreed with a Colonel Conant and some other gentlemen that if the British went out by water, we would show two lanthorns in the North Church steeple; and if by land, one, as a signal; for we were apprehensive it would be difficult to cross the Charles River or get over Boston Neck. I left Dr. Warren, called upon a friend and desired him to make the signals.

I then went home, took my boots and surtout, went to the north part of the town, where I had kept a boat; two friends rowed me across Charles River, a little to the eastward where the Somerset man-of-war lay. It was then young flood, the ship was winding, and the moon was rising. They landed me on the Charlestown side. When I got into town, I met Colonel Conant and several others; they said they had seen our signals. I told them what was acting, and went to get me a horse; I got a horse of Deacon Larkin. While the horse was preparing, Richard Devens, Esq., who was one of the Committee of Safety, came to me and told me that he came down the road from Lexington after sundown that evening; that he met ten British officers, all well mounted, and armed, going up the road.

I set off upon a very good horse; it was then about eleven o'clock and very pleasant. After I had passed Charlestown Neck . . . I saw two men on horseback under a tree. When I got near them, I discovered they were British officers. One tried to get ahead of me, and the other to take me. I turned my horse very quick and galloped towards Charlestown Neck, and then pushed for the Medford Road. The one who chased me, endeavoring to cut me off, got into a clay pond near where Mr. Russell's Tavern is now built. I got clear of him, and went through Medford, over the bridge and up to Menotomy. In Medford, I awaked the captain of the minute men; and after that, I alarmed almost every house, till I got to Lexington. I found Messrs. Hancock and Adams at the Rev. Mr. Clark's; I told them my errand and enquired for Mr. Daws; they said he had not been there; I related the story of the two officers, and supposed that he must have been stopped, as he ought to have been there before me.

After I had been there about half an hour, Mr. Daws came; we refreshed ourselves, and set off for Concord. We were overtaken by a young Dr. Prescott, whom we found to be a high Son of Liberty. I told them of the ten officers that Mr. Devens met, and that it was probable we might be stopped before we got to Concord; for I supposed that after night they divided themselves, and that two of them had fixed themselves in such passages as were most likely to stop any intelligence going to Concord. I likewise mentioned that we had better alarm all the inhabitants till we got to Concord. The young doctor much approved of it and said he would stop with either of us, for the people between that and Concord knew him and would give the more credit to what we said.

We had got nearly half way. Mr. Daws and the doctor stopped to alarm the people of a house. I was about one hundred rods ahead when I saw two men in nearly the same situation as those officers were near Charlestown. I called for the doctor and Mr. Daws to come up. In an instant I was surrounded by four. They had placed themselves in a straight road that inclined each way; they had taken down a pair of bars on the north side of the road, and two of them were under a tree in the pasture. The doctor being foremost, he came up and we tried to get past them; but they being armed with pistols and swords, they forced us into the pasture. The doctor jumped his horse over a low stone wall and got to Concord.

I observed a wood at a small distance and made for that. When I got there, out started six officers on horseback and ordered me to dismount. One of them, who appeared to have the command, examined me, where I came from and what my name was. I told him. He asked me if I was an express. I answered in the affirmative. He demanded what time I left Boston. I told him, and added that their troops had caught aground in passing the river, and that there would be five hundred Americans there in a short time, for I had alarmed the country all the way up. He immediately rode towards those who stopped us, when all five of them came down upon a full gallop. One of them, whom I afterwards found to be a Major Mitchel, of the 5th Regiment, clapped his pistol to my head, called me by name and told me he was going to ask me some questions, and if I did not give him true answers, he would blow my brains out. He then asked me similar questions to those above. He then ordered me to mount my horse, after searching me for arms. He then ordered them to advance and to lead me in front. When we got to the road, they turned down towards Lexington. When we had got about one mile, the major rode up to the officer that was leading me, and told him to give me to the sergeant. As soon as he took me, the major ordered him, if I attempted to run, or anybody insulted them, to blow my brains out.

We rode till we got near Lexington meeting-house, when the militia fired a volley of guns, which appeared to alarm them very much. The major inquired of me how far it was to Cambridge, and if there were any other road.

After some consultation, the major rode up to the sergeant and asked if his horse was tired. He answered him he was—he was a sergeant of grenadiers and had a small horse. “Then,” said he, “take that man’s horse.” I dismounted, and the sergeant mounted my horse, when they all rode towards Lexington meeting-house.

I went across the burying-ground and some pastures and came to the Rev. Mr. Clark’s house, where I found Messrs. Hancock and Adams. I told them of my treatment, and they concluded to go from that house towards Woburn. I went with them and a Mr. Lowell, who was a clerk to Mr. Hancock.

When we got to the house where they intended to stop, Mr. Lowell and myself returned to Mr. Clark’s, to find what was going on. When we got there, an elderly man came in; he said he had just come from the tavern, that a man had come from Boston who said there were no British troops coming. Mr. Lowell and myself went towards the tavern, when we met a man on a full gallop, who told us the troops were coming up the rocks. We afterwards met another, who said they were close by. Mr. Lowell asked me to go to the tavern with him, to get a trunk of papers belonging to Mr. Hancock. We went up chamber, and while we were getting the trunk, we saw the British very near, upon a full march. We hurried towards Mr. Clark’s house. In our way we passed through the militia. There were about fifty. When we had got about one hundred yards from the meeting-house, the British troops appeared on both sides of the meeting-house. In their front was an officer on horseback. They made a short halt; when I saw, and heard, a gun fired, which appeared to be a pistol. Then I could distinguish two guns, and then a continual roar of musketry; when we made off with the trunk.

IV. A TOWN CALLED LEXINGTON

The purpose of Colonel Francis Smith’s expedition was twofold: to apprehend John Hancock and Samuel Adams, reputed to be in Lexington, and to seize arms and military provisions in Concord, six miles west. Even before the redcoats had crossed the Charles the alarm was out, and all during the night there were a tolling of bells and firing of guns which proclaimed that the countryside was aroused. Revere and Dawes reached Lexington a little after midnight, found the two statesmen at the parsonage of the Reverend Jonas Clark—his wife was Hancock’s cousin—and persuaded them to seek safety in flight.

“What a glorious morning this is!” said Sam Adams to Hancock as they made their way across the meadows, and added, “I mean for America.”

At the same time the town bell tolled the alarm, and Captain John Parker and about 70 militiamen rolled out of their beds and assembled on the little triangular village green. As nothing happened the militiamen retired to their homes, or to the Buckman Tavern, with the warning to be on the alert, while Revere and Dawes pushed on toward Concord.

Just before dawn, at about four o’clock, the drums beat the alarm, and once again the militiamen straggled to the common—somewhere between 50 and 70 of them altogether. This time it was the real thing: there was a tramp of feet and English voices barking orders, and out of the dark and the morning mist came the redcoats, six companies of them under Major John Pitcairn. Captain Parker said to his men, "Don't fire unless fired upon. But if they want a war let it begin here"—that, at least, is the way his grandson Theodore Parker heard it. There was a cry, "Disperse, ye rebels!" a pistol shot, two musket shots and a roll of musketry, and the war was on.

The literature of Lexington is voluminous and unsatisfactory. Though Fortescue, the historian of the British Army, says that the question "Who fired the first shot?" is "really of trifling importance," it was not thought trifling at the time. Each side hurried to collect testimonials—a better term than evidence—and as the Americans were more favorably situated here they won the battle of words—and of propaganda. We give here seven accounts, three British and four American, and we give them in order of appearance, as it were. First is an account of the expedition written on April 19 by a British officer, probably Lieutenant John Barker of the King's Own; second, a letter from John Adams—who was not a participant—written the same day; third, a letter from General Gage, brushing the whole thing off as a minor nuisance; fourth, an almost contemporary letter from a seaman, probably John Crozier, master of the Empress of Russia, to his friend Dr. Rogers, of the British Navy; fifth, a semiofficial account of both Lexington and Concord by the ubiquitous Reverend William Gordon of near-by Roxbury, who fancied himself the historian of the Revolution; sixth, the anniversary sermon by the Reverend Jonas Clark who had been an eyewitness of the fray and who had collected testimony during the year; and finally a deposition made half a century later by one of the participants, Sylvanus Wood.

Interestingly enough, the American account of Lexington and Concord reached England before the British. Horace Walpole read it, and on June 5 wrote his friend Sir Horace Mann: "So here is this fatal war commenced!"

*The child that is unborn shall rue
The hunting of that day!"*

1. "FROM BEGINNING TO END ILL PLANNED AND ILL EXECUTED"

Account presumably by Lieutenant John Barker of the King's Own.

1775, April 19th. Last night between 10 and 11 o'clock all the Grenadiers and Light Infantry of the army, making about 600 men (under the command of Lt. Col. Smith of the 10th and Major Pitcairn of the Marines), embarked and were landed upon the opposite shore on Cambridge Marsh; few but the commanding officers knew what expedition we were going upon. After getting over the marsh, where we were wet up to the knees, we were halted in a dirty road and stood there till two o'clock in the morning, waiting for provisions to be brought from the boats and to be divided, and which most of the men threw away, having carried some with 'em. At 2 o'clock we began our march by wading through a very long ford up to our middles. After going a few miles we took 3 or 4 people who were going off to give intelligence.

About 5 miles on this side of a town called Lexington, which lay in our road, we heard there were some hundreds of people collected together intending to oppose us and stop our going on. At 5 o'clock we arrived there and saw a number of people, I believe between 2 and 300, formed in a common in the middle of the town. We still continued advancing, keeping prepared against an attack tho' without intending to attack them; but on our coming near them they fired one or two shots, upon which our men without any orders rushed in upon them, fired and put 'em to flight. Several of them were killed, we could not tell how many because they were got behind walls and into the woods. We had a man of the 10th Light Infantry wounded, nobody else hurt. We then formed on the common, but with some difficulty, the men were so wild they could hear no orders.

We waited a considerable time there, and at length proceeded on our way to Concord, which we then learnt was our destination, in order to destroy a magazine of stores collected there. We met with no interruption till within a mile or two of the town, where the country people had occupied a hill which commanded the road. The Light Infantry were ordered away to the right and ascended the height in one line, upon which the Yankies quitted it without firing, which they did likewise for one or two more successively. They then crossed the river beyond the town, and we marched into the town after taking possession of a hill with a Liberty Pole on it and a flag flying, which was cut down. The Yankies had the hill but left it to us. We expected they would have made a stand there, but they did not chuse it.

While the Grenadiers remained in the town, destroying 3 pieces of cannon, several gun carriages and about 100 barrels of flour with harness and other things, the Light companies were detached beyond the river to examine some houses for more stores. One of these companies was left at the bridge, another on a hill $\frac{1}{4}$ of a mile from that; the other 3 went forward 2 or 3 miles to seek for some cannon which had been there but had been taken away that morning. During this time the people were gathering together in great numbers and, taking advantage of our scattered disposition, seemed as if they were going to cut off the communication with the bridge, upon which the two companies joined and went to the bridge to support that company. The three companies drew up in the road the far side the bridge and the Rebels on the hill above, covered by a wall; in that situation they remained a long time, very near an hour, the three companies expecting to be attacked by the Rebels, who were about 1000 strong. Captn. Lawrie, who commanded these three companies, sent to Col. Smith begging he would send more troops to his assistance and informing him of his situation. The Colonel ordered 2 or 3 companies, but put himself at their head, by which means stopt 'em from being time enough, for being a very fat heavy man he would not have reached the bridge in half an hour, tho' it was not half a mile to it.

In the mean time the Rebels marched into the road and were coming down upon us when Captn. Lawrie made his men retire to this side the bridge (which by the bye he ought to have done at first, and then he would have had time to make a good disposition, but at this time he had not, for the Rebels were got so near him that his people were obliged to form the best way they could). As soon as they were over the bridge the three companies got one behind the other so that only the front one could fire. The Rebels when they got near the bridge halted and fronted, filling the road from the top to the bottom. The fire soon began from a dropping shot on our side, when they and the front company fired almost at the same instant, there being nobody to support the front company. The others not firing, the whole were forced to quit the bridge and return toward Concord. Some of the Grenadiers met 'em in the road and then advanced to meet the Rebels, who had got this side the bridge and on a good height, but seeing the manoeuvre they thought proper to retire again over the bridge. The whole then went into Concord, drew up in the town and waited for the 3 companies that were gone on, which arrived in about an hour. Four officers of 8 who were at the bridge were wounded; 3 men killed; 1 sergt. and several men wounded.

After getting as good conveniences for the wounded as we could, and having done the business we were sent upon, we set out upon our return. Before the whole had quitted the town we were fired on from houses and behind trees, and before we had gone $\frac{1}{2}$ a mile we were fired on from all sides, but mostly from the rear, where people had hid themselves in houses till we had passed, and then fired. The country was an amazing strong one, full of hills, woods, stone walls, etc., which the Rebels did not fail to take advantage of, for they were all lined with people who kept an incessant fire upon us, as we did too upon them, but not with the same advantage, for they were so concealed there was hardly any seeing them. In this way we marched between 9 and 10 miles, their numbers increasing from all parts, while ours was reduced by deaths, wounds and fatigue; and we were totally surrounded with such an incessant fire as it's impossible to conceive; our ammunition was likewise near expended.

In this critical situation we perceived the 1st Brigade coming to our assistance: it consisted of the 4th, 23rd and 47th Regiments, and the battalion of Marines, with two field pieces, 6-pounders. We had been flattered ever since the morning with expectations of the Brigade coming out, but at this time had given up all hopes of it, as it was so late. I since heard it was owing to a mistake of the orders, or the Brigade would have been with us 2 hours sooner. As soon as the Rebels saw this reinforcement, and tasted the field pieces, they retired, and we formed on a rising ground and rested ourselves a little while, which was extremely necessary for our men, who were almost exhausted with fatigue.

In about $\frac{1}{2}$ an hour we marched again, and, some of the Brigade taking the flanking parties, we marched pretty quiet for about 2 miles. They then began to pepper us again from the same sort of places, but at rather a greater distance. We were now obliged to force almost every house in the road, for the Rebels had taken possession of them and galled us exceedingly; but they suffered for their temerity, for all that were found in the houses were put to death.

When we got to Menotomy there was a very heavy fire; after that we took the short cut into the Charles Town road, very luckily for us too, for the Rebels, thinking we should endeavour to return by Cambridge, had broken down the bridge and had a great number of men to line the road and to receive us there. However, we threw them and went on to Charles Town without any great interruption. We got there between 7 and 8 o'clock at night, took possession of the hill above the town, and waited for the boats to carry us over, which came some time after. The Rebels did not chuse to follow us to the hill, as they must have fought us on open ground and that they did not like. The piquets of the army were sent over to Charles Town and zoo of the 64th to keep that ground; they threw up a work to secure themselves, and we embarked and got home very late in the night. . . .

Thus ended this expedition, which from the beginning to end was as ill planned and ill executed as it was possible to be. Had we not idled away three hours on Cambridge Marsh waiting for provisions that were not wanted, we should have had no interruption at Lexington, but by our stay the country people had got intelligence and time to assemble. We should have reached Concord soon after day break, before they could have heard of us, by which we should have destroyed more cannon and stores, which they had had time enough to convey away before our arrival. We might also have got easier back and not been so much harassed, as they would not have had time to assemble so many people; even the people of Salem and Marblehead, above 20 miles off, had intelligence and time enough to march and meet us on our return; they met us somewhere about Menotomy, but they lost a good many for their pains. . . .

Thus for a few trifling stores the Grenadiers and Light Infantry had a march of about 50 miles (going and returning) through an enemy's country, and in all human probability must every man have been cut off if the Brigade had not fortunately come to their assistance; for when the Brigade joined us there were very few men had any ammunition left, and so fatigued that we could not keep flanking parties out, so that we must soon have laid down our arms or been picked off by the Rebels at their pleasure.

2. "A SCENE THE MOST SHOCKING NEW ENGLAND EVER BEHELD"

John Adams to William Barrell.

Yesterday produced a scene the most shocking New England ever beheld. Last Saturday P.M. orders were sent to the several regiments quartered here not to let their Grenadiers or Light Infantry do any duty till further orders, upon which the inhabitants conjectured that some secret expedition was on foot, and being on the look out, they observed those bodies upon the move between ten and eleven o'clock the evening before last, observing a perfect silence in their march towards a point opposite Phip's farm, where [boats?] were in waiting that conveyed 'em over.

The men appointed to alarm the country upon such occasions got over by stealth as early as they [could] and took their different routs. The first advice we had was about eight o'clock in the morning, when it was reported that the troops had fired upon and killed five men in Lexington—previous to which an officer came express to his Excellency Governor Gage, when between eight and nine o'clock a brigade marched out under the command of Earl Percy, consisting of the Marines, the Welch Fusileers, the 4th Regiment, the 47th, and two field pieces.

About twelve o'clock it was gave out by the general's aide camps that no person was killed, and that a single gun had not been fired, which report was variously believed—but between one and two, certain accounts came that eight were killed outright and fourteen wounded of the inhabitants of Lexington—who had about forty men drawn out early in the morning near the meeting house to exercise. The party of the Light Infantry and Grenadiers, to the number of about eight hundred, came up to them and ordered them to disperse. The commander of 'em replied that they were only innocently amusing themselves with exercise, that they had not any ammunition with 'em, and therefore should not molest or disturb them. Which answer not satisfying, the troops fired upon and killed three or four, the others took to their heels and the troops continued to fire. A few took refuge in the meeting, when the soldiers shoved up the windows and pointed their guns in and killed three there. Thus much is best account I can learn of the beginning of this fatal day.

You must naturally suppose that such a piece would rouse the country (allowed the report to be true). The troops continued their march to Concord, entered the town, and refreshed themselves in the meeting and town house. In the latter place they found some ammunition and stores belonging to the country, which they found they could not bring away by reason that the country people had occupied all the posts around 'em. They therefore set fire to the house, which the people extinguished. They set fire a second time, which brought on a general engagement at about eleven o'clock. The troops took two pieces [of] cannon from the peasants, but their numbers increasing they soon regained 'em, and the troops were obliged to retreat towards town.

About noon they were joined by the other brigade under Earl Percy, when another very warm engagement came on at Lexington, which the troops could not stand; therefore were obliged to continue their retreat, which they did with the bravery becoming British soldiers—but the country were in a manner desperate, not regarding their cannon (any more) in the least, and followed 'em till seven in the evening, by which time they got into Charlestown, when they left off the pursuit, lest they might injure the inhabitants.

I stood upon the hills in town and saw the engagement very plain. It was very bloody for seven hours. It's conjectured that one half the soldiers at least were killed.

The last brigade was sent over the ferry in the evening to secure their retreat—where they are this morning entrenching themselves upon Bunker's Hill [to] get a safe retreat to this town. It's impossible to learn any particulars, as the communication between town and country is at present broken off. They were till ten o'clock last night bringing over their wounded, several of which are since [dead], two officers in particular.

When I reflect and consider that the fight was between those whose parents but a few generations ago were brothers, I shudder at the thought, and there's no knowing where our calamities will end.

3. "NOTHING BUT AN AFFAIR THAT HAPPENED HERE ON THE NINETEENTH"

Thomas Gage to Lord Barrington, Secretary of War.

Boston, April 22, 1775

... I have now nothing to trouble your Lordship with, but of an affair that happened here on the 19th instant. I have intelligence of a large quantity of military stores being collected at Concord, for the avowed purpose of supplying a body of troops to act in opposition to his Majesty's Government, I gott the Grenadiers and Light Infantry out of town, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Smith of the 10th Regiment, and Major Pitcairne of the Marines, with as much secrecy as possible, on the 18th at night, and with orders to destroy the said military stores, and supported them the next morning by eight companys of the 4th, the same number of the 23d, 47th and Marines under the command of Lord Percy. It appears from the firing of alarm guns and ringing of bells that the march of Lieutenant Colonel Smith was discovered, and he was opposed by a body of men within six miles of Concord; some few of whom first began to fire upon his advanced companys, which brought on a fire from the troops that dispersed the body opposed to them, and they proceeded to Concord, where they destroyed all the military stores they could find.

On the return of the troops, they were attacked from all quarters where any cover was to be found, from whence it was practicable to annoy them; and they were so fatigued with their march that it was with difficulty they could keep out their flanking partys to remove the enemy at a distance, so that they were at length a good deal pressed. Lord Percy then arrived oppertunely to their assistance with his brigade and two pieces of cannon. And notwithstanding a continual skirmish for the space of fifteen miles, receiving fire from every hill, fence, house, barn, etc., His Lordship kept the enemy off and brought the troops to Charles Town, from whence they were ferried over to Boston.

Too much praise cannot be given to Lord Percy for his remarkable activity and conduct during the whole day. Lieutenant Col. Smith and Major Pitcairne did everything men could do, as did all the officers in general, and the men behaved with their usual intrepidity.

4. "THE FATIGUE OUR PEOPLE PASSED THROUGH CAN HARDLY BE BELIEVED"

John Crozier (?) to Dr. Rogers.

Empress of Russia, Boston, April 23, 1775

... On the 18th instant between 11 and 12 o'clock at night I conducted all the boats of the fleet (as well men a war as transports) to the back part of Boston, where I received the Granadiers and Light Infantry amounting to 850 officers and men and landed them on a point of marsh or mudland which is overflowed with the last quarter flood; this service, I presume to say, was performed with secrecy and quietness, having oars muffled and every necessary precaution taken, but the watchful inhabitants whose houses are intermixed with the soldiers barracks heard the troops arms and from thence concluded that something was going on, tho they could not conceive how or where directed. In consequence of this conception, a light was shown at the top of a church stiple directing those in the country to be on their guard.

The intention of this expedition was to distroy some guns and provision which were collected near Concord, a town 20 miles from where the troops were landed. Colonel Smith, a gallant old officer, commanded this detachment and performed the above service. A firelock was snapt over a wall by one of the country people but did not go off. The next who pulled his triger wounded one of the Light Infantry company of General Hodgsons of the Kings Own. The fire then commenced and fell heavy on our troops, the militia having posted them selves behind walls, in houses and woods and had possession of almost every eminence or rising ground which commanded the long vale through which the King's troops were under the disagreeable necessity of passing in their return.

Colonel Smith was wounded early in the action and must have been cut off with all those he commanded had not Earl Percy come to his relief with the First Brigade; on the appearance of it our almost conquered Granadiers and Light Infantry gave three cheers and renewed the defence with more spirits.

Lord Percys courage and good conduct on this occasion must do him immortal honour. Upon taking the command he ordered the King's Own to flank on the right, and the 27th on the left, the Royal Welsh Fuseliers to defend the rear, and in this manner retreated for at least 11 miles before he reached Charlestown—for they could not cross at Cambridge where the bridge is, they having tore it up, and filled the town and houses with armed men to prevent his passage; our loss in this small essay amounts to 250 killed, wounded and missing. And we are at present kept up in Boston, they being in possession of Roxbury, a little village just before our lines with the Royal and Rebel centenels within musquet shot of each other.

The fatigue which our people passed through the day which I have described can hardly be believed, having marched at least 45 miles and the Light Companys perhaps 60. A most amiable young man of General Hodgsons's fell that day, his name Knight, brother to Knight of the 43 who was with us at Jamaica.

The enthuseastic zeal with which those people have behaved must convince every reasonable man what a difficult and unpleasant task General Gage has before him. Even weamin had firelocks. One was seen to fire a blunder bus between her father and husband, from their windows; there they three with an infant child soon suffered the fury of the day. In another house which was long defended by 8 resolute fellows the Grenadiers at last got possession when, after having run their bayonets into 7, the 8th continued to abuse them with all the moat like roge [rage] of a true Cromwellian, and but a moment before he quitted this world applied such epethets as I must leave unmentioned. God of his infinite mercy be pleased to restore peace and unanimity to those countrys again, for I never did nor can think that arms will enforce obedience. . . .

The number of the country people who fired on our troops might be about 5 thousand, ranged along from Concord to Charlestown, but not less than 20 thousand were that day under arms and on the march to join the others. Their loss we find to be nearly on a footing with our own.

Three days have now passed without communication with the country; three more will reduce this town to a most unpleasant situation; for there dependence for provision was from day to day on supply from the country; that ceasing you may conceive the consequences. Preparations are now making on both sides the Neck for attacking and defending. The Hampshire and Connecticut Militia have joined so that Rebel army are now numerous. Collins is well and stationed between Charles Town and the end of this town to assist in the defence. The General and Earl Percy shall have the perusal of your letter. . . .

5. "YOU DAMNED REBELS, LAY DOWN YOUR ARMS!"

My Dear Sir: . . . On the first of the night, when it was very dark, the detachment, consisting of all the Grenadiers and Light Infantry, the flower of the army, to the amount of eight hundred or better, officers included, the companies having been filled up, and several of the inimical torified natives repaired to the boats and got into them just as the moon rose, crossed the water, landed on Cambridge side, took through a private way to avoid discovery, and therefore had to go through some places up to their thighs in water. They made a quick march of it to Lexington about thirteen miles from Charlestown, and got there by half an hour after four.

Here I must pause again, to acquaint you that in the morning of the 19th, before we had breakfasted, between eight and nine, the whole neighbourhood was in alarm; the minute-men (so called from their having agreed to turn out at a minute's warning) were collecting together; we had an account that the Regulars had killed six of our men at Lexington; the country was in an uproar; another detachment was coming out of Boston, and I was desired to take care of myself and partner. . . .

Soon after the affair, knowing what untruths are propagated by each party in matters of this nature, I concluded that I would ride to Concord, inquire for myself and not rest upon the depositions that might be taken by others. Accordingly I went last week. . . .

Before Major Pitcairn arrived at Lexington signal guns had been fired, and the bells had been rung to give the alarm; but let not the sound of bells lead you to think of a ring of bells like what you hear in England; for they are only small-sized bells (one in a parish), just sufficient to notify to the people the time for attending worship, etc. Lexington being alarmed, the train band or Militia and the alarm men (consisting of the aged and others exempted from turning out, excepting upon an alarm) repaired in general to the common, close in with the meeting-house, the usual place of parade; and there were present when the roll was called over about one hundred and thirty of both, as I was told by Mr. Daniel Harrington, clerk to the company, who further said that the night being chilly, so as to make it uncomfortable being upon the parade, they having received no certain intelligence of the Regulars being upon their march, and being waiting for the same, the men were dismissed, to appear again at the beat of drum. Some who lived near went home, others to the publick house at the corner of the common.

Upon information being received, about half an hour after, that the troops were not far off, the remains of the company who were at hand collected together, to the amount of about sixty or seventy, by the time the Regulars appeared, but were chiefly in a confused state, only a few of them being drawn up, which accounts for other witnesses making the number less, about thirty. There were present as spectators about forty more, scarce any of whom had arms. . . .

The simple truth I take to be this, which I received from one of the prisoners at Concord in free conversation, one James Marr, a native of Aberdeen, in Scotland. . . . They were met by three men on horseback before they got to the meeting-house a good way; an officer bid them stop; to which it was answered, "You had better turn back, for you shall not enter the town"; when the said three persons rode back again, and at some distance one of them offered to fire, but the piece flashed in the pan without going off. I asked Marr whether he could tell if the piece was designed at the soldiers, or to give an alarm. He could not say which. The said Marr further declared that when they and the others were advanced, Major Pitcairn said to the Lexington Company (which by the by was the only one there), "Stop, you rebels!" and he supposed that the design was to take away their arms; but upon seeing the Regulars they dispersed, and a firing commenced, but who fired first he could not say. . . .

I shall not trouble you with more particulars, but give you the substance as it lies in my own mind, collected from the persons whom I examined for my own satisfaction. The Lexington Company upon seeing the troops, and being of themselves so unequal a match for them, were deliberating for a few moments what they should do, when several dispersing of their own heads, the captain soon ordered the rest to disperse for their own safety. Before the order was given, three or four of the regular officers, seeing the company as they came up on the rising ground on this side the meeting, rode forward one or more round the meeting-house, leaving it on the right hand, and so came upon them that way. Upon coming up one cried out, "You damned rebels, lay down your arms"; another, "Stop, you rebels"; a third, "Disperse, you rebels," etc. Major Pitcairn, I suppose, thinking himself justified by Parliamentary authority to consider them as rebels, perceiving that they did not actually lay down their arms, observing that the generality were getting off, while a few continued in their military position, and apprehending there could be no great hurt in killing a few such Yankees, which might probably, according to the notions that had been instilled into him by the tory party of the Americans being poltrons, end all the contest, gave the command to fire, then fired his own pistol, and so set the whole affair agoing.

6. "FIRE! BY GOD, FIRE!"

From a sermon by the Reverend Jonas Clark, pastor of the church in Lexington.

Between the hours of twelve and one, on the morning of the nineteenth of April, we received intelligence, by express, from the Honorable Joseph Warren, Esq., at Boston, "that a large body of the king's troops (supposed to be a brigade of about 12 or 1500) were embarked in boats from Boston, and gone over to land on Lechmere's Point (so called) in Cambridge; and that it was shrewdly suspected that they were ordered to seize and destroy the stores belonging to the colony, then deposited at Concord." . . .

Upon this intelligence, as also upon information of the conduct of the officers as above-mentioned, the militia of this town were alarmed and ordered to meet on the usual place of parade; not with any design of commencing hostilities upon the king's troops, but to consult what might be done for our own and the people's safety; and also to be ready for whatever service providence might call us out to, upon this alarming occasion, in case overt acts of violence or open hostilities should be committed by this mercenary band of armed and blood-thirsty oppressors. . . .

The militia met according to order and waited the return of the messengers, that they might order their measures as occasion should require. Between 3 and 4 o'clock, one of the expresses returned, informing that there was no appearance of the troops on the roads either from Cambridge or Charlestown; and that it was supposed that the movements in the army the evening before were only a feint to alarm the people. Upon this, therefore, the militia company were dismissed for the present, but with orders to be within call of the drum—waiting the return of the other messenger, who was expected in about an hour, or sooner, if any discovery should be made of the motions of the troops. But he was prevented by their silent and sudden arrival at the place where he was waiting for intelligence. So that, after all this precaution, we had no notice of their approach till the brigade was actually in the town and upon a quick march within about a mile and a quarter of the meeting house and place of parade.

However, the commanding officer thought best to call the company together, not with any design of opposing so superior a force, much less of commencing hostilities, but only with a view to determine what to do, when and where to meet, and to dismiss and disperse.

Accordingly, about half an hour after four o'clock, alarm guns were fired, and the drums beat to arms, and the militia were collecting together. Some, to the number of about 50 or 60, or possibly more, were on the parade, others were coming towards it. In the mean time, the troops having thus stolen a march upon us and, to prevent any intelligence of their approach, having seized and held prisoners several persons whom they met unarmed upon the road, seemed to come determined for murder and bloodshed—and that whether provoked to it or not! When within about half a quarter of a mile of the meeting-house, they halted, and the command was given to prime and load, which being done, they marched on till they came up to the east end of said meeting-house, in sight of our militia (collecting as aforesaid) who were about 12 or 13 rods distant.

Immediately upon their appearing so suddenly and so nigh, Capt. Parker, who commanded the militia company, ordered the men to disperse and take care of themselves, and not to fire. Upon this, our men dispersed—but many of them not so speedily as they might have done, not having the most distant idea of such brutal barbarity and more than savage cruelty from the troops of a British king, as they immediately experienced! For, no sooner did they come in sight of our company, but one of them, supposed to be an officer of rank, was heard to say to the troops, "Damn them! We will have them!" Upon which the troops shouted aloud, huzza'd, and rushed furiously towards our men.

About the same time, three officers (supposed to be Col. Smith, Major Pitcairn and another officer) advanced on horse back to the front of the body, and coming within 5 or 6 rods of the militia, one of them cried out, "Ye villains, ye Rebels, disperse! Damn you, disperse!"—or words to this effect. One of them (whether the same or not is not easily determined) said, "Lay down your arms! Damn you, why don't you lay down your arms?" The second of these officers, about this time, fired a pistol towards the militia as they were dispersing. The foremost, who was within a few yards of our men, brandishing his sword and then pointing towards them, with a loud voice said to the troops, "Fire! By God, fire!"—which was instantly followed by a discharge of arms from the said troops, succeeded by a very heavy and close fire upon our party, dispersing, so long as any of them were within reach. Eight were left dead upon the ground! Ten were wounded. The rest of the company, through divine goodness, were (to a miracle) preserved unhurt in this murderous action! . . .

One circumstance more before the brigade quitted Lexington, I beg leave to mention, as what may give a further specimen of the spirit and character of the officers and men of this body of troops. After the militia company were dispersed and the firing ceased, the troops drew up and formed in a body on the common, fired a volley and gave three huzzas, by way of triumph and as expressive of the joy of victory and glory of conquest! Of this transaction, I was a witness, having, at that time, a fair view of their motions and being at the distance of not more than 70 or 80 rods from them.

7. "PARKER FORMED US IN SINGLE FILE"

A minuteman's account of Lexington.

I, Sylvanus Wood, of Woburn, in the county of Middlesex, and commonwealth of Massachusetts, aged seventy-four years, do testify and say that on the morning of the 19th of April, 1775, I was an inhabitant of Woburn, living with Deacon Obadiah Kendall; that about an hour before the break of day on said morning, I heard the Lexington bell ring, and fearing there was difficulty there, I immediately arose, took my gun and, with Robert Douglass, went in haste to Lexington, which was about three miles distant.

When I arrived there, I inquired of Captain Parker, the commander of the Lexington company, what was the news. Parker told me he did not know what to believe, for a man had come up about half an hour before and informed him that the British troops were not on the road. But while we were talking, a messenger came up and told the captain that the British troops were within half a mile. Parker immediately turned to his drummer, William Diman, and ordered him to beat to arms, which was done. Captain Parker then asked me if I would parade with his company. I told him I would. Parker then asked me if the young man with me would parade. I spoke to Douglass, and he said he would follow the captain and me.

By this time many of the company had gathered around the captain at the hearing of the drum, where we stood, which was about half way between the meeting-house and Buckman's tavern. Parker says to his men, "Every man of you, who is equipped, follow me; and those of you who are not equipped, go into the meeting-house and furnish yourselves from the magazine, and immediately join the company." Parker led those of us who were equipped to the north end of Lexington Common, near the Bedford Road, and formed us in single file. I was stationed about in the centre of the company. While we were standing, I left my place and went from one end of the company to the other and counted every man who was paraded, and the whole number was thirty-eight, and no more.

Just as I had finished and got back to my place, I perceived the British troops had arrived on the spot between the meeting-house and Buckman's, near where Captain Parker stood when he first led off his men. The British troops immediately wheeled so as to cut off those who had gone into the meeting-house. The British troops approached us rapidly in platoons, with a general officer on horseback at their head. The officer came up to within about two rods of the centre of the company, where I stood, the first platoon being about three rods distant. They there halted. The officer then swung his sword, and said, "Lay down your arms, you damned rebels, or you are all dead men. Fire!" Some guns were fired by the British at us from the first platoon, but no person was killed or hurt, being probably charged only with powder.

Just at this time, Captain Parker ordered every man to take care of himself. The company immediately dispersed; and while the company was dispersing and leaping over the wall, the second platoon of the British fired and killed some of our men. There was not a gun fired by any of Captain Parker's company, within my knowledge. I was so situated that I must have known it, had any thing of the kind taken place before a total dispersion of our company. I have been intimately acquainted with the inhabitants of Lexington, and particularly with those of Captain Parker's company, and, with one exception, I have never heard any of them say or pretend that there was any firing at the British from Parker's company, or any individual in it, until within a year or two. One member of the company told me, many years since, that, after Parker's company had dispersed, and he was at some distance, he gave them "the guts of his gun." . . .

V. CONCORD

After Lexington, Concord. By the time Major Pitcairn was ready to move on, Colonel Smith had brought up the rest of his forces, and the reinforced column pushed into Concord, swept aside American resistance and destroyed such stores as they could find. But by now the countryside was thoroughly aroused, and minutemen were pouring into Concord from every near-by town and village and farm. How the Americans held the North Bridge; how they counterattacked and drove the exhausted redcoats pell-mell down the road toward Boston; how the British were rescued, at Lexington, by a strong relief column under Lord Percy; how they tramped sullenly back to Boston, while the Americans shot at them from behind stone walls, trees and houses; how they finally reached haven with casualties of 250 and retired to lick their wounds—all this is so familiar it has become part of American legend.

The story of Concord is told here by the Reverend William Emerson, grandfather of the more famous Emerson who wrote "Concord Bridge." The account of the retreat comes fresh from the diary of Lieutenant Frederick Mackenzie of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers, one of the liveliest and most perceptive of British diarists. Lord Percy's brief account is an official report. Captain Evelyn's letter is included more for what it tells of the British military mentality than of Concord.

1. WILLIAM EMERSON DESCRIBES THE STAND AT CONCORD BRIDGE

1775, 19 April. This morning, between 1 and 2 o'clock, we were alarmed by the ringing of the bell, and upon examination found that the troops, to the number of 800, had stole their march from Boston, in boats and barges, from the bottom of the Common over to a point in Cambridge, near to Inman's farm, and were at Lexington Meeting-house, half an hour before sunrise, where they had fired upon a body of our men, and (as we afterward heard) had killed several.

This intelligence was brought us at first by Dr. Samuel Prescott, who narrowly escaped the guard that were sent before on horses, purposely to prevent all posts and messengers from giving us timely information. He, by the help of a very fleet horse, crossing several walls and fences, arrived at Concord at the time above mentioned; when several posts were immediately despatched, that returning confirmed the account of the regulars' arrival at Lexington, and that they were on their way to Concord.

Upon this, a number of our minute men belonging to this town, and Acton and Lyncoln, with several others that were in readiness, marched out to meet them, while the alarm company were preparing to receive them in the town. Capt. Minot, who commanded them, thought it proper to take possession of the hill above the meeting-house, as the most advantageous situation. No sooner had our men gained it than we were met by the companies that were sent out to meet the troops, who informed us that they were just upon us, and that we must retreat, as their number was more than treble ours.

We then retreated from the hill near the Liberty Pole and took a new post back of the town upon an eminence, where we formed into two battalions and waited the arrival of the enemy. Scarcely had we formed before we saw the British troops at the distance of a quarter of a mile, glittering in arms, advancing towards us with the greatest celerity. Some were for making a stand, notwithstanding the superiority of their number; but others more prudent thought best to retreat till our strength should be equal to the enemy's by recruits from neighboring towns that were continually coming to our assistance.

Accordingly we retreated over the bridge, when the troops came into the town, set fire to several carriages for the artillery, destroyed 60 barrels flour, rifled several houses, took possession of the town-house, destroyed 500 lb. of balls, set a guard of 100 men at the North Bridge, and sent up a party to the house of Col. Barrett, where they were in expectation of finding a quantity of warlike stores. But these were happily secured just before their arrival, by transportation into the woods and other by-places.

In the meantime, the guard set by the enemy to secure the pass at the North Bridge were alarmed by the approach of our people, who had retreated, as mentioned before, and were now advancing with special orders not to fire upon the troops unless fired upon. These orders were so punctually observed that we received the fire of the enemy in three several and separate discharges of their pieces before it was returned by our commanding officer; the firing then soon became general for several minutes, in which skirmish two were killed on each side, and several of the enemy wounded.

It may here be observed, by the way, that we were the more cautious to prevent beginning a rupture with the King's troops, as we were then uncertain what had happened at Lexington, and knew [not?] that they had begun the quarrel there by first firing upon our people and killing eight men upon the spot.

The three companies of troops soon quitted their post at the bridge and retreated in the greatest disorder and confusion to the main body, who were soon upon the march to meet them. For half an hour, the enemy, by their marches and countermarches, discovered great fickleness and inconstancy of mind, sometimes advancing, sometimes returning to their former posts; till at length they quitted the town and retreated by the way they came. In the meantime, a party of our men (150) took the back way through the Great Fields into the east quarter and had placed themselves to advantage, lying in ambush behind walls, fences and buildings, ready to fire upon the enemy on their retreat.

2. GENERAL PERCY TO THE RESCUE!

From the diary of Lieutenant Frederick Mackenzie.

19 April. At 7 o'clock this morning a brigade order was received by our regiment, dated at 6 o'clock, for the 1st Brigade to assemble at ½ past 7 on the grand parade. We accordingly assembled the regiment with the utmost expedition, and with the 4th and 47th were on the parade at the hour appointed, with one days provisions. By some mistake the Marines did not receive the order until the other regiments of the brigade were assembled, by which means it was half past 8 o'clock before the brigade was ready to march. Here we understood that we were to march out of town to support the troops that went out last night.

A quarter before 9, we marched in the following order: advanced guard of a captain and 50 men; 2 six-pounders, 4th Regiment, 47th Regiment, 1st Battalion of Marines, 23rd Regiment or Royal Welch Fusiliers; rear guard of a captain and 50 men; the whole under the command of Brigadier General Earl Percy. We went out of Boston by the Neck and marched thro' Roxbury, Cambridge and Menotomy, towards Lexington. In all the places we marched through, and in the houses on the road, few or no people were to be seen; and the houses were in general shut up.

When we arrived near Lexington, some persons who came from Concord informed that the Grenadiers and Light Infantry were at that place, and that some persons had been killed and wounded by them early in the morning at Lexington. As we pursued our march, about 2 o'clock we heard some straggling shots fired about a mile in our front. As we advanced we heard the firing plainer and more frequent, and at half after 2, being near the church at Lexington, and the fire encreasing, we were ordered to form the line, which was immediately done by extending on each side of the road, but by reason of the stone walls and other obstructions it was not formed in so regular a manner as it should have been. The Grenadiers and Light Infantry were at this time retiring towards Lexington, fired upon by the Rebels, who took every advantage the face of the country afforded them. As soon as the Grenadiers and Light Infantry perceived the 1st Brigade drawn up for their support, they shouted repeatedly, and the firing ceased for a short time.

The ground we first formed upon was something elevated and commanded a view of that before us for about a mile, where it was terminated by some pretty high grounds covered with wood. The village of Lexington lay between both parties. We could observe a considerable number of the Rebels, but they were much scattered, and not above 50 of them to be seen in a body in any place. Many lay concealed behind the stone walls and fences. They appeared most numerous in the road near the church, and in a wood in the front, and on the left flank of the line where our regiment was posted. A few cannon shot were fired at those on and near the road, which dispersed them.

The flank companies now retired and formed behind the brigade, which was soon fired upon by the Rebels most advanced. A brisk fire was returned, but without much effect. As there was a piece of open morassy ground in front of the left of our regiment, it would have been difficult to have passed it under the fire of the Rebels from behind the trees and walls on the other side. Indeed no part of the brigade was ordered to advance; we therefore drew up near the morass, in expectation of orders how to act, sending an officer for one of the 6-pounders. During this time the Rebels endeavored to gain our flanks, and crept into the covered ground on either side and as close as they could in front, firing now and then in perfect security. We also advanced a few of our best marksmen who fired at those who shewed themselves.

About $\frac{1}{4}$ past 3, Earl Percy having come to a resolution of returning to Boston, and having made his disposition for that purpose, our regiment received orders to form the rear guard. We immediately lined the walls and other cover in our front with some marksmen, and retired from the right of companies by files to the high ground a small distance in our rear, where we again formed in line, and remained in that position for near half an hour, during which time the flank companies and the other regiments of the brigade began their march in one column on the road towards Cambridge.

As the country for many miles round Boston and in the neighbourhood of Lexington and Concord had by this time had notice of what was doing, as well by the firing as from expresses which had been [sent] from Boston and the adjacent places in all directions, numbers of armed men on foot and on horseback were continually coming from all parts guided by the fire, and before the column had advanced a mile on the road, we were fired at from all quarters, but particularly from the houses on the roadside, and the adjacent stone walls. Several of the troops were killed and wounded in this way, and the soldiers were so enraged at suffering from an unseen enemy that they forced open many of the houses from which the fire proceeded, and put to death all those found in them. Those houses would certainly have been burnt had any fire been found in them, or had there been time to kindle any; but only three or four near where we first formed suffered in this way.

As the troops drew nearer to Cambridge the number and fire of the Rebels increased, and altho they did not shew themselves openly in a body in any part, except on the road in our rear, our men threw away their fire very inconsiderately and without being certain of its effect; this emboldened them and induced them to draw nearer, but whenever a cannon shot was fired at any considerable number, they instantly dispersed.

Our regiment, having formed the rear guard for near 7 miles and expended a great part of its ammunition, was then relieved by the Marines which was the next battalion in the column. . . .

During the whole of the march from Lexington the Rebels kept an incessant irregular fire from all points at the column, which was the more galling as our flanking parties, which at first were placed at sufficient distances to cover the march of it, were at last, from the different obstructions they occasionally met with, obliged to keep almost close to it. Our men had very few opportunities of getting good shots at the Rebels, as they hardly ever fired but under cover of a stone wall, from behind a tree, or out of a house; and the moment they had fired they lay down out of sight until they had loaded again or the column had passed. In the road indeed in our rear, they were most numerous and came on pretty close, frequently calling out, "King Hancock forever!"

Many of them were killed in the houses on the road side from whence they fired; in some of them 7 or 8 men were destroyed. Some houses were forced open in which no person could be discovered, but when the column had passed, numbers sallied out from some place in which they had lain concealed, fired at the rear guard, and augmented the number which followed us. If we had had time to set fire to those houses many Rebels must have perished in them, but as night drew on Lord Percy thought it best to continue the march. Many houses were plundered by the soldiers, notwithstanding the efforts of the officers to prevent it. I have no doubt this inflamed the Rebels, and made many of them follow us farther than they would otherwise have done. By all accounts some soldiers who staid too long in the houses were killed in the very act of plundering by those who lay concealed in them. We brought in about ten prisoners, some of whom were taken in arms. One or two more were killed on the march, while prisoners, by the fire of their own people.

Few or no women or children were to be seen throughout the day. As the country had undoubted intelligence that some troops were to march out, and the Rebels were probably determined to attack them, it is generally supposed they had previously removed their families from the neighbourhood. . . .

3. "NOT A STONE WALL WHENCE THE REBELS DID NOT FIRE UPON US"

Boston, 20 April, 1775

Sir—In obedience to your Excellency's orders I marched yesterday morning at 9 o'clock, with the First Brigade and 2 field-pieces, in order to cover the retreat of the Grenadiers and Light Infantry, on their return from the expedition to Concord.

As all the houses were shut up and there was not the appearance of a single inhabitant, I could get no intelligence concerning them till I had passed Menotomy, when I was informed that the Rebels had attacked His Majesty's troops, who were retiring, overpowered by numbers, greatly exhausted and fatigued, and having expended almost all their ammunition. And about 2 o'clock I met them retiring through the town of Lexington.

I immediately ordered the 2 fieldpieces to fire at the Rebels, and drew up the brigade on a height. The shot from the cannon had the desired effect and stopped the Rebels for a little time, who immediately dispersed and endeavoured to surround us, being very numerous. As it began now to grow pretty late, and we had 15 miles to retire, and only our 36 rounds, I ordered the Grenadiers and Light Infantry to move off first, and covered them with my brigade, sending out very strong flanking parties, which were absolutely necessary, as there was not a stone-wall or house, though before in appearance evacuated, from whence the Rebels did not fire upon us.

As soon as they saw us begin to retire, they pressed very much upon our rear-guard, which for that reason I relieved every now and then. In this manner we retired for 15 miles under an incessant fire all round us, till we arrived at Charlestown between 7 and 8 in the even, very much fatigued with a march of above 30 miles, and having expended almost all our ammunition.

We had the misfortune of losing a good many men in the retreat, tho' nothing like the number which, from many circumstances, I have reason to believe were killed of the Rebels.

His Majesty's troops during the whole of the affair behaved with their usual intrepidity and spirit. Nor were they a little exasperated at the cruelty and barbarity of the Rebels who scalped and cut off the ears of some of the wounded men who fell into their hands.

4. "THE MOST ABSOLUTE COWARDS ON THE FACE OF THE EARTH"

Boston, April 23rd, 1775

My Dear Sir—It is impossible but you must hear an account, and probably a most exaggerated one, of the little fracas that happened here a few days ago, between us and the Yankee scoundrels. Our bickerings and heartburnings, as might naturally be expected, came at length to blows, and both sides have lost some men. Were you not to hear from me on the occasion, you might imagine I was hurt; at least, you expect from me some account of the affair. The rebels, you know, have of a long time been making preparations as if to frighten us, though we always imagined they were too great cowards ever to presume to do it; but though they are the most absolute cowards on the face of the earth, yet they are just now worked up to such a degree of enthusiasm and madness that they are easily persuaded the Lord is to assist them in whatever they undertake, and that they must be invincible. . . .

The loss of the rebels cannot be ascertained, but we have reason to think several hundreds were killed. Our regiment had four or five men killed, and about twenty-four wounded. Of the whole, about seventy killed, and 150 wounded; among which last were several officers. . . .

—SCULL, ed., Memoir and Letters of Captain Evelyn, pp. 53-55.

VI. SOUNDING THE ALARM

The minutemen who had rallied at Lexington and Concord and harassed the British all the way back to Boston were courageous but neither efficient nor resourceful. They were fresh, they outnumbered the British two to one, they were not encumbered with accouterments or baggage; they enjoyed all the advantages of fighting from behind shelter. Yet they exacted comparatively few casualties: almost 4,000 militiamen, firing all day long, managed to score less than 300 hits! Had they at any time organized a force to break the British column in two, or had they even managed to throw up road blocks, they might well have destroyed or captured the enemy. Lord Percy's achievement in bringing back the expedition almost intact was a brilliant one.

When the British stumbled into Charlestown, in the evening of the nineteenth, they were not only exhausted but defeated. The defeat, as it turned out, was not so much military as political and moral. For Lexington and Concord was what the Patriots had been waiting for. The British had taken the offensive; the British had fired the first shot. Not only this but the British had been guilty of atrocities to boot—arson and pillage and rapine and murder. All this the Americans alleged, and doubtless believed. We think of propaganda as a modern development, but there is very little that our generation could teach the Patriots of 1775 about propaganda. The Massachusetts Committee of Safety hurried its version over to England, and broadcast it throughout the colonies. Never before had news traveled so fast. Israel Bissel, a regular postrider, was off on the morning of the nineteenth with the stirring tale; that noon—so legend has it—he reached Worcester, and his horse fell dead. The next day he was in New London. Then on to New Haven, and by the twenty-third he had reached New York. Within a few hours he rode on through New Jersey and reached Philadelphia the next day. Other couriers sped the news to New Hampshire, to western Massachusetts, to the Hudson Valley and the Hampshire Grants.

Couriers carried not only news of the fateful day, but appeals for help.

"We conjure you by all that is sacred"—so read the appeals to the towns of Massachusetts, to Connecticut, to the Providence Plantations, and all the way south. The appeals were scarcely necessary. Already the minutemen were on their way to Cambridge, and even before the provincial legislatures or the committees of safety had acted, the army outside Boston had grown by thousands. A New Hampshire contingent marched 55 miles in 18 hours, reaching Cambridge by sunrise of the twenty-first; Benedict Arnold, erstwhile druggist and merchant, led his company from New Haven without delay and arrived April 29. Ezra Stiles—later President of Yale—tells us how the news reached Providence, and how the Plantations responded. Meantime Massachusetts voted to call for an army of 30,000; Connecticut provided for 6,000; New Hampshire added another 2,000; Rhode Island sent three regiments. And back in England the Lords gravely argued the impossibility of raising soldiers in Britain, and the necessity of recruiting from Russia or the Germanies.

Everywhere the news of Lexington and Concord strengthened the hands and fired the hearts of the Patriots. In reluctant New York the radicals seized British military stores and organized to place the colony alongside its sisters. A letter from an anonymous lady of Philadelphia describes how that city responded to the challenge. In Charleston the Provincial Congress promptly raised two regiments of infantry and a third of rangers, and voted £140,000 in bills of credit for the forthcoming contest. Even little frontier Georgia joined in by raising a liberty pole on the King's birthday and sending a shipment of rice to the Bostonians.

"A general rebellion throughout America is coming on suddenly and swiftly," wrote Governor Wright of Georgia. It was, indeed, but Gage and Howe were blind to the significance of it. They still thought that a little firmness would settle the whole matter. General Howe, who reached Boston late in May, wrote that things would not improve until the American armies should be roughly dealt with; he had no doubt of his ability to get rough. General Gage persisted in thinking that he could somehow win back the Americans—all but Hancock and Sam Adams, anyway, who were forever damned. And back in England King George, who had said that blows would decide, had nothing now to recommend but more blows.

1. ISRAEL BISSEL CARRIES THE NEWS OF LEXINGTON AND CONCORD

Alarm sent by Committee of Watertown, Massachusetts.

April 19, 1775

Wednesday Morning near 11 O'clock

To all friends of American liberty, be it known that this morning before break of day, a brigade, consisting of about 1000 or 1200 men, landed at Phipp's farm at Cambridge and marched to Lexington, where they found a company of our militia in arms, upon whom they fired without any provocation and killed 6 men and wounded 4 others. By an express from Boston we find another brigade are now upon their march from Boston supposed to be about 1000. The bearer Israel Bissel is charged to alarm the country quite to Connecticut, and all persons are desired to furnish him with fresh horses, as they may be needed. I have spoken with several who have seen the dead and wounded.

Since the above received the following by second express:

Sir

I am this moment informed by express from Woodstock, taken from the mouth of the express that arrived there 2 o'clock afternoon, that the contest between the First Brigade that marched on Concord was still continuing this morning at the town of Lexington, to which brigade had retreated.

That another brigade said to be the Second, mentioned in the letter of this morning, had landed with a quantity of artillery, at the place where the First did. The Provincials were determined to prevent the two brigades from joining their strength if possible, and remain in great need of succor.

—N.B. The Regulars, when in Concord, burnt the court house, took 2 pieces of cannon, which they rendered useless and began to take up Concord Bridge, on which Capt. — (who with many on both sides were soon killed) made an attack on the King's troops, when they retreated to Lexington.

I am, Sir

EB WILLIAMS

Col Obadiah, Canterbury

P.S. Mr. McFarland of Plainfield, Mass., has just returned from Boston by way of Providence, who conversed with an express from Lexington, who further informs that 4000 of our troops had surrounded the First Brigade who were on a hill in Lexington. That the action continued and there were about 50 of our men killed and 150 Regulars as near as they could determine when the express came away. It will be expedient for every man to go who is fit and willing.

2. THE MASSACHUSETTS COMMITTEE OF SAFETY APPEALS FOR HELP

Committee of Safety to the Several Towns in Massachusetts.

Cambridge, April 28. 1775

Gentlemen: The barbarous murders committed on our innocent brethren on Wednesday the 19th instant have made it absolutely necessary that we immediately raise an army to defend our wives and children from the butchering hands of an inhuman soldiery, who, incensed at the obstacles they met with in their bloody progress, and enraged at being repulsed from the field of slaughter, will, without doubt, take the first opportunity in their power to ravage this devoted country with fire and sword. We conjure, therefore, by all that is dear, by all that is sacred, that you give all assistance possible in forming the army. Our all is at stake. Death and devastation are the certain consequences of delay; every moment is infinitely precious; an hour lost may deluge your country in blood and entail perpetual slavery upon the few of your posterity who may survive the carnage. We beg and entreat, as you will answer it to your country, to your own conscience, and, above all, to God himself, that you will hasten and encourage, by all possible means, the enlistment of men to form the army, and send them forward to head quarters at Cambridge, with that expedition which the vast importance and instant urgency of the affair demands.

3. "THE WAY IS OPEN AND CLEAR NOW FOR THE AMERICANS"

Diary of Dr. Ezra Stiles.

April 20. At eight o'clock this morning an express arrived in town from Providence, with the following letter:

"Providence, April 19, 1775

"10 o'clock at night

"Sir

"This evening intelligence hath been received that about twelve hundred of the Regulars have proceeded from Boston towards Concord, and having fired upon and killed a number of the inhabitants of Lexington, are now actually engaged in butchering and destroying our brethren there in the most inhuman manner, that the inhabitants oppose them with zeal and courage and numbers have already fallen on both sides. Reinforcements were at ten o'clock under motion from Boston, and the Provincials were alarmed and mustering as fast as possible. It appears necessary therefore that we immediately make some provision for their assistance, . . . We shall impatiently wait your arrival as numbers are ready and wait only orders to proceed.

"The countrys friend and yours,

"S. HOPKINS

"To Major General Potter."

Upon receipt of this news the town was thrown into alarm, and all went into preparation. The Governor issued warrants for calling the Assembly to meet at Providence next Saturday. Gen. Potter (who lives at Bristol) set off this morning, with numbers from Bristol and Warren. None have marched from Newport to-day, tho' Col. Dayton tells me this afternoon that there are five hundred armed and ready to march, waiting only the Governors orders. The Tories have, in order to intimidate, circulated thro' the town that Capt Wallace, of the Rose man o' war, insolently says he will fire upon the town and lay it in ashes, if any march from hence. This intimidates some people. They are training, exercising and preparing all day.

It is said that the Regulars, coming up with about 30 minute men exercising at Lexington, ordered them to lay down their arms—that upon refusal, the Regulars dastardly fired upon them and killed six—that the others returned the fire and killed some of the Regulars. But of this there is no certainty. Gov. Hopkins does not inform the basis of his intelligence—dont even date his letter. And it is not known whether the troops marched to Lexington yesterday morning, or before. It is probable the whole country is thrown into the same alarm as last September. The good Lord direct and overrule all for his Glory and the good of his Chosen. It is happy that the troops have given the first blow—the way is open and clear now for the Americans. If they will but tarry out of Boston a few days, I doubt not the Americans will give a good account of them. But I fear their cowardice has made them instantly return to Boston.

All that I rely upon in this news is that they have marched to Lexington and killed a few men. I am not a little apprehensive that it may prove only another false alarm, designedly excited by our people to prevent the troops from marching out of Boston into the country.

[April] 21. This has been a day of universal anxiety and solicitude in town. All business is laid aside. Various have been the reports from different parts. From all which I collect that on Wednesday 19th inst about 1500 troops went, early in the morning before day, in boats from Boston by water, and landed about Cambridge, and proceeded by a quick march to Concord and there destroyed about 50 barrels of flour and spiked up some cannon; and then returned thro' Lexington to Charlestown, and so passed over to Boston the evening of the same day; that the country was alarmed, and about 300 minute men attacked them at Lexington, when a number were killed on both sides. That these 300 harassed them in the return and again attacked them between Cambridge and Charlestown; when more were slain on both sides. The number slain said to be about 80 Regulars and 40 Provincials. An express left Cambridge yesterday and came to Providence about eleven o'clock this forenoon, and the news reached Newport at five o'clock this afternoon, informing that yesterday there were assembled 16 or seventeen thousand Provincials of which 7000 were at Cambridge, 4000 at Charlestown and 4000 at Roxbury. Col. Ward wrote to Providence to stay the further accession of troops as they had more than a sufficiency assembled. Col. Putnam was marching from Connecticut with a body of forces from that Colony. This is the state of the news to-day. None marched from Newport, nor from Providence.

[April] 22. This day brings further confirmation of the news yesterday, but no new intelligence. It is remarkable that 19th inst, the day of the march from Boston to Concord and commencement of actual hostilities, was the day of the anniversary fast thro' Connecticut. We do indeed hear that Gen. Gage having sent a vessel to take off his 100 men sent to Marshfield, the minute men of the neighboring towns assembled to prevent and secure the soldiers from being carried off. And that a great light was seen from Providence in the direction of Marshfield, which is 60 miles off, supposed to be the firing of that town. But this I do not credit. That light was seen from Newport by the watch last night. But Marshfield is a dispersed settlement. The supposition is in no wise credible. Tho probably the party is secured—for things are becoming more and more serious every day.

The Governor of North Carolina in a speech to his Assembly now sitting inveighed against the last Congress, and against sending delegates to the present. But the Assembly gave him a warm reply, have approved their delegates, and stand firm in the Cause of Liberty.

4. "NOTHING IS HEARD NOW BUT THE TRUMPET AND DRUM"

From a lady of Philadelphia to Captain S—, a British officer in Boston.

Sir—We received a letter from you—wherein you let Mr. S. know that you had written after the battle of Lexington, particularly to me—knowing my martial spirit—that I would delight to read the exploits of heroes. Surely, my friend, you must mean the New England heroes, as they alone performed exploits worthy fame—while the regulars, vastly superior in numbers, were obliged to retreat with a rapidity unequalled, except by the French at the battle of Minden. Indeed, General Gage gives them their due praise in his letter home, where he says Lord Percy was remarkable for his activity. You will not, I hope, take offence at any expression that, in the warmth of my heart, should escape me, when I assure you that though we consider you as a public enemy, we regard you as a private friend; and while we detest the cause you are fighting for, we wish well to your own personal interest and safety. Thus far by way of apology. As to the martial spirit you suppose me to possess, you are greatly mistaken. I tremble at the thoughts of war; but of all wars, a civil one: our all is at stake; and we are called upon by every tie that is dear and sacred to exert the spirit that Heaven has given us in this righteous struggle for liberty.

I will tell you what I have done. My only brother I have sent to the camp with my prayers and blessings; I hope he will not disgrace me; I am confident he will behave with honor and emulate the great examples he has before him; and had I twenty sons and brothers they should go. I have retrenched every superfluous expense in my table and family; tea I have not drank since last Christmas, nor bought a new cap or gown since your defeat at Lexington, and what I never did before, have learnt to knit, and am now making stockings of American wool for my servants, and this way do I throw in my mite to the public good. I know this, that as free I can die but once, but as a slave I shall not be worthy of life.

I have the pleasure to assure you that these are the sentiments of all my sister Americans. They have sacrificed both assemblies, parties of pleasure, tea drinking and finery to that great spirit of patriotism that actuates all ranks and degrees of people throughout this extensive continent. If these are the sentiments of females, what must glow in the breasts of our husbands, brothers and sons? They are as with one heart determined to die or be free.

It is not a quibble in politics, a science which few understand, which we are contending for; it is this plain truth, which the most ignorant peasant knows, and is clear to the weakest capacity, that no man has a right to take their money without their consent. The supposition is ridiculous and absurd, as none but highwaymen and robbers attempt it. Can you, my friend, reconcile it with your own good sense, that a body of men in Great Britain, who have little intercourse with America, and of course know nothing of us, nor are supposed to see or feel the misery they would inflict upon us, shall invest themselves with a power to command our lives and properties, at all times and in all cases whatsoever? You say you are no politician. Oh, sir, it requires no Machivellian head to develop this, and to discover this tyranny and oppression. It is written with a sun beam. Every one will see and know it because it will make them feel, and we shall be unworthy of the blessings of Heaven, if we ever submit to it.

All ranks of men amongst us are in arms. Nothing is heard now in our streets but the trumpet and drum; and the universal cry is "Americans, to arms!" All your friends are officers: there are Captain S. D., Lieut. B. and Captain J. S. We have five regiments in the city and country of Philadelphia, complete in arms and uniforms, and very expert at the military manoeuvres. We have companies of light-horse, light infantry, grenadiers, riflemen and Indians, several companies of artillery, and some excellent brass cannon and field pieces. Add to this that every county in Pennsylvania and the Delaware government can send two thousand men to the field. Heaven seems to smile on us, for in the memory of man never were known such quantities of flax, and sheep without number.

We are making powder fast and do not want for ammunition. In short, we want for nothing but ships of war to defend us, which we could procure by making alliances: but such is our attachment to Great Britain that we sincerely wish for reconciliation, and cannot bear the thoughts of throwing off all dependence on her, which such a step would assuredly lead to. The God of mercy will, I hope, open the eyes of our king that he may see, while in seeking our destruction, he will go near to complete his own. It is my ardent prayer that the effusion of blood may be stopped. We hope yet to see you in this city, a friend to the liberties of America, which will give infinite satisfaction to

Your sincere friend, C. S.

5. GAGE PROMISES TO PARDON ALL REBELS EXCEPT SAMUEL ADAMS AND JOHN HANCOCK

June 12, 1775

Whereas, the infatuated multitude, who have long suffered themselves to be conducted by certain well known incendiaries and traitors, in a fatal progression of crimes against the constitutional authority of the State, have at length proceeded to avowed Rebellion; and the good effects which were expected to arise from the patience and lenity of the King's Government have been often frustrated, and are now rendered hopeless, by the influence of the same evil counsels; it only remains for those who are invested with supreme rule, as well for the punishment of the guilty, as the protection of the well-affected, to prove they do not bear the sword in vain.

. . . A number of armed persons, to the amount of many thousands, assembled on the 19th of April last, and from behind walls and lurking holes, attacked a detachment of the King's Troops, who, not suspecting so consummate an act of frenzy, unprepared for vengeance, and willing to decline it, made use of their arms only in their own defence. Since that period, the rebels, deriving confidence from impunity, have added insult to outrage; have repeatedly fired upon the King's ships and subjects with cannon and small-arms; have possessed the roads and other communications by which the Town of Boston was supplied with provisions; and with a preposterous parade of military arrangement they affected to hold the army besieged; while part of their body made daily and indiscriminate invasions upon private property, and, with a wantonness of cruelty ever incident to lawless tumult, carry depredation and distress wherever they turn their steps. The actions of the 19th of April are of such notoriety as must baffle all attempts to contradict them, and the flames of buildings and other property from the islands and adjacent country, for some weeks past, spread a melancholy confirmation of the subsequent assertions.

In this exigency of complicated calamities, I avail myself of the last effort within the bounds of my duty to spare the effusion of blood; to offer, and I do hereby, in His Majesty's name, offer and promise his most gracious pardon to all persons who shall forthwith lay down their arms and return to their duties of peaceable subjects, excepting only from the benefit of such pardon Samuel Adams and John Hancock, whose offences are of too flagitious a nature to admit of any other consideration than that of condign punishment.

And to the end that no person within the limits of this offered mercy may plead ignorance of the consequences of refusing it, I, by these presents, proclaim not only the persons above named and excepted, but also all their adherents, associates and abettors (meaning to comprehend in those terms, all and every person and persons, of what class, denomination or description soever) who have appeared in arms against the King's Government and shall not lay down the same as afore-mentioned; and likewise all such as shall so take arms after the date hereof, or who shall in any wise protect or conceal such offenders, or assist them with money, provisions, cattle, arms, ammunition, carriages or any other necessary for subsistence or offence, or shall hold secret correspondence with them by letter, message, single or otherwise, to be Rebels and Traitors, and as such to be treated.

6. KING GEORGE: "WHEN ONCE THESE REBELS HAVE FELT A SMART BLOW"

George III to Lord Sandwich.

Kew, 1st July, 1775

Your letter accompanying those received from Major Pitcairn is just arrived: that officer's conduct seems highly praiseworthy. I am of his opinion that when once these rebels have felt a smart blow, they will submit; and no situation can ever change my fixed resolution, either to bring the colonies to a due obedience to the legislature of the mother country or to cast them off!

VII. TICONDEROGA

The First Continental Congress had authorized defensive but not offensive operations; certainly Lexington and Concord, and even the siege of Boston, could come under this authorization. But it is not clear that after Lexington the Americans cared to make such a distinction. In any event less than a month passed before they took the offensive.

As the American forces closed in around Boston, it became obvious that they lacked the artillery for effective action against the fortifications which the British had erected. At this juncture it occurred to several officers—Benedict Arnold among them—that there were cannon to be had for the taking at Fort Ticonderoga on Lake Champlain. The Massachusetts Committee of Safety directed Arnold to raise a small force in western Massachusetts and capture Ticonderoga. Meantime the same idea had occurred to several members of the Connecticut Committee of Safety—Colonel Samuel Parsons, Silas Deane and others. Acting on their own, they authorized various soldiers, among them Ethan Allen of Vermont (then called the New Hampshire Grants) and Captain Edward Mott, to raise a force (preferably in Massachusetts and Vermont) and move on Ticonderoga. Early in May these expeditions converged on Lake Champlain—Allen and the Connecticut officers with perhaps 200 or 300 followers, Arnold with none. There was a tussle for command; neither commander would give way, and they sensibly agreed to share the command. On the night of May 9, Allen and Arnold with a force of some 83 men crossed Lake Champlain, and at dawn of the tenth surprised and captured the fort without a shot. The haul included over a hundred cannon and substantial military stores. Arnold went on to seize Crown Point, a few miles north; then, with characteristic energy, he commandeered the one British ship on the lake, sailed it to St. Johns and captured that outpost just beyond the Canadian border. Thus at the very beginning of the war the Americans, by a combination of luck and foresight, were astride the strategic military road to Canada.

1. CAPTAIN MOTT RAISES VOLUNTEERS TO ATTACK TICONDEROGA

From the journal of Captain Edward Mott of Connecticut.

Preston [Conn.], Friday, 28th April, 1775. Set out for Hartford, where I arrived the same day. Saw Christopher Leffingwell, Esq., who inquired of me about the situation of the people of Boston. When I had gave him an account, he asked me how they could be relieved, and where I thought we could get artillery and stores. I told him I knew not, except we went and took possession of Ticonderoga and Crown Point, which I thought might be done by surprise with a small number of men. Mr. Leffingwell left me, and in a short time came to me again and brought with him Samuel H. Parsons and Silas Deane, Esqrs., when he asked me if I would undertake such an expedition as we had talked of before. I told him I would.

They told me they wished I had been there one day sooner; that they had been on such a plan, and that they had sent off Messrs. Noah Phelps and Bernard Romans, who they had supplied with £300 in cash from the Treasury, and ordered them to draw for more if they should need; that said Phelps and Romans were gone by the way of Salisbury, where they would make a stop; they expected a small number of men would join them; and if I would go after them, they would give me an order or letter to them to join with them and to have my voice with them in conducting the affair and laying out the money; and also that I might take five or six men with me.

On which, I took with me Mr. Jeremiah Halsey, Mr. Epaphras Bull, Mr. Wm. Nichols, Mr. Elijah Babcock, and John Bigelow joined me; and Saturday the 29th April, in the afternoon, we set out on said expedition.

That night arrived at Smith's in New Hartford: stayed that night. The next day, being Sunday the 30th April, on our way to Salisbury . . . ; and the next day, having augmented our company to the number of sixteen in the whole, we concluded it was not best to add any more, as we meant to keep our business a secret and ride through the country unarmed till we came to the New Settlements on the Grants. We arrived at Mr. Dewey's in Sheffield and there we sent off Mr. Jer. Halsey and Capt. John Stephens to go to Albany in order to discover the temper of the people in that place, and to return and inform us as soon as possible.

That night we arrived at Col. Easton's in Pittsfield, where we fell in company with John Brown Esq. who had been at Canada and Ticonderoga about a month before; on which we concluded to make known our business to Col. Easton and said Brown, and to take their advice on the same. I was advised by Messrs. Deane, Leffingwell and Parsons, at Hartford, not to raise our men till we came to the N. Hampshire Grants, lest we should be discovered by having too long a march through the country. But when we advised with said Easton and Brown, they advised us that as there was a great scarcity of provisions in the Grants, and as the people were generally poor, it would be difficult to get a sufficient number of men there; therefore we had better raise a number of men sooner. Said Easton and Brown concluded to go with us, and Easton said he would assist me in raising some men in his regiment. We then concluded for me to go with Col. Easton to Jericho and Williamstown to raise men, and the rest of us to go forward to Bennington and see if they could purchase provisions there. We raised 24 men in Jericho and 15 in Williamstown, and got them equipped ready to march. Then Col. Easton and I set out for Bennington.

That evening we met with an express from our people informing us that they had seen a man directly from Ticonderoga, and that he informed them that they were reinforced at Ticonderoga and were repairing the garrison and were every way on their guard; therefore it was best for us to dismiss the men we had raised and proceed no further, as we should not succeed. I asked who the man was, where he belonged and where he was going, but could get no account; on which I ordered that the men should not be dismissed but that we would proceed.

The next day I arrived at Bennington. There overtook our people. . . . I inquired why they sent back to me to dismiss the expedition when neither our men from Albany nor the reconnoitering party were returned. They said they did not think that we should succeed. I told them that fellow they saw knew nothing about the garrison; that I had seen him since and had examined him strictly, and that he was a lying fellow and had not been at the fort. I told them with the two hundred men that we proposed to raise I was not afraid to go round the fort in open light; if it was re-inforced with five hundred men, they would not follow us out into the woods; that the accounts we had would not do to go back with and tell in Hartford.

While on this discourse, Mr. Halsey and Stephens came back from Albany and both agreed with me that it was best to go forward; after which Mr. Halsey and Mr. Bull both declared that they would not go back for no story, till they had seen the fort themselves. On which it was concluded that we should proceed; and as provisions were very scarce on the Grants, we sent Capt. Stephens and Mr. Hewitt to Albany New City to purchase provisions and send to us as soon as they could; and Mr. Romans left us and joined no more; we were all glad, as he had been a trouble to us all the time he was with us.

Then we proceeded to raise the men as fast as possible, and sent forward men on whom we could depend, to waylay the roads that lead from those places we were raising men in to Fort Edward, Lake George, Skenesborough, Ticonderoga or Crown Point—with orders to take up all those who were passing from either of those garrisons and send to us to be examined, and that all who were passing towards those garrisons from us should be stopped, so that no intelligence should go from us to the garrisons. And on Sunday night the seventh of May, we all arrived at Cassel Town, the place where we had appointed for the men all to meet; and on Monday the 8th of May, the Committee all got together to conclude in what method we would proceed in order to accomplish our design—of which Committee I was Chairman.

And after debating on the different methods to proceed, and in what manner to retreat in case of a repulse, we resolved and voted that we would proceed in the following manner, viz: that a party of thirty men, under the command of Capt. Herrick, should, the next day in the afternoon, take into custody Major Skene and his party and boats; and that the rest of the men, which consisted of about 140, should go through Shoreham to the Lake, opposite to Ticonderoga; and that a part of the men that went to Skenesborough should, in the night following, go down the Lake by Ticonderoga in the boats to Shoreham, in order to carry men across the Lake to Ticonderoga. We also sent Capt. Douglas to go to Crown Point and see if he could not agree with his brother-in-law, who lived there, to hire the king's boats on some stratagem, and send up the Lake from there to assist in carrying over our men. It was further agreed that Col. Ethan Allen should have the command of the party that should go against Ticonderoga, agreeable to my promise made to the men when I engaged them to go, that they should be commanded by their own officers.

In the evening after, the party that was to go to Skenesborough was drafted out, and Col. Allen was gone to Mr. Wessells, in Shoreham, to meet some men who were to come in there, having received his orders, at what time he must be ready and must take possession of the garrison of Ticonderoga—the whole plan being settled by a vote of the Committee.

In the evening Col. Arnold came to us with his orders and demanded the command of our people, as he said we had no proper orders. We told him we could not surrender the command to him, as our people were raised on condition that they would be commanded by their own officers. He persisted in his demand, and the next morning he proceeded forward to overtake Col. Allen. I was then with the party that was going to Skenesborough, a mile and a half distance from the other party. When Col. Arnold went after Col. Allen, the whole party followed him, for fear he should prevail on Col. Allen to resign the command, and left all the provisions, so that I, with Capt. Phelps and Babcock, was obliged to leave the party that I was with, and go with the packhorses with the provisions, and could not overtake them till the first division had crossed the Lake. We followed them as soon as the boats got back, and when we got over they were in possession of the fort. We entered the fort immediately, and soon got the Regular troops under guard and their arms all in our possession. This was done on Wednesday the 10th of May.

2. "MR. ALLEN'S ORDERS WERE FROM THE PROVINCE OF CONNECTICUT"

From the report of Lieutenant Jocelyn Feltham of the British garrison at Ticonderoga to General Gage.

New York, 11th June, 1775

... Capt. Delaplace having in the course of the winter applied to Gen. Carleton for a reinforcement, as he had reason to suspect some attack from some circumstances that happened in his neighbourhood, Gen. Carleton was pleased to order a detachment of a subaltern and 20 men to be sent in two or three separate parties, the first party of which was sent as a crew along with Major Dunbar who left Canada about the 12th April. I being the first subaltern on command was ordered down with 10 men in a few days more, to give up to Capt. Delaplace with whom Lt. Wadman was to remain, having received orders from the regiment some time before to join there. As he was not arrived when I came I had orders to wait until he did. I was 12 days there before he came, which was about an hour after the fort was surprized.

I had not lain in the fort on my arrival, having left the only tolerable rooms there were for Mr. Wadman if he arrived with his family, but being unwell, had lain in the fort for two or three nights preceding the 10th May, on which morning about half an hour after three in my sleep I was awakened by numbers of shrieks and the words "No quarter, no quarter!" from a number of armed rabble. I jumped up, about which time I heard the noise continue in the area of the fort. I ran undressed to knock at Capt. Delaplace's door and to receive his orders or wake him. The door was fast. The room I lay in being close to Capt. Delaplace's, I stept back, put on my coat and waist coat and returned to his room, there being no possibility of getting to the men, as there were numbers of the rioters on the bastions of the wing of the fort on which the door of my room and back door of Capt. Delaplace's room led. With great difficulty I got into his room, being pursued, from which there there was a door down by-stairs into the area of the fort. I asked Capt. Delaplace, who was now just up, what I should do, and offered to force my way if possible to our men.

On opening this door, the bottom of the stairs was filled with the rioters and many were forcing their way up, knowing the commanding officer lived there, as they had broke open the lower rooms where the officers live in winter and could not find them there. From the top of the stairs I endeavoured to make them hear me, but it was impossible. On making a signal not to come up the stairs, they stopped and proclaimed silence among themselves. I then addressed them, but in a stile not agreeable to them I asked them a number of questions, expecting to amuse them till our people fired, which I must certainly own I thought would have been the case.

After asking them the most material questions I could think, viz., by what authority they entered His Majesty's fort, who were the leaders, what their intent, etc., etc., I was informed by one Ethan Allen and one Benedict Arnold that they had a joint command, Arnold informing me he came from instructions received from the congress at Cambridge, which he afterwards shewed me. Mr. Allen told me his orders were from the province of Connecticut and that he must have immediate possession of the fort and all the effects of George the Third (those were his words), Mr. Allen insisting on this with a drawn sword over my head and numbers of his followers' firelocks presented at me, alledging I was commanding officer and to give up the fort, and if it was not complied with, or that there was a single gun fired in the fort, neither man, woman or child should be left alive in the fort. Mr. Arnold begged it in a genteel manner but without success. It was owing to him they were prevented getting into Capt. Delaplace's room, after they found I did not command.

Capt. Delaplace, being now dressed, came out, when after talking to him some time, they put me back into the room. They placed two sentrys on me and took Capt. Delaplace down stairs. They also placed sentrys at the back door.

From the beginning of the noise till half an hour after this I never saw a soldier, tho' I heard a great noise in their rooms and can not account otherwise than that they must have been seized in their beds before I got on the stairs, or at the first coming in, which must be the case as Allen wounded one of the guard on his struggling with him in the guard room immediately after his entrance into the fort. When I did see our men they were drawn up without arms, which were all put into one room over which they placed sentrys and allotted one to each soldier.

Their strength at first coming—that is, the number they had ferried over in the night—amounted to about 90, but from their entrance and shouting they were constantly landing men till about 10 o'clock when I suppose there were about 300, and by the next morning at least another 100, who I suppose were waiting the event and came now to join in the plunder which was most rigidly performed as to liquors, provisions, etc., whether belonging to His Majesty or private property.

About noon on the 10th May, our men were sent to the landing at Lake George, and sent over next day, then marched by Albany to Hartford in Connecticut where they arrived on the 22d.

3. "IN THE NAME OF JEHOVAH AND THE CONTINENTAL CONGRESS"

From the narrative of Colonel Ethan Allen, first published in March 1779.

Ever since I arrived to a state of manhood and acquainted myself with the general history of mankind, I have felt a sincere passion for liberty. The history of nations doomed to perpetual slavery, in consequence of yielding up to tyrants their natural born liberties, I read with a sort of philosophical horror; so that the first systematical and bloody attempt at Lexington to enslave America thoroughly electrified my mind and fully determined me to take part with my country.

And while I was wishing for an opportunity to signalize myself in its behalf, directions were privately sent to me from the then colony (now state) of Connecticut to raise the Green Mountain Boys, and (if possible) with them to surprise and take the fortress Ticonderoga. This enterprise I cheerfully undertook; and, after first guarding all the several passes that led thither, to cut off all intelligence between the garrison and the country, made a forced march from Bennington and arrived at the lake opposite to Ticonderoga on the evening of the ninth day of May, 1775, with two hundred and thirty valiant Green Mountain Boys; and it was with the utmost difficulty that I procured boats to cross the lake. However, I landed eighty-three men near the garrison, and sent the boats back for the rear guard commanded by Col. Seth Warner. But the day began to dawn, and I found myself under a necessity to attack the fort before the rear could cross the lake; and, as it was viewed hazardous, I harangued the officers and soldiers in the manner following:

"Friends and fellow soldiers, you have, for a number of years past, been a scourge and terror to arbitrary power. Your valour has been famed abroad and acknowledged, as appears by the advice and orders to me (from the general assembly of Connecticut) to surprise and take the garrison now before us. I now propose to advance before you and in person conduct you through the wicket-gate; for we must this morning either quit our pretensions to valour, or possess ourselves of this fortress in a few minutes; and, in as much as it is a desperate attempt (which none but the bravest of men dare undertake), I do not urge it on any contrary to his will. You that will undertake voluntarily, poise your firelocks!"

The men being (at this time) drawn up in three ranks, each poised his firelock. I ordered them to face to the right, and, at the head of the centre-file, marched them immediately to the wicket gate aforesaid, where I found a centry posted, who instantly snapped his fusees at me. I ran immediately toward him, and he retreated through the covered way into the parade within the garrison, gave a halloo and ran under a bomb-proof. My party who followed me into the fort, I formed on the parade in such a manner as to face the two barracks which faced each other. The garrison being asleep (except the centries), we gave three huzzas which greatly surprised them. One of the centries made a pass at one of my officers with a charged bayonet and slightly wounded him. My first thought was to kill him with my sword; but, in an instant, altered the design and fury of the blow to a slight cut on the side of the head; upon which he dropped his gun and asked quarter, which I readily granted him, and demanded of him the place where the commanding officer kept. He shewed me a pair of stairs in the front of a barrack, on the west part of the garrison, which led up to a second story in said barrack, to which I immediately repaired, and ordered the commander (Capt. Delaplace) to come forth instantly, or I would sacrifice the whole garrison; at which the captain came immediately to the door with his breeches in his hand, when I ordered him to deliver to me the fort instantly, who asked me by what authority I demanded it; I answered, "In the name of the great Jehovah and the Continental Congress."

The authority of the Congress being very little known at that time, he began to speak again; but I interrupted him and, with my drawn sword over his head, again demanded an immediate surrender of the garrison; to which he then complied, and ordered his men to be forthwith paraded without arms, as he had given up the garrison. In the mean time some of my officers had given orders, and in consequence thereof, sundry of the barrack doors were beat down, and about one third of the garrison imprisoned, which consisted of the said commander, a Lieut. Feltham, a conductor of artillery, a gunner, two serjeants and forty-four rank and file; about one hundred pieces of cannon, one 13-inch mortar and a number of swivels.

This surprise was carried into execution in the gray of the morning of the 10th day of May, 1775. The sun seemed to rise that morning with a superior lustre; and Ticonderoga and its dependencies smiled on its conquerors, who tossed about the flowing bowl and wished success to Congress and the liberty and freedom of America. . . . Col. Warner with the rear guard crossed the lake and joined me early in the morning, whom I sent off without loss of time, with about one hundred men, to take possession of Crown Point, which was garrisoned with a serjeant and twelve men; which he took possession of the same day, as also upwards of one hundred pieces of cannon.

But one thing now remained to be done to make ourselves complete masters of Lake Champlain: This was to possess ourselves of a sloop of war, which was then laying at St. John's; to effect which, it was agreed in a council of war to arm and man out a certain schooner, which lay at South Bay, and that Capt. (now General) Arnold should command her, and that I should command the batteaux. The necessary preparations being made, we set sail from Ticonderoga in quest of the sloop, which was much larger and carried more guns and heavier metal than the schooner.

General Arnold, with the schooner sailing faster than the batteaux, arrived at St. John's and by surprise possessed himself of the sloop before I could arrive with the batteaux. He also made prisoners of a serjeant and twelve men, who were garrisoned at that place. It is worthy [of] remark that as soon as General Arnold had secured the prisoners on board and had made preparation for sailing, the wind which but a few hours before was fresh in the south and well served to carry us to St. John's, now shifted and came fresh from the north; and in about one hour's time General Arnold sailed with the prize and schooner for Ticonderoga. When I met him with my party, within a few miles of St. John's, he saluted me with a discharge of cannon, which I returned with a volley of small arms. This being repeated three times, I went on board the sloop with my party, where several loyal Congress healths were drank.

We were now masters of Lake Champlain and the garrisons depending thereon.

4. COLONEL ALLEN IS "ENTIRELY UNACQUAINTED WITH MILITARY SERVICE"

Colonel Benedict Arnold's report on the capture of Ticonderoga to the Massachusetts Committee of Safety.

Ticonderoga, May 11, 1775

Gentlemen:—I wrote you yesterday that, arriving in the vicinity of this place, I found one hundred and fifty men collected at the instance of some gentlemen from Connecticut (designed on the same errand on which I came), headed by Colonel Ethan Allen, and that I had joined them, not thinking proper to wait the arrival of the troops I had engaged on the road, but to attempt the fort by surprise; that we had taken the fort at four o'clock yesterday morning without opposition and had made prisoners one captain, one lieutenant and forty-odd privates and subalterns, and that we found the fort in a most ruinous condition and not worth repairing; that a party of fifty men were gone to Crown Point, and that I intended to follow with as many men to seize the sloop, etc., and that I intended to keep possession here until I had farther advice from you.

On and before our taking possession here I had agreed with Colonel Allen to issue farther orders jointly, until I could raise a sufficient number of men to relieve his people; on which plan we proceeded when I wrote you yesterday: since which, Colonel Allen, finding he had the ascendancy over his people, positively insisted I should have no command, as I had forbid the soldiers plundering and destroying private property. The power is now taken out of my hands, and I am not consulted, nor have I a voice in any matters.

There is here at present near one hundred men, who are in the greatest confusion and anarchy, destroying and plundering private property, committing every enormity and paying no attention to public service. The party I advised were gone to Crown Point are returned, having met with head winds; and that expedition and taking the sloop (mounted with six guns) is entirely laid aside. There is not the least regularity among the troops, but every thing is governed by whim and caprice—the soldiers threatening to leave the garrison on the least affront. Most of them must return home soon, as their families are suffering. Under our present situation, I believe one hundred men would retake the fortress, and there seems no prospect of things being in a better situation.

I have therefore thought proper to send an express advising you of the state of affairs, not doubting you will take the matter into your serious consideration and order a number of troops to join those I have coming on here; or that you will appoint some other person to take the command of them and this place, as you shall think most proper. Colonel Allen is a proper man to head his own wild people, but entirely unacquainted with military service; and as I am the only person who has been legally authorized to take possession of this place, I am determined to insist on my right, and I think it my duty to remain here against all opposition until I have farther orders.

I cannot comply with your orders in regard to the cannon, etc., for want of men. I have wrote to the Governor and General Assembly of Connecticut, advising them of my appointment and giving them an exact detail of matters as they stand at present. I should be extremely glad to be honorably acquitted of my commission, and that a proper person might be appointed in my room. But, as I have, in consequence of my orders from you, gentlemen, been the first person who entered and took possession of the fort, I shall keep it, at every hazard, until I have further advice and orders from you and the General Assembly of Connecticut.

VIII. VIRGINIA TAKES THE ROAD TO REVOLUTION

Virginia and Massachusetts had from the beginning taken the lead in opposition to the new British policy inaugurated by the Proclamation line of 1763 and the Stamp Act; it was entirely proper that Virginia should be the first colony to range herself alongside Massachusetts in the crisis of 1774-75. As early as January 1774 a committee of planters of Fairfax County—including George Washington and George Mason—moved to tighten Virginia's defenses by strengthening the militia. They resolved somewhat pharisaically "that a well regulated militia is the natural strength and only stable security of a free government, and that such militia will relieve our mother country from any expense in our protection and defence, will obviate the pretence of a necessity of taxing us on that account, and render it unnecessary to keep standing armies among us." On March 20, 1775, a convention met at Richmond, in accordance with recommendations of the First Continental Congress, to take up the whole question of colonial relations with the mother country. Its deliberations were, for the most part, innocuous, but on March 23 it took up, in the spirit of the Fairfax County resolutions, a proposal that the "colony be immediately put into a posture of defense." It was on this resolution that Patrick Henry made the famous speech which has come down to us largely in the form remembered or imagined by William Wirt. "The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms"—it was almost too prophetic to be true! But if it is not good history it is good historical legend. The resolutions, in any event, were passed and Virginia ranged herself behind the Continental Congress—and selected delegates to the next one.

Alarmed by this display of defiance, Governor Dunmore, on the night of April 20, directed a small body of marines to seize the gunpowder in Williamsburg. Had it not been that the Virginians were moderate, and Dunmore without an army, another Concord might have ensued. The Virginians gathered in arms—hundreds of them—and threatened to recapture the powder. Dunmore—not for the first or the last time—lost his head. "The whole country can easily be made a solitude," he threatened, "and by the living God if an insult is offered to me or to those who have obeyed my orders, I will declare freedom to the slaves and lay the town in ashes!" When he had cooled off, however, he paid for the powder, and then—to show that he was not to be frightened—he outlawed Patrick Henry just as he was about to set off for the Second Continental Congress.

Meantime the Conciliatory Plan which Lord North pushed through Parliament in February reached the colonies, and early in June Dunmore convened the Burgesses to listen to its terms. By them Parliament would "forbear" to lay any but regulatory taxes upon any American colony which through its own assembly taxed itself for the support of defence and civil government. Yet even as the Burgesses were discussing them, the Governor, once again frightened, took refuge on the warship Fowey, in the York River. Not surprisingly the Burgesses rejected the North plan and adopted a series of resolutions, drafted by Jefferson, setting forth their unity with the other colonies.

There ensued some months of desultory skirmishing which came to a head in November when Dunmore outraged Virginia sentiment by proclaiming martial law and promising freedom to Negro slaves who joined the royal cause. When the militia leader William Woodford moved his meager forces toward the port of Norfolk, Dunmore decided to take the offensive. At Great Bridge the redcoats—led by the same Colonel Leslie who had been turned back at Salem—suffered a stunning defeat and withdrew to their ships lying in Norfolk harbor. There, for some weeks, Dunmore glowered and sulked; in January he decided that the situation had become intolerable, and turned his naval guns on the hapless town. With some connivance from the Patriots, Norfolk was destroyed. Dunmore's desperate act did not harm the Patriots, but it did irreparable harm to the Virginia Loyalists—most of them located in Norfolk—forfeited the last chance of accommodation with the moderates, and provided invaluable material for Patriot propaganda.

Some two months after the affair at Great Bridge, Governor Martin of North Carolina organized a Tory expedition from his floating capitol, the sloop of war Scorpion. Under Donald McDonald, Loyalist leader of the Scots clans of the colony, the Loyalists tried to fight their way through to the coast. The North Carolina militia under Colonel James Moore met them at Moore's Creek Bridge. Shouting "King George and the Broadwords" the Highlanders in plaids and kilts rushed the bridge but were cut down and fled in confusion; no less than 850 of them were captured, the largest haul of prisoners so far. This victory led to the termination of royal government in North Carolina.

We give here Patrick Henry's speech—or alleged speech; an account of the removal of the powder; some paragraphs from Jefferson's memorable resolutions on the Conciliatory Plan; Dunmore's proclamation promising freedom to the slaves; a contemporary letter telling how the Virginians prepared for war; Colonel Woodford's account of the affair at Great Bridge; two accounts of the burning of Norfolk; and Colonel Moore's own report on the battle at Moore's Creek Bridge.

1. "GENTLEMEN MAY CRY 'PEACE! PEACE!' BUT THERE IS NO PEACE"

Patrick Henry's speech in the Virginia Convention, March 23, 1775, as reported by William Wirt.

Mr. President: It is natural to man to indulge in the illusions of hope. We are apt to shut our eyes against a painful truth—and listen to the song of that syren, till she transforms us into beasts. Is this the part of wise men, engaged in a great and arduous struggle for liberty? Are we disposed to be of the number of those who, having eyes, see not, and having ears, hear not, the things which so nearly concern their temporal salvation? For my part, whatever anguish of spirit it may cost, I am willing to know the whole truth; to know the worst, and to provide for it.

I have but one lamp by which my feet are guided; and that is the lamp of experience. I know of no way of judging of the future but by the past. And judging by the past, I wish to know what there has been in the conduct of the British ministry for the last ten years, to justify those hopes with which gentlemen have been pleased to solace themselves and the house? Is it that insidious smile with which our petition has been lately received? Trust it not, sir; it will prove a snare to your feet. Suffer not yourselves to be betrayed with a kiss. Ask yourselves how this gracious reception of our petition comports with those warlike preparations which cover our waters and darken our land. Are fleets and armies necessary to a work of love and reconciliation? Have we shown ourselves so unwilling to be reconciled that force must be called in to win back our love? Let us not deceive ourselves, sir. These are the implements of war and subjugation—the last arguments to which kings resort. I ask gentlemen, sir, what means this martial array, if its purpose be not to force us to submission? Can gentlemen assign any other possible motive for it? Has Great Britain any enemy in this quarter of the world, to call for all this accumulation of navies and armies? No, sir, she has none. They are meant for us: they can be meant for no other. They are sent over to bind and rivet upon us those chains which the British ministry have been so long forging. And what have we to oppose to them? Shall we try argument? Sir, we have been trying that for the last ten years. Have we anything new to offer upon the subject? Nothing. We have held the subject up in every light of which it is capable; but it has been all in vain. Shall we resort to entreaty and humble supplication? What terms shall we find which have not been already exhausted? Let us not, I beseech you, sir, deceive ourselves longer.

Sir, we have done everything that could be done to avert the storm which is now coming on. We have petitioned—we have remonstrated—we have supplicated—we have prostrated ourselves before the throne, and have implored its interposition to arrest the tyrannical hands of the ministry and parliament. Our petitions have been slighted; our remonstrances have produced additional violence and insult; our supplications have been disregarded; and we have been spurned, with contempt, from the foot of the throne. In vain, after these things, may we indulge the fond hope of peace and reconciliation. There is no longer any room for hope. If we wish to be free—if we mean to preserve inviolate those inestimable privileges for which we have been so long contending—if we mean not basely to abandon the noble struggle in which we have been so long engaged, and which we have pledged ourselves never to abandon until the glorious object of our contest shall be obtained—we must fight!—I repeat it, sir, we must fight! An appeal to arms and to the God of Hosts is all that is left us!

They tell us, sir, that we are weak—unable to cope with so formidable an adversary. But when shall we be stronger? Will it be the next week or the next year? Will it be when we are totally disarmed, and when a British guard shall be stationed in every house? Shall we gather strength by irresolution and inaction? Shall we acquire the means of effectual resistance by lying supinely on our backs, and hugging the delusive phantom of hope, until our enemies shall have bound us hand and foot? Sir, we are not weak, if we make a proper use of those means which the God of nature hath placed in our power. Three millions of people, armed in the holy cause of liberty, and in such a country as that which we possess, are invincible by any force which our enemy can send against us. Besides, sir, we shall not fight our battles alone. There is a just God who presides over the destinies of nations; and who will raise up friends to fight our battles for us. The battle, sir, is not to the strong alone; it is to the vigilant, the active, the brave. Besides, sir, we have no election. If we were base enough to desire it, it is now too late to retire from the contest. There is no retreat but in submission and slavery! Our chains are forged. Their clanking may be heard on the plains of Boston! The war is inevitable—and let it come! I repeat it, sir, let it come!

It is in vain, sir, to extenuate the matter. Gentlemen may cry, "Peace! peace!"—but there is no peace. The war is actually begun! The next gale that sweeps from the north will bring to our ears the clash of resounding arms! Our brethren are already in the field! Why stand we here idle? What is it that gentlemen wish? What would they have? Is life so dear, or peace so sweet, as to be purchased at the price of chains and slavery? Forbid it, Almighty God! I know not what course others may take; but as for me, give me liberty or give me death!

2. VIRGINIANS PROTEST THE REMOVAL OF THE POWDER

This morning, between three and four o'clock, all the gunpowder in the magazine, to the amount, as we hear, of about twenty barrels, was carried off in his Excellency the Governour's wagon, escorted by Captain Collins and a detachment of marines from the armed schooner Magdalen, now lying at Burwell's Ferry, and lodged on board that vessel. As soon as the news of this manoeuvre took wind, the whole city was alarmed and much exasperated; and numbers got themselves in readiness to repair to the Palace to demand from the Governour a restoration of what they so justly supposed was deposited in this magazine for the country's defence. However, as some gentlemen represented the propriety of remonstrating to the Governour upon this occasion in a decent and respectful manner, the Common Hall assembled, who, after deliberating some time, waited upon his Excellency with the following Address, which was presented by the Honourable Peyton Randolph, Esquire, Recorder of this city, and is as follows: . . .

My Lord: We, His Majesty's dutiful and loyal subjects, the Mayor, Recorder, Aldermen, and Common Council of the City of Williamsburgh, in Common Hall assembled, humbly beg leave to represent to your Excellency that the inhabitants of this city were this morning exceedingly alarmed by a report that a large quantity of gunpowder was, in the preceding night, while they were sleeping in their beds, removed from the publick magazine in this city, and conveyed under an escort of marines on board one of His Majesty's armed vessels lying at a ferry on James River.

We beg leave to represent to your Excellency that as this magazine was erected at the publick expense of this Colony, and appropriated to the safe-keeping of such munition as should be lodged from time to time, for the protection and security of the country, by arming thereout such of the militia as might be necessary in case of invasions and insurrections, they humbly conceive it to be the only proper repository to be resorted to in times of imminent danger.

We farther beg leave to inform your Excellency that from various reports at present prevailing in different parts of the country, we have too much reason to believe that some wicked and designing persons have instilled the most diabolical notions into the minds of our slaves, and that, therefore, the utmost attention to our internal security is become the more necessary.

The circumstances of this city, my Lord, we consider as peculiar and critical. The inhabitants, from the situation of the magazine in the middle of their city, have for a long tract of time been exposed to all those dangers which have happened in many countries from explosions and other accidents. They have, from time to time, thought it incumbent on them to guard the magazine. For their security, they have for some time past judged it necessary to keep strong patrols on foot. In their present circumstances, then, to have the chief and necessary means of their defence removed cannot but be extremely alarming.

Considering ourselves as guardians of the city, we therefore humbly desire to be informed by your Excellency upon what motives and for what particular purpose the powder has been carried off in such a manner: and we earnestly entreat your Excellency to order it to be immediately returned to the magazine.

To which His Excellency returned this oral answer:

That hearing of an insurrection in a neighbouring county, he had removed the powder from the magazine, where he did not think it secure, to a place where it would be in perfect security; and that, upon his word and honour, whenever it was wanted on any insurrection, it should be delivered in half an hour. That he had removed it in the night time to prevent any alarm; and that Captain Collins had his express commands for the part he had acted. He was surprised to hear the people were under arms on this occasion, and that he should not think it prudent to put powder into their hands in such a situation.

3. VIRGINIA REJECTS NORTH'S CONCILIATORY OVERTURES

Thomas Jefferson's Virginia Resolutions.

Resolved . . . That wishing nothing so sincerely as the perpetual continuance of that brotherly love which we bear to our fellow subjects of Great Britain . . . we were pleased to receive his Lordship's notification that a benevolent tender had at length been made by the British House of Commons towards bringing to a good end our unhappy disputes with the Mother Country; that next to the possession of liberty, we should consider such Reconciliation the greatest of all human blessings. With these dispositions we entered into consideration of that Resolution: we examined it minutely; we viewed it in every point of light in which we were able to place it; and with pain and disappointment we must ultimately declare it only changes the form of oppression, without lightening its burthen. That we cannot close with the terms of that Resolution for these Reasons:

Because the British Parliament has no right to intermeddle with the support of civil government in the Colonies. . . .

Because to render perpetual our exemption from an unjust taxation, we must saddle ourselves with a perpetual tax adequate to the expectations and subject to the disposal of Parliament alone. . . .

Because on our undertaking to grant money as is proposed, the Commons only resolve to forbear levying pecuniary taxes on us; still leaving unrepealed their several Acts passed for the purposes of restraining the trade and altering the form of Government of the Eastern Colonies; . . .

Because at the very time of requiring from us grants of Money they are making disposition to invade us with large Armaments. . . .

Because on our agreeing to contribute our proportion towards the common defence, they do not propose to lay open to us a free trade with all the world; . . .

Because the proposition now made to us involves the interest of all the other Colonies. . . .

4. FREEDOM FOR NEGROES WHO JOIN THE ROYAL CAUSE: LORD DUNMORE

Off Norfolk, November 7, 1775

As I have ever entertained hopes that an accommodation might have taken place between Great Britain and this Colony, without being compelled by my duty to this most disagreeable, but now absolutely necessary step, rendered so by a body of armed men, unlawfully assembled, firing on His Majesty's Tenders; and the formation of an Army, and that Army now on their march to attack His Majesty's Troops, and destroy the well-disposed subjects of this Colony: To defeat such treasonable purposes, and that all such traitors and their abettors may be brought to justice, and that the peace and good order of this Colony may be again restored, which the ordinary course of the civil law is unable to effect, I have thought fit to issue this my Proclamation, hereby declaring, that until the aforesaid good purposes can be obtained, I do, in virtue of the power and authority to me given by His Majesty, determine to execute martial law, and cause the same to be executed throughout this Colony. And to the end that peace and good order may the sooner be restored, I do require every person capable of bearing arms to resort to His Majesty's standard, or be looked upon as traitors to His Majesty's crown and Government, and thereby become liable to the penalty the law inflicts upon such offences—such as forfeiture of life, confiscation of lands, etc., etc.: and I do hereby further declare all indented servants, Negroes or others, (appertaining to Rebels) free, that are able and willing to bear arms, they joining His Majesty's Troops as soon as may be, for the more speedily reducing this Colony to a proper sense of their duty to His Majesty's crown and dignity. I do further order and require all His Majesty's liege subjects to retain their quit-rents, or any other taxes due, or that may become due, in their own custody, till such time as peace may be again restored to this, at present, most unhappy Country, or demanded of them for their former salutary purposes, by officers properly authorized to receive the same.

Given under my hand, on board the Ship William, off Norfolk, the 7th day of November, in the sixteenth year of His Majesty's reign.

5. VIRGINIA PREPARES FOR WAR

Extract from a letter from Virginia, Rappahannock River, as printed in the Morning Chronicle and London Advertiser, August 21, 1775.

. . . It would really surprise you to see the preparations making for our defence, all persons arming themselves, and independent companies, from 100 to 150 men in every county of Virginia, well equipped and daily endeavouring to instruct themselves in the art of war, in order [to] oppose any forces that shall be sent here; this has been the case ever since the battle of Boston, and I can positively affirm that in a few days an army of at least 7 or 8 thousand well-disciplined men might be got together (well armed) for the protection of this country; and, from the best information I can get, the Northern Colonies have forces far superior to this country, so that you may depend there will be many most bloody battles before the Americans will give up their liberties.

I am afraid the scheme of Parliament will be the ruin of the British constitution, for should they at last reduce the Americans (which I much doubt), I am sure that it will so weaken the British power that they must become a prey to some other nation, for I am sure that America never will submit while there are a sufficient number of its inhabitants left as will make the appearance of an army, so that the King will have but few subjects left here, and those few, perhaps, not well attached to his person.

When you traded here you well knew it to be the ambition of the people of this country to endeavour who should be best dressed with the British manufactures, but they are now quite on the contrary extreme, for their glory now is to dress in their own manufacture, for you may be well assured that many people, who a few years ago would not wear a shirt of less value than 2s. 6d. or 3s. sterling per yard, now put on a cotton shirt of their own manufacture, and the example is daily followed by all ranks of people here: you may see from this how scandalous our G[overnor] has been in informing the ministry that we could not subsist more than one or two years without the assistance of the British manufactory. I hope he and every such — who has been the cause of the present disturbances will be brought to condign punishment. Instead of our fields being planted with tobacco, as usual, they are now flourishing with cotton and flax, and our pastures well stored with sheep; so I think there will not be the least danger of our suffering for want of clothes. I heartily wish you and your family all happiness, and I pray God that the disputes now subsisting between the Colonies and Britain may be speedily settled for the interest of both, . . .

6. "A SECOND BUNKER'S HILL . . . WE KEPT OUR POST"

Great-Bridge, December 10, 1775

A servant belonging to Major Marshall, who deserted the other night from Colonel Scott's party, has completely taken his Lordship in. Lieutenant Batut, who is wounded and at present my prisoner, informs me that this fellow told them not more than three hundred shirt-men were here, and that imprudent man caught at the bait, despatching Captain Leslie with all the regulars (about two hundred) who arrived at the bridge about three o'clock in the morning, joined about three hundred black and white slaves, laid planks upon the bridge, and crossed just after our reveille had beat; and lucky time for us, and, you will say, rather an improper season for them to make their push, when, of course all our men must be under arms. The above lieutenant commanded the advanced party, and Captain Fordyce, of the Grenadiers, led the van with his company, who, for coolness and bravery, deserved a better fate, as well as the brave fellows who fell with him, who behaved like heroes. They marched up to our breastwork with fixed bayonets, and perhaps a hotter fire never happened or a greater carnage, for the number of troops. None of the blacks, etc., in the rear, with Captain Leslie, advanced further than the bridge.

I have the pleasure to inform you that the victory was complete, and that most of their dead and wounded, with two pieces of cannon, were carried off under cover of their guns from the fort. We buried twelve besides the captain (him with all the military honours due to his rank), and have prisoners Lieutenant Batut and sixteen privates, all wounded; thirty-five stands of arms and accoutrements, three officers' fusils, powder, ball and cartridges, with sundry other things, have likewise fallen into our hands.

This was a second Bunker's Hill affair, in miniature, with this difference, that we kept our post and had only one man wounded in the hand.

7. "THE DETESTED TOWN OF NORFOLK IS NO MORE"

From the journal of a midshipman on board His Majesty's ship Otter.

December 9th.—Our troops, with about sixty townsmen from Norfolk, and a detachment of sailors from the ships, among whom I had the honor to march, set out from Norfolk to attack, once more, the rebels at Great Bridge, who had been lodged there some time, and had erected a breastwork opposite to our fort, upon their side of the river. We arrived at the fort half an hour after three in the morning, and, after refreshing ourselves, prepared to attack the rebels in their intrenchments.

Captain Squire, ever ready to assist my lord in the public cause, had sent his gunners and men to manage two pieces of cannon, who were in the front, and ordered to begin the attack. But how can it be supposed that, with two hundred men, we could force a strong intrenchment, defended by at least two thousand? Yet this was attempted, and we marched up to their works with the intrepidity of lions. But alas! we retreated with much fewer brave fellows than we took out. Their fire was so heavy that had we not retreated as we did, we should every one have been cut off. Figure to yourself a strong breastwork built across a causeway, on which six men only could advance abreast; a large swamp almost surrounded them, at the back of which were two small breastworks to flank us in our attack on their intrenchments. Under these disadvantages it was impossible to succeed; yet our men were so enraged that all the entreaties and scarcely the threats of their officers could prevail on them to retreat, which at last they did. . . . We set out on our return for Norfolk about seven o'clock in the evening, at which place we arrived at twelve, and the soldiers were embarked on board vessels prepared for that purpose.

December 14th.—The rebels, having now nothing to obstruct their passage, arrived and took possession of Norfolk, and in the evening saluted us with a volley of small arms; . . . the next morning, I was sent on shore to their commander to inform him that if another shot was fired at the Otter, they must expect the town to be knocked about their ears.

January 9th.—The detested town of Norfolk is no more! Its destruction happened on New Year's Day. About four o'clock in the afternoon the signal was given from the Liverpool, when a dreadful cannonading began from the three ships, which lasted till it was too hot for the rebels to stand on their wharves. Our boats now landed, and set fire to the town in several places. It burned fiercely all night, and the next day; nor are the flames yet extinguished; but no more of Norfolk remains than about twelve houses which have escaped the flames.

8. THE BRITISH FIRE NORFOLK

Norfolk, January 2, 1776

The cannonade of the town began about a quarter after three yesterday, from upwards of one hundred pieces of cannon, and continued till near ten at night, without intermission; it then abated a little, and continued till two this morning. Under cover of their guns they landed and set fire to the town in several places near the water, though our men strove to prevent them all in their power; but the houses near the water being chiefly of wood, they took fire immediately, and the fire spread with amazing rapidity. It is now become general, and the whole town will, I doubt not, be consumed in a day or two. Expecting that the fire would throw us into confusion, they frequently landed, and were every time repulsed, I imagine with loss, but with what loss I cannot tell; the burning of the town has made several avenues which yesterday they had not, so that they may now fire with greater effect; the tide is now rising, and we expect at high water another cannonade.

I have only to wish it may be ineffectual as the last; for we have not one man killed, and but a few wounded. I cannot enter into the melancholy consideration of the women and children running through a crowd of shot to get out of the town, some of them with children at their breasts; a few have, I hear, been killed. Does it not call for vengeance, both from God and man?

It is but justice to inform you that I had the pleasure to find every officer ready to execute orders at a moment's warning, and that the men behaved with steadiness and spirit. Colonel Stevens went down at my command and headed some men near the water, where he engaged a party who had landed, with a spirit and conduct of a good officer. Of my friend, Colonel Woodford, it is almost needless to speak, but I cannot avoid expressing that I received from him every assistance which conduct and spirit could give me.

9. THE AFFAIR AT MOORE'S CREEK BRIDGE

General James Moore to the North Carolina Provincial Council.

Wilmington [N. C.], March 2, 1776

... Just when I was prepared to march I received an express from Colonel Caswell, informing that the Tories had raised a flat which had been sunk in Black River, about five miles above him, and by erecting a bridge, had passed it with their whole army.

I then determined, as the last expedient, to proceed immediately in boats down the Northwest River to Dollison's Landing, about sixty miles from them; and to take possession of Moore's Creek Bridge, about ten miles from them, at the same time acquainting Colonel Caswell of my intentions, and recommending him to retreat to Moore's Creek Bridge, if possible; but if not, to follow on in their rear.

The next day, by four o'clock, we arrived at Dollison's Landing; but as we could not possibly march that night, for want of horses for the artillery, I dispatched an express to Moore's Creek Bridge, to learn the situation of affairs there, and was informed that Colonel Lillington, who had the day before taken his stand at the bridge, was that afternoon reinforced by Colonel Caswell, and that they had raised a small breastwork and destroyed a part of the bridge.

The next morning (the 27th) at break of day an alarm gun was fired; immediately after which, scarcely allowing our people a moment to prepare, the Tory army, with Captain Macleod at their head, made their attack on Colonel Caswell and Colonel Lillington, and, finding a small intrenchment next the bridge on our side empty, concluded that our people had abandoned their post, and in the most furious manner advanced within thirty paces of our breastwork and artillery, where they met a very proper reception. Captain Macleod and Captain Campbell fell within a few paces of the breastwork, the former of whom received upwards of twenty balls through his body; and in a very few minutes their whole army was put to flight and most shamefully abandoned their general, who was next day taken prisoner.

The loss of the enemy in this action, from the best accounts we have been able to learn, is about thirty killed and wounded; but as numbers of them must have fallen into the creek, besides many more that were carried off, I suppose their loss may be estimated at about fifty. We had only two wounded, one of which died this day.

Thus, sir, I have the pleasure to inform you, has most happily terminated a very dangerous insurrection and will, I trust, put an effectual check to Toryism in this country.

CHAPTER FOUR

Bunker's Hill

IN HIS bombastic proclamation of June 12, 1775, General Gage had charged, among many other foolish things, that "the rebels . . . with a preposterous parade of military arrangement, affected to hold the army besieged." The arrangements may have been preposterous, but the siege was more than an affectation; it was real. A straggling American army (if it is proper to use that term) of some 7,000 or 8,000 men stretched in a great semicircle from the Mystic River on the north, through Cambridge and Roxbury, to Dorchester. Confined on their narrow peninsula were some 4,000 British—their numbers were augmented by reinforcements that came in during the spring months. For all his rodomontade Gage was not eager to renew hostilities after Concord, but the failure of Lord North's conciliatory plan left him, in the end, no alternative. Besides, on May 25 the Cerberus had sailed into Boston harbor with no less than three new major generals who came, after all, to fight: Sir William Howe, the Whig general who disapproved of the war; the American-born Sir Henry Clinton; and General John Burgoyne who had distinguished himself by his virulent attacks on Clive in the House, and by his bold forays into dramatic literature. All three came with some reputation and high ambition and found America the graveyard of both.

General Gage knew that his position was precarious. He was hemmed in by land, and on sea supported only fortuitously by the incredible Admiral Graves who did not think it proper to take the offensive. He realized that American command either of Dorchester Heights to the south, or of Charlestown, across the bay, would make Boston untenable, and early in June decided to seize both strategic points. American intelligence, which was all but unfailing, got wind of this plan, and on June 15 the Committee of Public Safety called for the occupation of Bunker's Hill on Charlestown peninsula. During the night of the sixteenth about 1,600 Americans, under the command of Colonel William Prescott and General Israel Putnam, moved quietly onto the peninsula, and dug in on the little hill nearest Boston which came to be called Breed's Hill. Thus, as on the Concord expedition, Gage forfeited the initiative. He knew that he had to dislodge the Americans, or expose Boston to attack, and to this task he addressed himself with admirable energy. But energy was almost the only virtue which he did display. Instead of taking the obvious course of cutting the Americans off at the narrow neck of the peninsula, or the equally obvious (if more difficult) course of bombarding their positions from the sea, he chose to launch a frontal attack. In the end he drove the Americans from both Breed's Hill and Bunker's Hill, but it was one of the costliest victories in British military annals.

Neither side could take much satisfaction in Bunker's Hill, but the American failures were more serious than the British. From beginning to end the American battle had been a series of miscalculations and frustrations. There was no unified command, and indeed some question as to who was actually in command; less than one fifth the available forces were brought into action; reinforcements failed to come up or, coming up, fled; Bunker's Hill would have been a much stronger position than Breed's Hill; the lack of powder and the failure to bring up new supplies during the day were inexcusable. Yet most of these can be charged to inexperience. Gage could plead no such excuse. His strategy was clear. Pride and folly dictated the direct attack—contempt for the Americans which ought to have vanished with Concord, pride in the invulnerability of British arms.

I. THE SIEGE OF BOSTON

1. "OUR SITUATION HERE IS BEYOND DESCRIPTION"

Peter Oliver, who here laments the pass to which the folly of American radicals and Ministerial extremists had brought the country, was the son of the Chief Justice Oliver who as one of the "Mandamus Councillors" incurred the particular enmity of the Patriots. After the outbreak of hostilities he took refuge in Boston, and eventually left with Howe for Halifax, and England.

Dear Brother,

We learn by the Cerberus man-of-war, which arrived last Thursday the 25th of May, that you have done with the thoughts of coming to Boston at present, which rejoices your friends.

I received yours dated at Bath, and am much obliged to you.

Our situation here, without any exaggeration, is beyond description almost; it is such as eye has not seen nor ear heard, nor hath it ever entered into the heart of man to conceive Boston ever to arrive at.

We are besieged this moment with 10 or 15000 men, from Roxbury to Cambridge; their rebell sentrys within call of the troops' sentrys on the Neck. We are every hour expecting an attack by land or water. All marketing from the country stopt ever since the battle. Fire and slaughter hourly threatened, and not out of danger from some of the inhabitants within, of setting the town of [on] fire. All the interest the Judge and I ound [owned] in Middleborough exposed to the ravage of a set of robbers, Mr. Conant at the head of them. Poor Jenny and Phoebe, and children, we can't hear of, or get any word to; whether they are all living or not, or whether the works and buildings are left standing is rather a doubt with me, for we have heard since the battle that a number set out to destroy and burn our interest, but that the selectmen interposed and saved them.

You seem in England to be entirely ignorant of the temper of our people.

They are as much determined from Florida to Hallifax to oppose you at home, do what you will, as I hear the Ministry are determined to pursue their plan. I am in no doubt but you will be able to conquer America at last, but a horrid bloody scene will be opened here as never was in New England before. What comfort or satisfaction do you think we take now, or can take, when the dreadful scene opens?

Your wife is in Plymouth, yet we can't get any intelligence of her, good or bad.

It is said by the rebels at Roxbury that Col. Watson has given his quota to support the people.

Good God! Do thou avert the impending calamity that threatens this former happy land, and turn the hearts of those deluded wretches from the power of sin and Satan to thy unerring precepts, and then, and then only, shall we be once more a happy people favoured of Heaven. . . .

O tempora! O mores! Yrs as usual,

PETER OLIVER, JUNR.

2. GENERAL GAGE CONFESSES THAT ALL WARLIKE PREPARATIONS ARE WANTING

This letter was written the day General Gage issued his pompous proclamation outlawing Hancock and Samuel Adams, and should be read against the background of that state paper. Clearly General Gage was not nearly so sure of himself as he sounded, and clearly, too, his patience with the Americans had come to an end.

Boston, 12 June 1775

The situation these wretches have taken in forming the blockade of this town is judicious and strong, being well intrenched where the situation requires it and with cannon. Their numbers are great, exclusive of every inhabitant armed coming in to join that part of their army that may be attacked; upon the alarm being given, they come far and near, and the longer the action lasts, the greater their numbers grow. Their mode of engaging is (like all other inhabitants of a strong country) by getting behind fences and every sort of covering, firing from thence; then retire and load under cover and return to the charge; or take another situation from whence they fire. The country for 30 miles round is amazingly well situated for their manner of fighting, being covered with woods and small stone wall inclosures, exceedingly uneven and much cutt with ravins. . . .

In our present state all warlike preparations are wanting. No survey of the adjacent country, no proper boats for landing troops, not a sufficient number of horses for the artillery nor for regimental baggage. No forage, either hay or corn of any consequence—no waggons or harness for horses, except some prepared by Colonel Cleveland for the artillery.

The rebellious colonys will supply nothing. Some of these articles will, I hope, be furnished from Quebec, but unless Government enters heartily into the wants here by immediately sending all the supplys wanting, particularly for the winter, the army will do them little service. Flatbottom boats are much wanted. Our intelligence is so scanty that what we gett from the inland country for the most part is sent to the general by the Rebels. Very few or no spies; we are therefore intirely ignorant of what they are about in the neighborhood. . . .

—FORTESCUE, ed., Correspondence of King George, III, 215-216.

3. "A SITUATION TOO GREAT FOR HIS TALENTS"

Lord George Germain who, as Lord Sackville, had been declared "unfit to serve his majesty in any military capacity whatsoever" because of his misconduct in battle during the Seven Years' War, was rehabilitated by George III and appointed in 1775 to the post of Secretary of State for the Colonies. Although he contributed more than his fair share to losing the colonies, he was never backward in criticizing others for their failures. He was at outs with Sir Guy Carleton; had not spoken to Lord Howe for seventeen years; and had no use for Gage. This harsh judgment came after the fiasco of Lexington and Concord; after Bunker's Hill Gage was recalled.

. . . The particulars of the skirmish surprized me very much, as I had no conception the loss of the troops could have been so great when everybody agrees that the men behaved with proper spirit. The disposition I fear was originally defective, and the manner of opposing an enemy that avoids facing you in the open field is totally different from what young officers learn from the common discipline of the army. Mr. Braddock first suffered in the last war by a surprise from the Indians, and his little army was sacrificized without seeing an enemy and, by keeping together and firing in bodys, could neither defend themselves nor annoy their opponents. Another discipline was then established and all our light troops in America were taught to separate and secure themselves by trees, walls or hedges, and became so formidable both to the Indians and Canadians that they were victorious upon all occasions, and ever protected the main body of the army from surprize or insult. Nobody understands that discipline so well as General Howe, who had the command of the light troops, and who will, I am persuaded, teach the present army to be as formidable as that he formerly acted with.

Your Lordship wishes me to write freely. I must then lament that General Gage, with all his good qualitys, finds himself in a situation of too great importance for his talents. The conduct of such a war requires more than common abilities, the distance from the seat of Government necessarily leaves much to the discretion and the resources of the general, and I doubt whether Mr. Gage will venture to take a single step beyond the letter of his instructions, or whether the troops have that opinion of him as to march with confidence of success under his command. This consideration, however, makes taking every measure for immediately increasing your forces the more necessary, and what your Lordship mentions of sending more small ships of war is the surest method of bringing the rebellious part of that continent to reason, for I have no conception, when the trade is effectually stopped, that the numbers of distressed people will not combine in favour of Government, and shake off the power of those factious leaders who have been the authors of the present confusion. . . .

II. BUNKER'S HILL: THE AMERICAN VERSION

The story of Bunker's Hill begins on June 15 when the Committee of Safety got wind of Gage's plan to occupy both Dorchester Heights and the heights on Charlestown peninsula. The next day the Americans moved to forestall the enemy. Acting on orders from General Artemas Ward, Colonel Prescott of Pepperell rounded up his own regiment, elements of other Massachusetts militia regiments, a small contingent of Connecticut troops, and Captain Gridley's company of artillery which boasted two fieldpieces. After a prayer service conducted by President Langdon of Harvard College, this miscellaneous body crossed over Charlestown Neck, and moved out to the tip of the peninsula where they proceeded to throw up defenses on the little knoll later known as Breed's Hill. Early sunrise on June 17 discovered entrenchments of five or six feet on Breed's Hill, a straggling fence along the base of Bunker's Hill, and activity everywhere on the peninsula. The British first attempted to oust the Americans by a smart bombardment from the sea, but with little effect. The ships then turned their guns on the little town nestling below the two hills, and soon reduced Charlestown to ashes; fortunately most of its inhabitants had already fled to the American lines, so the only damage was to property.

Bunker's Hill—as it came to be called—was an altogether greater battle than Lexington or Concord, but the literature dealing with it is not so voluminous. We give here half a dozen narratives of the battle by American hands. Amos Farnsworth, who introduces the story, was a corporal in the Massachusetts militia, from near-by Groton. Peter Brown, who tells us of the labors of the night of the sixteenth, was a clerk in Colonel Prescott's regiment who, notwithstanding his youth, wrote a lively style. Captain John Chester was one of the Connecticut men who were hurried over to reinforce the hard-pressed soldiers on the afternoon of the day of battle. The brief account by Colonel Prescott, though written some two months after the battle, is of particular interest. For though Prescott was not the ranking officer on the field—both Israel Putnam and Joseph Warren outranked him—he was nevertheless in actual command of the fighting. Of him Daniel Webster later said: "From the first breaking of the ground to the retreat, he acted the most important part; and if it were proper to give the battle a name, from any distinguished agent in it, it should be called Prescott's battle." It is not without interest that Colonel Prescott was the grandfather of the historian of The Conquest of Mexico and The Conquest of Peru.

Shortly after the battle the Committee of Safety appointed the Reverend Peter Thacher and two others to write up an official account. Dr. Thacher—who had witnessed the fight from the near-by Mystic River—wrote the narrative, which was then rushed over to Arthur Lee in London; this version is taken from a manuscript in the American Antiquarian Society. As a kind of appendix we include an item on the burning of Charlestown—a letter by an eyewitness.

1. THE COMMITTEE OF SAFETY CALLS FOR THE OCCUPATION OF BUNKER'S HILL

Cambridge, June 15, 1775

Whereas, it appears of importance to the safety of this colony that possession of the hill called Bunker's Hill, in Charlestown, be securely kept and defended; and also, some one hill or hills on Dorchester Neck be likewise secured; therefore, resolved, unanimously, that it be recommended to the council of war that the above mentioned Bunker's Hill be maintained by sufficient forces being posted there; and as the particular situation of Dorchester Neck is unknown to this committee, they advise that the council of war take and pursue such steps, respecting the same, as to them shall appear to be for the security of this colony.

2. "WE WARE OVERPOWERED BY NUMBERS"

Diary of Amos Farnsworth, a corporal in the Massachusetts militia.

Friday June 16. Nothing done in the forenoon; in the afternoon we had orders to be redy to march. At six agreable to orders our regiment preadid and about sun-set we was drawn up and herd prayers; and about dusk marched for Bunkers Hill under command of our own Col Prescott. Just before we turned out of the rode to go up Bunkers-Hill, Charlestown, we was halted; and about sixty men was taken out of our batallion to go into Charlestown, I being one of them. Capt Nutten heded us down to the town house; we sot our centres by the waterside; the most of us got in the town house but had orders not to shut our eyes. Our men marched to Bunker-Hill and begun thair intrenchment and careed it on with the utmost viger all night. Early in the morning I joined them.

Saturday June 17. The enemy appeared to be much alarmed on Saturday morning when thay discovered our operations and immediately began a heavy cannonading from a batery on Corps-Hill, Boston, and from the ships in the harbour. We with little loss continued to carry on our works till 1 o'clock when we discovered a large body of the enemy crossing Charles-River from Boston. Thay landed on a point of land about a mile eastward of our intrenchment and immediately disposed thair army for an attack, previous to which thay set fire to the town of Charlestown. It is supposed that the enemy intended to attack us under the cover of the smoke from the burning houses, the wind favouring them in such a design; while on the other side their army was extending northward towards Mistick-River with an apparant design of surrounding our men in the works, and of cutting of[f] any assistance intended for our relief. Thay ware however in some measure counteracted in this design, and drew their army into closer order.

As the enemy approached, our men was not only exposed to the attack of a very numerous musketry, but to the heavy fire of the battery on Corps-Hill, 4 or 5 men of war, several armed boats or floating batteries in Mistick-River, and a number of field pieces. Notwithstanding we within the intrenchment, and at a breast work without, sustained the enemy's attacks with great bravery and resolution, kiled and wounded great numbers, and repulsed them several times; and after bearing, for about 2 hours, as sever and heavy a fire as perhaps ever was known, and many having fired away all their ammunition, and having no reinforsement, althoe thare was a great boddy of men nie by, we ware over-powered by numbers and obliged to leave the intrenchment, retreating about sunset to a small distance over Charlestown Neck.

N.B. I did not leave the intrenchment untill the enemy got in. I then retreated ten or fifteen rods; then I received a wound in my rite arm, the bawl gowing through a little below my elbow breaking the little shel bone. Another bawl struk my back, taking a piece of skin about as big as a penny. But I got to Cambridge that night. The town of Charlestown supposed to contain about 300 dwelling-houses, a great number of which ware large and elegant, besides 150 or 200 other buildings, are almost all laid in ashes by the barbarity and wanton cruelty of that infernal villain Thomas Gage.

Oh, the goodness of God in preserving my life althoe thay fell on my right hand and on my left! O, may this act of deliverance of thine, Oh God, lead me never to distrust the[e]; but may I ever trust in the[e] and put confidence in no arm of flesh! I was in great pane the first night with my wound.

3. PETER BROWN CONCLUDES THAT "GOD FOUGHT OUR BATTLE FOR US"

Frydy the 16th of June we were ordered to parade at 6 o'clock with one day's provisions and blankets ready for a march somewhere, but we did not know where. So we readily and cheerfully obeyed, the whole that was called for, which was these three, Col. Prescotts, Frys and Nicksons regiments. . . . About 9 o'clock at night we marched down on to Charlestown Hill against Cox Hill in Boston where we entrenched, and made a fort of about ten rod long and eight wide, with a breast work of about 8 more. We worked there undiscovered till about 5 in the morn and then we saw our danger, being against 8 ships of the line and all Boston fortified against us.

The danger we were in made us think there was treachery, and that we were brot there to be all slain, and I must and will venture to say that there was treachery, oversight or presumption in the conduct of our officers. And about half after 5 in the morn, we not having above half the fort done, they began to fire, I suppose as soon as they had orders, pretty briskly a few minutes, and then stopt, and then again to the number of about 20 or more. They killed one of us, and then they ceased till about 11 o'clock and then they began pretty brisk again; and that caused some of our young country people to desert, apprehending the danger in a clearer manner than the rest, who were more diligent in digging and fortifying ourselves against them. We began to be almost beat out, being tired by our labour and having no sleep the night before, but little victuals, no drink but rum. . . .

They fired very earm [warm] from Boston and from on board till about 2 o'clock, when they began to fire from the ships in ferry way, and from the ship that lay in the river against the Neck to stop our reinforcements, which they did in some measure. One cannon cut off 3 men in two on the neck of land. Our officers sent time after time after the cannons from Cambridge in the morning and could get but four, the captain of which fired but a few times and then swang his hat round three times to the enemy, then ceased to fire. It being about 3 o'clock, there was a little cessation of the cannons roaring. Come to look, there was a matter of 40 barges full of Regulars coming over to us: it is supposed there were about 3000 of them and about 700 of us left not deserted, besides 500 reinforcements that could not get so night [nigh] to us as to do any good hardly till the[y] saw that we must all be cut off, or some of them, and then they advanced. When our officers saw that the Regulars would land, they ordered the artillery to go out of the fort and prevent their landing if possible, from which the artillery captain took his pieces and went right off home to Cambridge fast as he could, for which he is now confined and we expect will be shot for it.

But the enemy landed and fronted before us and formed themselves in an oblong square, so as to surround us, which they did in part, and after they were well formed they advanced towards us in order to swallow us up, but they found a choaky mouthful of us, tho' we could do nothing with our small arms as yet for distance, and had but two cannon and nary gunner. And they from Boston and from the ships a-firing and throwing bombs keeping us down till they got almost round us. But God in mercy to us fought our battle for us and altho' we were but few and so were suffered to be defeated by them, we were preserved in a most wonderful manner far beyond expectation, to admiration, for out of our regiment there was about 37 killed, 4 or 5 taken captive, and about 47 wounded. . . .

If we should be called into action again I hope to have courage and strength to act my part valiantly in defence of our liberties and our country, trusting in him who hath yet kept me and hath covered my head in the day of battle, and tho' we have lost 4 of our company and our Lieutenant's thigh broke and he taken captive by the cruel enemies of America, I was not suffered to be touched altho' I was in the fort till the Regulars came in and I jumped over the walls, and ran for about half a mile where balls flew like hailstones and cannons roared like thunder.

4. "I WAITED NOT BUT RAN AND HASTED TO MY COMPANY"

Captain John Chester to the Reverend Joseph Fish of Stonington, Connecticut.
Camp at Cambridge, July 22, 1775

Rev. and Much Respected Sir:

. . . I shall endeavor, as far as my time and business will permit, to give you, sir, the particulars of the battle of Charlestown. . . .

As to my own concern in it, with that of my company, would inform that one subaltern, one sergeant and thirty privates were draughted out over night, to intrench. They tarried, and fought till the retreat. Just after dinner on Saturday, 17th ult., I was walking out from my lodgings, quite calm and composed, and all at once the drums beat to arms, and bells rang, and a great noise in Cambridge. Capt. Putnam came by on full gallop. "What is the matter?" says I.

"Have you not heard?"

"No."

"Why, the regulars are landing at Charlestown," says he, "and Father says you must all meet and march immediately to Bunker Hill to oppose the enemy."

I waited not, but ran and got my arms and ammunition, and hasted to my company (who were in the church for barracks) and found them nearly ready to march. We soon marched, with our frocks and trowsers on over our other clothes (for our company is in uniform wholly blue, turned up with red), for we were loath to expose ourselves by our dress, and down we marched. I imagined we arrived at the hill near the close of the battle. When we arrived there was not a company with us in any kind of order, although, when we first set out, perhaps three regiments were by our side and near us; but here they were scattered, some behind rocks and hay-cocks, and thirty men, perhaps, behind an apple-tree, and frequently twenty men round a wounded man, retreating, when not more than three or four could touch him to advantage. Others were retreating, seemingly without any excuse, and some said they had left the fort with leave of the officers, because they had been all night and day on fatigue, without sleep, victuals or drink; and some said they had no officers to head them, which, indeed, seemed to be the case.

At last I met with a considerable company who were going off rank and file. I called to the officer that led them, and asked why he retreated. He made me no answer. I halted my men, and told him if he went on it should be at his peril. He still seemed regardless of me. I then ordered my men to make ready. They immediately cocked, and declared if I ordered they would fire. Upon that they stopped short, tried to excuse themselves; but I could not tarry to hear him, but ordered him forward, and he complied.

We were then very soon in the heat of action. Before we reached the summit of Bunker Hill, and while we were going over the Neck, we were in imminent danger from the cannon-shot, which buzzed around us like hail. The musquetry began before we passed the Neck; and when we were on the top of the hill, and during our descent to the foot of it on the south, the small as well as cannon shot were incessantly whistling by us. We joined our army on the right of the centre, just by a poor stone fence, two or three feet high, and very thin, so that the bullets came through. Here we lost our regularity, as every company had done before us, and fought as they did, every man loading and firing as fast as he could. As near as I could guess, we fought standing about six minutes, my officers and men think. . . .

5. "OUR AMMUNITION BEING NEARLY EXHAUSTED, WE WAS OBLIGED TO RETREAT"

Colonel William Prescott to John Adams.

Camp at Cambridge, Aug. 25, 1775

. . . On the 16th June, in the evening, I received orders to march to Breed's Hill in Charlestown, with a party of about one thousand men, consisting of three hundred of my own regiment, Colonel Bridge and Lieut. Brickett, with a detachment of theirs, and two hundred Connecticut forces, commanded by Captain Knowlton. We arrived at the spot, the lines were drawn by the engineer, and we began the intrenchment about twelve o'clock; and plying the work with all possible expedition till just before sunrising, when the enemy began a very heavy cannonading and bombardment. In the interim the engineer forsook me. Having thrown up a small redoubt, found it necessary to draw a line about twenty rods in length from the fort northerly, under a very warm fire from the enemy's artillery. About this time, the above field officers, being indisposed, could render me but little service, and the most of the men under their command deserted the party.

The enemy continuing an incessant fire with their artillery, about two o'clock in the afternoon on the 17th, the enemy began to land a north-easterly point from the fort, and I ordered the train, with two field-pieces, to go and oppose them, and the Connecticut forces to support them; but the train marched a different course, and I believe those sent to their support followed, as I suppose, to Bunker's Hill. Another party of the enemy landed and fired the town. There was a party of Hampshire, in conjunction with some other forces, lined a fence at the distance of three score rods back of the fort, partly to the north.

About an hour after the enemy landed, they began to march to the attack in three columns. I commanded my Lieutenant-Col. Robinson and Major Woods, each with a detachment, to flank the enemy, who, I have reason to think, behaved with prudence and courage. I was now left with perhaps one hundred and fifty men in the fort. The enemy advanced and fired very hotly on the fort, and meeting with a warm reception, there was a very smart firing on both sides. After a considerable time, finding our ammunition was almost spent, I commanded a cessation till the enemy advanced within thirty yards, when we gave them such a hot fire that they were obliged to retire nearly one hundred and fifty yards before they could rally and come up again to the attack.

Our ammunition being nearly exhausted, could keep up only a scattering fire. The enemy, being numerous, surrounded our little fort, began to mount our lines and enter the fort with their bayonets. We was obliged to retreat through them, while they kept up as hot a fire as it was possible for them to make. We, having very few bayonets, could make no resistance. We kept the fort about one hour and twenty minutes after the attack with small arms. . . .

6. THE AMERICANS ARE DRIVEN FROM THEIR REDOUBT: PETER THACHER

Eyewitness narrative prepared about two weeks after the Battle of Bunker Hill.

In consequence of undoubted information received from Boston by the commanders of the Continental Army at Cambridge that Genl Gage with a part of his troops purposed the next day to take possession of Bunker's Hill, a promontory just at the entrance of the peninsula of Charlestown, they determined with the advice of the Committee of Safety of the Massachusetts Province to send a party who might erect some fortifications upon the hill and prevent this design.

Accordingly on the 16th of June, orders were issued that a party of about one thousand men should that evening march to Charlestown and entrench upon the hill. About 9 o'clock in the evening the detachment marched upon the design to Breed's hill situated on the further part of the peninsula next to Boston, for by a mistake of orders this hill was marked out for the entrenchment instead of the other. As there were many things necessary to be done preparatory to the entrenchments being thrown up which could not be done before lest the enemy should observe them, it was nearly twelve o'clock before the work was entered upon, for the clocks in Boston were heard to strike about 10 minutes after the men first took their tools into their hands. The work was carried on in every animation and success so that by the dawn of the day they had nearly completed a small redoubt about eight rods square.

At this time an heavy fire began from 3 men of war, a number of floating batteries and from a fortification of the enemys on Cops hill in Boston directly opposite to our little redoubt. These kept up an incessant shower of shot and bombs, by which one man pretty soon fell. Not discouraged by the melancholly fate of their companion, the soldiers laboured indefatigably till they had thrown up a small breastwork extending from the north side of the redoubt . . . to the bottom of the hill but were prevented by the intolerable fire of the enemy from completing them whol[ly] in such a manner as to make them defensible.

Having laboured thus between 12 and 1 o'clock a number of boats and barges filled with soldiers were observed approaching towards Charlestown. These landed their troops at a place called Moretons Point, situated a little to the eastward of our works. The brigade formed upon their landing tho they were something galled by the fire of two small field pieces which we had placed at the end of the intrenchments. They stood thus formed till a second brigade arrived from Boston to join them.

Having sent out large flank guards in order to surround them they began a very slow march towards our lines. At this instant flames and smoke were seen to arise in large clouds from the town of Charlestown [which] had been set on fire from some of the enemys batterys with a design to favour their attack upon our lines by the smoke which they imagined would have been blown directly that way and thence covered them in their attack, but the wind changing at this instant it was carried another way.

The provincials in the redoubt and the lines reserved their fire till the enemy had come within about 10 or 12 yards and then discharged at once upon them. The fire threw their body into very great confusion, and all of them after having kept a fire for some time retreated in very great disorder down to the point where they landed, and there some of them even into their boats.

At this time their officers were observed by spectators on the opposite shore to come there and then use the most passionate gestures and even to push forward the men with their swords. At length by their exertions the troops were again rallied and marched up to the entrenchments. The Americans reserved their fire and a second time put the regulars to flight who once more retreated in precipitation to their boats.

The same or greater exertions were now again observed to be made by their officers, and having formed once more they brought some cannon to bear in such a manner as to rake the inside of the breastwork, and having drove the provincials thence into the redoubt they determined now, it appeared, to make a decisive effort. The fire from the ships and batteries as well as from the cannon in front of their army was redoubled. Innumerable bombs were sent into the fort. The officers behind the army of the regulars were observed to goad forward their men with renewed exertion. The breastwork on the side of the entrenchment without the redoubt was abandoned, the ammunition of the provincials was expended, the enemy advanced on three sides of the fort at once and scaled the walls.

Can it be wondered at then that the word was given to retreat? But even this was not done till the redoubt was half filled with regulars, and the provincials had for some time kept up an engagement with the but ends of their muskets which unfortunately were not fixed with bayonets. . . .

With very great signs of exultation the British troops again took possession of the hill whither they had fled after their retreat from Concord, and it was expected that they would have prosecuted the advantage which they had gained by marching immediately to Cambridge which was then indeed in an almost defenceless state; they did not however do this, but kept firing with their cannon from the hill and from their ships and batteries across the Neck. The wonder which was excited and the conduct of them soon ceased when a certain account arrived from Boston that of 3 thousand who marched out on the expedition, no less than 1500, among which were 92 commission officers, were killed and wounded, a more severe blow than the British troops had ever before met with in proportion to the number who were engaged, and the time the engagement lasted from the first fire of the musketry to the last was exactly an hour and an half.

7. "IT WAS A PRETTY TOWN BUT NOW IT IS NOTHING BUT A HEAP OF RUINS"
Part of a letter from Boston, brought by the Cerberus.

Boston, June 23, 1775

... An account of the action at Buncker's Hill, at the back of Charlestown, you will have in General Gage's and General Howe's letters. I will only tell you that General Howe was sent out with two thousand five hundred men, or better, to dislodge a body of our troops on Buncker's Hill. When the troops had begun their march, the ships threw carcasses into Charlestown and have burned it entirely. It was a pretty town! but now there is not one house left standing! It is nothing but a heap of ruins. Let this dispute end which way it will, though you can never conquer us, this once fair and opulent province is ruined! All America will revenge our cause.

On the first attack your troops gave way; they did not expect so heavy a fire. General Howe rallied them; for near a minute he was quite alone; his aid de camp was killed at his side. The officers brought up the men and suffered for their temerity. General Clinton with another corps presently followed. General Putnam, who had not quite 4000 Connecticut men, thought the whole army was coming and without the least disorder, or even pursued a single step, left Bunker's Hill and went to another hill, about half a mile further, where he has remained ever since, without the least disturbance. If the mercenaries had offered to march a yard after him, General Ward, with his New England men, was ready to give a good account of them. . . .

Believe me you cannot succeed in this mad and wicked attempt to conquer. Every hill will be disputed with you, and every inch of ground. Two more such actions will destroy your army. . . .

III. BUNKER'S HILL: THE BRITISH VERSION

The best American accounts of Bunker's Hill come from the pens of ordinary soldiers like Private Peter Brown or Corporal Amos Farnsworth, or from civilian onlookers; it is characteristic that the British accounts should be written by officers like Generals Gage, Howe and Burgoyne and Lord Rawdon. Other differences, too, reflect what we may begin to call national characteristics. The American accounts are informal, almost inchoate; they mirror the disorganized, haphazard character of the American fighting, with its curious mixture of audacity and ineptitude, heroism and cowardice. The British accounts have about them a formal literary quality: they seem (what in effect they were) like reports back home designed to reach the papers or to be used in Parliament. The Americans were, technically, defeated and driven from the peninsula, but their narratives confess no sense of defeat or despair, rather of pride and resolution; the British, who carried the day, sound a uniform note of astonishment, indignation and distress.

It was, indeed, a Pyrrhic victory. Altogether British casualties were about 1,150 out of a total of about 2,500 men engaged, while the Americans lost perhaps 400 out of a total of 1,500 or 1,600. "The loss we have sustained," wrote General Gage, "is greater than we can bear." Certainly it was greater than his reputation could bear. Soon his subordinate Burgoyne was writing of him that "he was an officer totally unsuited for the command," and in October he was recalled, never to fight again.

We give here six British accounts to match the American. First is a letter by Francis, Lord Rawdon, who was in the thick of the fight. He later had a long and distinguished career in the Napoleonic Wars and in India. As with so many of the British officers (he was Irish, and raised a regiment of Volunteers of Ireland in Philadelphia) one feels that he would have preferred a clear-cut defeat at the hands of social equals to this dubious victory over social inferiors! It is interesting to note that Rawdon, like all the other British narrators, finds it necessary greatly to exaggerate American numbers in order to account for the large disparity in casualties, and the fact that only want of powder saved the British from destruction.

Our second account comes from General Sir William Howe who distinguished himself by personal bravery though not by tactical genius in the battle, and who found it intolerable that the Americans should fight in their way rather than in approved European style. After Gage's recall, Howe succeeded to the command—and did no better than his predecessor. "Gentleman Johnny" Burgoyne did not have the satisfaction of getting into the thick of the fight, but he did manage to give us the best literary description of the battle that has come down to us. General Gage, whose letter to Lord Barrington is somewhat livelier than his official report, called the engagement a success, but added that "small armies can't afford such losses"; he had no word of criticism for his own strategy or Howe's tactics. There follows an account by an anonymous British officer highly critical of the mismanagement of the whole affair and particularly of Howe's part in it; it was later used at the Inquiry which the Howe brothers called for. We conclude with an outburst of ill-temper from Ann Hulton, Loyalist sister of the commissioner of customs in Boston.

1. "OUR MEN ADVANCED WITH INFINITE SPIRIT"

Camp on the heights of Charlestown. 1775, June 20, Tues.

I have the pleasure, my dearest Lord, to inform you that we have at length given the rebels a signal defeat. On Saturday last, the 17th of this month, a large party of them were observed at work on the hills above Charlestown, throwing up a battery which would, if perfected, have probably destroyed the greatest part of Boston. The men-of-war in the harbour could not elevate their guns sufficiently to bear upon it, for which reason four twenty-four-pounders were ordered from the artillery park to play upon it. They struck it several times, but being at a great distance, and the work of an extraordinary thickness and solidity, they could make no impression on it.

About noon the Grenadiers (in which corps I am), the Light Infantry and the Second Brigade, in all about 2,400 men, were ordered to embark under the command of General Howe. The shipping kept up so warm a cannonade on the coast that we landed without opposition within half a mile of Charlestown, which the fire from the vessels had forced the rebels to abandon. The work we had seen from Boston was upon the heights just above this town, but upon approaching it we perceived that it was continued quite to the bottom of the hill on the side where we landed. We had halted for some time till our cannon came up, during which time we perceived great numbers of the enemy marching into their works. Our cannon fired upon the entrenchment for some time, but it was so strong that our balls had no effect upon it, and their men kept so close behind it that they were in no danger.

Our men at last grew impatient, and all crying out, "Push on! push on!" advanced with infinite spirit to attack the work with their small arms. As soon as the rebels perceived this, they rose up and poured in so heavy a fire upon us that the oldest officers say they never saw a sharper action. They kept up this fire till we were within ten yards of them; nay, they even knocked down my captain, close beside me, after we had got into the ditch of the entrenchment. Nothing, however, could long resist the courage of our men. The rebels were obliged to abandon the post, but continued a running fight from one fence, or wall, to another, till we entirely drove them off the peninsula of Charlestown. The night coming on we threw up a kind of breast-work and stood to our arms all night, but they did not attack us. We have now fortified our camp, and are in daily expectation of having another brush with them.

Their army consisted of above 6,000 men, a force which, situated as they were, should have kept off five times our number. Our loss is very great. There are above sixty officers killed and wounded, and men in proportion. The rebels had above ninety killed on the spot, besides wounded and prisoners. General Putnam, who commanded them (and is a very brave fellow), was shot through the thigh, but got off. The famous Doctor Warren, the greatest incendiary in all America, was killed on the spot. Only eleven of our Grenadier company are left; other companies have suffered even more. I received no hurt of any kind, but a ball passed through a close cap which I had made in imitation of the foreign travelling caps and wore for convenience sake, for we no longer think of appearances at present. I was everywhere in the thickest of the fire and flatter myself that I behaved as you could wish.

2. GENERAL HOWE CONCLUDES THAT "SUCCESS WAS TOO DEARLY BOUGHT"

Sir William Howe (probably to the British Adjutant General).

Camp upon the Heights of Charlestown, June 22 and 24

... The troops were no sooner ashore than it was instantly perceived the enemy were very strongly posted, the redoubt upon their right being large and full of men with cannon. To the right of the redoubt they had troops in the houses of Charles Town, about 200 yards distant from the redoubt, the intermediate space not occupied, being exposed to the cannon of the Boston side battery.

From the left of the redoubt, they had a line cannon-proof, about 80 yards in length; and from thence to their left, close upon the Mystic River, they had a breast work made with strong railing taken from the fences and stuffed with hay, which effectually secured those behind it from musquettry. This breast work about 300 yards in extent—they had made the whole in the night of the 16th.

As a specimen of our knowledge of service, the centrys on the Boston side had heard the Rebels at work all night without making any other report of it, except mentioning it in conversation in the morning. The first knowledge the General had of it was by hearing one of the ships firing at the workmen, and going to see what occasioned the firing. Their works when we landed were crowded with men, about 500 yards from us.

From the appearance of their situation and numbers, and seeing that they were pouring in all the strength they could collect, I sent to General Gage to desire a reinforcement, which he immediately complied with, the remaining Light Companies and Grenadiers, with the 47th Battalion and 1st of the Marines landing soon after. Our strength being then about 2200 rank and file, with six field pieces, two light 12-pounders and two howitzers, we begun the attack (the troops in two lines, with Pigott upon the left) by a sharp cannonade, the line moving slowly and frequently halting to give time for the artillery to fire.

The Light Companies upon the right were ordered to keep along the beach to attack the left point of the enemy's breast work, which being carried, they were to attack them in flank. The Grenadiers being directed to attack the enemy's left in front, supported by the 5th and 52d, their orders were executed by the Grenadiers and 2 battalions with a laudable perseverance, but not with the greatest share of discipline, for as soon as the order with which they set forward to the attack with bayonets was checked by a difficulty they met with in getting over some very high fences of strong railing, under a heavy fire, well kept up by the Rebels, they began firing, and by crowding fell into disorder, and in this state the 2d line mixt with them. The Light Infantry at the same time being repulsed, there was a moment that I never felt before, but by the gallantry of the officers it was all recovered and the attack carried.

Upon the left, Pigott met with the same obstruction from the fences, and also had the troops in the houses to combat with, before he could proceed to assail the redoubt, or to turn it to his left, but the town being set on fire by order at this critical time by a carcass from the battery on the Boston side, Pigott was relieved from his enemies in that quarter, and at the 2d onset he carried the redoubt in the handsomest manner, tho' it was most obstinately defended to the last. Thirty of the Rebels not having time to get away were killed with bayonets in it. The little man is worthy of Our Master's favour.

But I now come to the fatal consequences of this action—92 officers killed and wounded—a most dreadful account. I have lost my aid de camp Sherwin, who was shot thro' the body and died the next day. Our friend Abercrombie is also gone—he had only a flesh wound, but is said to have been in a very bad habit of body. The General's returns will give you the particulars of what I call this unhappy day. I freely confess to you, when I look to the consequences of it, in the loss of so many brave officers, I do it with horror. The success is too dearly bought. Our killed, serjeants and rank and file, about 160; 300 wounded and in hospital, with as many more incapable of present duty. The Rebels left near 100 killed and 30 wounded, but I have this morning learnt from a deserter from them that they had 300 killed and a great number wounded.

We took five pieces of cannon, and their numbers are said to have been near 6000, but I do not suppose they had more than between 4 and 5000 engaged.

The corps remained upon their arms the night of the action, where we are now encamped in a strong situation, with redoubts commanding the isthmus in our front, the enemy being in two corps about one mile and a half distant from us and both well entrenched; the principal body being upon a height called Summer Hill commanding the way from thence to Cambridge; the other called Winter Hill upon the road to Midford (or Mystich) on the side of Roxbury—they are also entrenched and have artillery at all their posts.

Entre nous, I have heard a bird sing that we can do no more this campaign than endeavour to preserve the town of Boston, which it is supposed the Rebels mean to destroy by fire or sword or both—and it is my opinion, with the strength we shall have collected here upon the arrival of the 4 battalions last from Ireland (one of which, with Bailey of the 23d, came in the day before yesterday), that we must not risk the endangering the loss of Boston—tho' should anything offer in our favour, I should hope we may not let pass the opportunity.

The intentions of these wretches are to fortify every post in our way; wait to be attacked at every one, having their rear secure, destroying as many of us as they can before they set out to their next strong situation, and, in this defensive mode (the whole country coming into them upon every action), they must in the end get the better of our small numbers. We can not (as the General tells us) muster more now than 3400 rank and file for duty, including the Marines and the three last regiments from Ireland.

3. GENERAL BURGOWNE CALLS IT A DAY OF GLORY

To Lord Stanley.

... It was absolutely necessary we should make ourselves masters of these heights, and we proposed to begin with Dorchester, because, from the particular situation of batteries and shipping, . . . it would evidently be effected without any considerable loss. Every thing was accordingly disposed; my two colleagues and myself (who, by the by, have never differed one jot of military sentiment) had, in concert with General Gage, formed the plan. Howe was to land the transports on the Point; Clinton in the centre; and I was to cannonade from the causeway or the Neck: each to take advantage of circumstances. The operations must have been very easy; this was to have been executed on the 18th.

On the 17th, at dawn of day, we found the enemy had pushed intrenchments with great diligence during the night, on the heights of Charlestown, and we evidently saw that every hour gave them fresh strength; it therefore became necessary to alter our plan and attack on that side. Howe, as second in command, was detached with about two thousand men, and landed on the outward side of the peninsula, covered with shipping, without opposition; he was to advance from thence up the hill which was over Charlestown, where the strength of the enemy lay; he had under him Brigadier-General Pigot. Clinton and myself took our stand (for we had not any fixed post) in a large battery directly opposite to Charlestown, and commanded it, and also reaching the heights above it, and thereby facilitating Howe's attack.

Howe's disposition was exceedingly soldierlike; in my opinion it was perfect. As his first arm advanced up the hill they met with a thousand impediments from strong fences, and were much exposed. They were also exceedingly hurt by musketry from Charlestown, though Clinton and I did not perceive it until Howe sent us word by a boat and desired us to set fire to the town, which was immediately done; we threw a parcel of shells, and the whole was instantly in flames; our battery afterwards kept an incessant fire on the heights; it was seconded by a number of frigates, floating batteries and one ship-of-the-line.

And now ensued one of the greatest scenes of war that can be conceived: if we look to the height, Howe's corps, ascending the hill in the face of intrenchments, and in a very disadvantageous ground, was much engaged; to the left the enemy pouring in fresh troops by thousands, over the land; and in the arm of the sea our ships and floating batteries cannonading them; straight before us a large and noble town in one great blaze—the church-steeple, being timber, were great pyramids of fire above the rest; behind us, the church-steeple and heights of our own camp covered with spectators of the rest of our army which was engaged; the hills round the country covered with spectators; the enemy all in anxious suspense; the roar of cannon, mortars and musketry; the crash of churches, ships upon the stocks, and whole streets falling together, to fill the ear; the storm of the redoubts, with the objects above described, to fill the eye; and the reflection that, perhaps, a defeat was a final loss to the British Empire in America, to fill the mind—made the whole picture, and a complication of horror and importance, beyond any thing that ever came to my lot to be witness to.

I much lament Tom's absence; it was a sight for a young soldier that the longest service may not furnish again; and had he been with me he would likewise have been out of danger; for, except for two cannon balls that went a hundred yards over our heads, we were not in any part of the direction of the enemy's shot.

A moment of the day was critical: Howe's left were staggered; two battalions had been sent to re-enforce them, but we perceived them on the beach seeming in embarrassment what way to march. Clinton then, next for business, took the part without waiting for orders, to throw himself into a boat to head them; he arrived in time to be of service; the day ended with glory, and the success was most important, considering the ascendancy it gave the Regular troops; but the loss was uncommon in officers for the numbers engaged. . . .

4. GENERAL GAGE: "THE LOSS IS GREATER THAN WE CAN BEAR"

Boston, June 26, 1775

My Lord: You will receive an account of some success against the Rebels, but attended with a long list of killed and wounded on our side; so many of the latter that the hospital has hardly hands sufficient to take care of them. These people shew a spirit and conduct against us they never shewed against the French, and every body has judged of them from their formed appearance and behaviour when joyned with the Kings forces in the last war; which has led many into great mistakes.

They are now spirited up by a rage and enthousiasm as great as ever people were possessed of, and you must proceed in earnest or give the business up. A small body acting in one spot will not avail. You must have large armies, making diversions on different sides, to divide their force.

The loss we have sustained is greater than we can bear. Small armies cant afford such losses, especially when the advantage gained tends to little more than the gaining of a post—a material one indeed, as our own security depended on it. The troops are sent out too late, the Rebels were at least two months before-hand with us, and your Lordship would be astonished to see the tract of country they have entrenched and fortified; their number is great, so many hands have been employed.

We are here, to use a common expression, taking the bull by the horns, attacking the enemy in their strong parts. I wish this cursed place was burned. The only use is its harbour, which may be said to be material; but in all other respects it is the worst place either to act offensively from, or defensively. I have before wrote your Lordship my opinion that a large army must at length be employed to reduce these people, and mentioned the hiring of foreign troops. I fear it must come to that, or else to avoid a land war and make use only of your fleet. I dont find one province in appearance better disposed than another, tho' I think if this army was in New York, that we should find many friends, and be able to raise forces in that province on the side of Government. . . .

—CARTER, ed., Correspondence of Gage, II, 686-687.

5. "TOO GREAT A CONFIDENCE OCCASIONED THE DREADFUL LOSS"

Letter of a British officer.

Boston, July 5, 1775

We have lost 1000 men killed and wounded. We burned Charlestown during the engagement, as the rebels from it exceedingly galled our left. Major Pitcairn was killed from it. Too great a confidence in ourselves, which is always dangerous, occasioned this dreadful loss. "Let us take the bull by the horns" was the phrase of some great men among us, as we marched on. We went to battle without even reconnoitering the position of the enemy. Had we only wanted to drive them from their ground, without the loss of a man, the Cymetry transport, which drew little water and mounted 18 nine-pounders, could have been towed up Mystic Channel and brought to within musket-shot of their left flank, which was quite naked, and she could have lain water-borne at the lowest ebb tide; or one of our covered boats, musket-proof, carrying a heavy piece of cannon, might have been rowed close in, and one charge on their uncovered flank would have dislodged them in a moment. Had we intended to have taken the whole rebel army prisoners, we needed only have landed in their rear and occupied the high ground above Bunker's hill. By this movement we shut them up in the peninsula as in a bag, their rear exposed to the fire of our cannon and if we pleased our musquetry. In short, they must have surrendered instantly or been blown to pieces.

But from an absurd and destructive confidence, carelessness or ignorance, we have lost a thousand of our best men and officers and have given the rebels great matter of triumph by showing them what mischief they can do us. They were not followed, though Clinton proposed it. Their deserters since tell us that not a man would have remained at Cambridge, had but a single regiment been seen coming along the Neck.

Had we seen and rejected all the advantages I have mentioned above, even our manner of attacking in front was ruinous. In advancing, not a shot should have been fired, as it retarded the troops, whose movement should have been as rapid as possible. They should not have been brought up in line, but in columns with light infantry in the intervals, to keep up a smart fire against the top of the breastwork. If this had been done, their works would have been carried in three minutes, with not a tenth part of our present loss. We should have been forced to retire, if Gen. Clinton had not come up with a reinforcement of 5 or 600 men. This re-established the left under Pigot and saved our honour.

The wretched blunder of the over-sized balls sprung from the dotage of an officer of rank in that corps, who spends his whole time in dallying with the schoolmaster's daughters. God knows he is old enough—he is no Sampson—yet he must have his Dalilah.

Another circumstance equally true and astonishing is that Gen. Gage had undoubted intelligence early in May that the rebels intended to possess Bunker's hill; yet no step was taken to secure that important post, though it commanded all the north part of the town. He likewise had an exact return of the corps that composed the rebel army then investing the town; of every piece of cannon they possessed; of their intended lines of blockade; and of the numbers expected and on their march from the other provinces.

We are all wrong at the head. My mind cannot help dwelling upon our cursed mistakes. Such ill conduct at the first out-set argues a gross ignorance of the most common rules of the profession, and gives us, for the future, anxious forebodings. I have lost some of those I most valued. This madness or ignorance nothing can excuse. The brave men's lives were wantonly thrown away. Our conductor as much murdered them as if he had cut their throats himself on Boston Common. Had he fallen, ought we to have regretted him? —Detail and Conduct of the American War, pp. 13-15.

6. GENTLEMEN FALL BY THE HANDS OF DESPICABLE WRETCHES: ANN HULTON

... From the heights of this place we have a view of the whole town, the harbor and country round for a great extent, and last Saturday I was a spectator of a most awful scene my eyes ever beheld.

On the morning of the 17th it was observed that the rebels had thrown up a breastwork and were preparing to open a battery upon the heights above Charlestown, from whence they might incommode the shipping and destroy the north part of Boston. Immediately a cannonading began from the battery in the north part of the town and the ships of war on those works and on the enemy wherever they could be discovered within reach of their guns.

Soon after eleven o'clock the grenadiers, light infantry, marines and two battalions marched out of their encampments and embarked in boats, and before high water were landed on a point of land to the eastward of Charlestown, and they immediately took post on a little eminence. Great was our trepidation lest they should be attacked by superior numbers before they could be all assembled and properly prepared, but more boats arrived, and the whole advanced, some on the other side, round the hill where the battery was erected, and some through part of Charlestown.

On that side of the hill which was not visible from Boston, it seems very strong lines were thrown up and were occupied by many thousands of the rebels. The troops advanced with great ardor towards the intrenchments, but were much galled in the assault, both from the artillery and the small arms, and many brave officers and men were killed and wounded. As soon as they got to the intrenchments, the rebels fled, and many of them were killed in the trenches and in their flight. The marines, in marching through part of Charlestown, were fired at from the houses, and there fell their brave commander, Major Pitcairn. His son was likewise wounded. Hearing his father was killed, he cried out, "I have lost my father"; immediately the corps returned, "We have lost our father." How glorious to die with such an epitaph!

Upon the firing from the houses, the town was immediately set in flames, and at four o'clock we saw the fire and the sword, all the horrors of war raging. The town was burning all night; the rebels sheltered themselves in the adjacent hills and the neighborhood of Cambridge, and the army possessed themselves of Charlestown Neck. We were exulting in seeing the flight of our enemies, but in an hour or two we had occasion to mourn and lament. Dear was the purchase of our safety! In the evening the streets were filled with the wounded and the dying; the sight of which, with the lamentations of the women and children over their husbands and fathers, pierced one to the soul. We were now every moment hearing of some officer or other of our friends and acquaintance who had fallen in our defence and in supporting the honor of our country. . . .

The rebels have occupied a hill about a mile from Charlestown Neck; they are very numerous, and have thrown up intrenchments, and are raising a redoubt on the higher part, whilst the ships and troops cannonade them wherever they can reach them. In the same manner, on the other side of Boston Neck, on the high ground above Roxbury meeting [house], the rebels are intrenching and raising a battery. Such is our present situation.

In this army are many of noble family, many very respectable, virtuous and amiable characters, and it grieves one that gentlemen, brave British soldiers, should fall by the hands of such despicable wretches as compose the banditti of the country; amongst whom there is not one that has the least pretension to be called a gentleman. They are a most rude, depraved, degenerate race, and it is a mortification to us that they speak English and can trace themselves from that stock.

Since Adams went to Philadelphia, one Warren, a rascally patriot and apothecary of this town, has had the lead in the Provincial Congress. He signed commissions and acted as President. This fellow happily was killed, in coming out of the trenches the other day, where he had commanded and spirited the people, etc., to defend the lines, which, he assured them, were impregnable. You may judge what the herd must be when such a one is their leader. Here it is only justice to say that there are many worthy people in this province, but that the chief of them are now in Boston, and that amongst the gentlemen of the Council particularly are many respectable and worthy characters.

—HULTON, Letters of a Loyalist Lady, pp. 97-100.

CHAPTER FIVE

The Battle for Boston

AFTER THE battle of Bunker's Hill, Gage was just about where he had been before: weakened by heavy casualties and hemmed in by an American army that seemed to grow constantly in strength. This was, in fact, an illusion; had Gage seized the offensive at once after the battle of June 17 he might well have driven the Americans from their lines. For the Americans were disorganized, and lacked powder, ammunition and supplies. And while Gage did not have the strength for a frontal attack he did control the coastal waters and might well have flanked the Americans by sea.

In July however the American cause took a dramatic turn for the better. Just a month after the Second Continental Congress met in Philadelphia it took the army outside Boston under its wing, and appointed George Washington commander in chief. It was an act second in importance only to the Declaration of Independence the following year.

When, early in July, Washington arrived in Cambridge to take command (not, apparently, under the "Washington" elm) of the forces there, he was appalled at what he found. Though the American forces numbered some 16,000 or 17,000, there was no real army, no unified command, no proper discipline, no adequate commissary, no provision for military supplies, and no money. Worst of all, most of the soldiers had enlisted for short terms only, and insisted on going home when their time was up. Washington's first task was not to fight, but to create an army capable of fighting. To this task he addressed himself with inexhaustible energy, with firmness, and with a patience that sometimes wore thin. Gradually, over the months, he got long-term enlistments, stiffened discipline, built barracks, accumulated supplies, weeded out incompetent officers, pried some money loose from the Congress, and whipped the army together into a fighting force.

Fortunately that summer and fall the British had no stomach for the offensive. Bunker's Hill had been a shock; reinforcements came in slowly; Admiral Graves was not to be relied on. In September Gage was recalled, and Howe appointed to the command, but the new general showed no more energy or initiative than his predecessor. Steadily through the fall and winter months disease, desertion and demoralization took their toll. Reinforcements poured in, but presented an additional burden on the inadequate supply of food, fuel and medicines rather than new strength. The Navy made sporadic displays of force, but without substantial results: in October there was an inglorious attack on Bristol, Rhode Island, to get sheep and cattle; Falmouth, Maine, was gratuitously burned; and throughout the winter there was a series of skirmishes on the islands in the bay, mostly inconclusive.

During December the American army was in danger of total disintegration, but a new army was recruited and drilled and whipped into shape; by January 10, 1776, there were some 8,200 men on the rolls, and by March the number had increased to about 16,000. Washington wished to take the offensive, or at least to draw Howe out for a fight, but the shortage of powder and of guns frustrated this plan. Late in January, Henry Knox brought in 45 cannon and 16 mortars which he had hauled across the snow from Lake Champlain; the supply of powder improved, and Washington felt strong enough to act. To his brother-in-law Burwell Bassett he wrote that "we are preparing to take possession of a post which will, it is generally thought, bring on a rumpus between us and the enemy." The post was Dorchester Heights.

On March 4 General John Thomas with 2,000 men moved onto Dorchester Heights and threw up prefabricated defenses. It was Bunker's Hill over again, only this time the Americans held all the advantages—and this time there was a new commanding general. Howe decided to counterattack at once, but bad weather intervened, and when the weather cleared, it was too late. When on March 16 Washington fortified Foster's Hill (or Nook's Hill) commanding Boston, Howe saw that the game was up, and next morning he abandoned the city which the British had held so long. Ten days later the whole army sailed for Halifax, taking with them more than a thousand hapless Loyalists.

Thus, eleven months after the opening of hostilities, the battle for Boston came to an end. Confronted by colonial intransigence, the British had chosen to be tough, and their policy of toughness had brought them disaster everywhere. They had been defeated along the road from Concord to Boston, defeated again at Bunker's Hill—that was now clear—and finally forced out of Boston. New York was in the hands of the Americans, and so too Ticonderoga and Crown Point, and Dunmore had been forced to flee Virginia. After only one year of fighting the British had been ousted from their colonies. And meantime the Americans had moved steadily toward independence. They had created state governments that carried on all the ordinary business of government; they had cemented a political union; they had organized and maintained an army; they had inspired an American party in Parliament, and in Britain; they had excited the sympathy and the timid aid of France. And in Jefferson, in Franklin, in John Adams, in John Jay, and in Washington they had found leaders far more capable than those who directed the destinies of Britain at this crisis.

I. WASHINGTON IS APPOINTED TO THE COMMAND OF THE AMERICAN ARMY

The Second Continental Congress met in Philadelphia on May 10, 1775; it took members a month to get around to the pressing military problems presented by the fighting around Boston. Early in June the Congress committed itself to some kind of responsibility for the armies besieging Boston, and on June 15 it took a step which was to prove decisive. On motion from John Adams it unanimously appointed George Washington "to command all the continental forces." The reasons for the choice of Washington were obvious and compelling. Of all Americans he had the most lustrous military reputation; he was from Virginia and both Adamses thought it desirable to play down the New England role by electing a Southerner to the chief command; he was rich and aristocratic; a moderate but indubitably a Patriot, he had a bearing and a character that inspired confidence. It is suggestive that no other name was proposed or even considered (except perhaps by Hancock: himself); it is interesting that the usually jaundiced John Adams could write to his wife Abigail of "the modest and virtuous, the amiable, generous, and brave George Washington."

Washington accepted the command in a speech of simplicity and modesty; and with a characteristic gesture he added that he would refuse any compensation above his expenses; throughout the war he held rigorously to this decision.

At the same time Congress pushed ahead with a more elaborate military establishment. Four major generals were named: Artemas Ward, then commanding the New England troops before Boston; Charles Lee, an adventurer and soldier of fortune who had fought in both the British and Polish armies, and who capitalized on his inflated reputation by holding Congress up for a total of some £11,000 in payment of debts and other obligations; Philip Schuyler of New York who, like Washington, had a military reputation from the French and Indian War, vast estates, aristocratic connections and a zeal for liberty, but who lacked Washington's military competence; and finally Connecticut's hero, the ancient but still active General Israel Putnam.

Washington left Philadelphia on June 23 and arrived in Cambridge ten days later. There he was met by a delegation from the Massachusetts Provincial Congress with an address apologizing for the condition of the army. "The hurry with which it was necessarily collected and the many disadvantages arising from a suspension of government," they said, accounted for much of the difficulty. And the General would also please to remember that the greatest part of the soldiers "have never before seen service; and although naturally brave and of good understanding, yet, for want of experience in military life, have but little knowledge of divers things most essential to the preservation of health and even life." Washington set himself at once to the task of making good these deficiencies, and within three weeks was able to write to General Schuyler—then on duty in New York—that "Confusion and Disorder reigned in every Department. . . . However we mend every Day, and I flatter myself that in a little Time we shall work up these raw materials into good stuff."

1. JOHN ADAMS NOMINATES GEORGE WASHINGTON

From his Autobiography.

. . . Mr. Hancock himself had an ambition to be appointed commander-in-chief. Whether he thought an election a compliment due to him, and intended to have the honor of declining it, or whether he would have accepted, I know not. To the compliment he had some pretensions, for, at that time, his exertions, sacrifices and general merits in the cause of his country had been incomparably greater than those of Colonel Washington. But the delicacy of his health, and his entire want of experience in actual service, though an excellent militia officer, were decisive objections to him in my mind. In canvassing this subject, out of doors, I found too that even among the delegates of Virginia there were difficulties. The apostolical reasonings among themselves, which should be greatest, were not less energetic among the saints of the ancient dominion than they were among us of New England. In several conversations, I found more than one very cool about the appointment of Washington, and particularly Mr. Pendleton was very clear and full against it.

Full of anxieties concerning these confusions, and apprehending daily that we should hear very distressing news from Boston, I walked with Mr. Samuel Adams in the State House yard, for a little exercise and fresh air, before the hour of Congress, and there represented to him the various dangers that surrounded us. He agreed to them all, but said, "What shall we do?" I answered him that he knew I had taken great pains to get our colleagues to agree upon some plan, that we might be unanimous; but he knew that they would pledge themselves to nothing; but I was determined to take a step which should compel them and all the other members of Congress to declare themselves for or against something. "I am determined this morning to make a direct motion that Congress should adopt the army before Boston, and appoint Colonel Washington commander of it." Mr. Adams seemed to think very seriously of it, but said nothing.

Accordingly, when Congress had assembled, I rose in my place, and in as short a speech as the subject would admit, represented the state of the Colonies, the uncertainty in the minds of the people, their great expectation and anxiety, the distresses of the army, the danger of its dissolution, the difficulty of collecting another, and the probability that the British army would take advantage of our delays, march out of Boston, and spread desolation as far as they could go. I concluded with a motion, in form, that Congress would adopt the army at Cambridge, and appoint a General; that though this was not the proper time to nominate a General, yet, as I had reason to believe this was a point of the greatest difficulty, I had no hesitation to declare that I had but one gentleman in my mind for that important command, and that was a gentleman from Virginia who was among us and very well known to all of us, a gentleman whose skill and experience as an officer, whose independent fortune, great talents, and excellent universal character would command the approbation of all America, and unite the cordial exertions of all the Colonies better than any other person in the Union.

Mr. Washington, who happened to sit near the door, as soon as he heard me allude to him, from his usual modesty darted into the library-room. Mr. Hancock—who was our President, which gave me an opportunity to observe his countenance while I was speaking on the state of the Colonies, the army at Cambridge, and the enemy—heard me with visible pleasure; but when I came to describe Washington for the commander, I never remarked a more sudden and striking change of countenance. Mortification and resentment were expressed as forcibly as his face could exhibit them. Mr. Samuel Adams seconded the motion, and that did not soften the President's physiognomy at all.

The subject came under debate, and several gentlemen declared themselves against the appointment of Mr. Washington, not on account of any personal objection against him, but because the army were all from New England, had a General of their own, appeared to be satisfied with him, and had proved themselves able to imprison the British army in Boston, which was all they expected or desired at that time. Mr. Pendleton, of Virginia, Mr. Sherman, of Connecticut, were very explicit in declaring this opinion; Mr. Cushing and several others more faintly expressed their opposition, and their fears of discontents in the army and in New England. Mr. Paine expressed a great opinion of General Ward and a strong friendship for him, having been his classmate at college, or at least his contemporary; but gave no opinion upon the question.

The subject was postponed to a future day. In the mean time, pains were taken out of doors to obtain a unanimity, and the voices were generally so clearly in favor of Washington that the dissentient members were persuaded to withdraw their opposition, and Mr. Washington was nominated, I believe by Mr. Thomas Johnson of Maryland, unanimously elected, and the army adopted.

2. "I DO NOT THINK MYSELF EQUAL TO THE COMMAND"

Mr. President: Tho' I am truly sensible of the high Honour done me in this Appointment, yet I feel great distress from a consciousness that my abilities and Military experience may not be equal to the extensive and important Trust: However as the Congress desires I will enter upon the momentous duty, and exert every power I Possess In their Service for the Support of the glorious Cause: I beg they will accept my most cordial thanks for this distinguished testimony of their Approbation.

But lest some unlucky event should happen unfavourable to my reputation, I beg it may be remembered by every Gentleman in the room, that I this day declare with the utmost sincerity, I do not think myself equal to the Command I am honoured with.

As to pay, Sir, I beg leave to Assure the Congress that as no pecuniary consideration could have tempted me to have accepted this Arduous employment, (at the expence of my domestic ease and happiness) I do not wish to make any profit from it: I will keep an exact Account of my expences; those I doubt not they will discharge and that is all I desire.

3. "A KIND OF DESTINY HAS THROWN ME UPON THIS SERVICE"

George Washington to Martha Washington.

My Dearest:

I am now set down to write to you on a subject which fills me with inexpressible concern, and this concern is greatly aggravated and increased, when I reflect upon the uneasiness I know it will give you. It has been determined in Congress, that the whole army raised for the defence of the American cause shall be put under my care, and that it is necessary for me to proceed immediately to Boston to take upon me the command of it.

You may believe me, my dear Patsy, when I assure you, in the most solemn manner that, so far from seeking this appointment, I have used every endeavor in my power to avoid it, not only from my unwillingness to part with you and the family, but from a consciousness of its being a trust too great for my capacity, and that I should enjoy more real happiness in one month with you at home, than I have the most distant prospect of finding abroad, if my stay were to be seven times seven years. But as it has been a kind of destiny, that has thrown me upon this service, I shall hope that my undertaking it is designed to answer some good purpose. You might, and I suppose did perceive, from the tenor of my letters, that I was apprehensive I could not avoid this appointment, as I did not pretend to intimate when I should return. That was the case. It was utterly out of my power to refuse this appointment, without exposing my character to such censures, as would have reflected dishonor upon myself, and given pain to my friends. This, I am sure, could not, and ought not, to be pleasing to you, and must have lessened me considerably in my own esteem. I shall rely, therefore, confidently on that Providence, which has heretofore preserved and been bountiful to me, not doubting but that I shall return safe to you in the fall. I shall feel no pain from the toil or the danger of the campaign; my unhappiness will flow from the uneasiness I know you will feel from being left alone. I therefore beg, that you will summon your whole fortitude, and pass your time as agreeably as possible. Nothing will give me so much sincere satisfaction as to hear this, and to hear it from your own pen. My earnest and ardent desire is, that you would pursue any plan that is most likely to produce content, and a tolerable degree of tranquillity; as it must add greatly to my uneasy feelings to hear, that you are dissatisfied or complaining at what I really could not avoid.

As life is always uncertain, and common prudence dictates to every man the necessity of settling his temporal concerns, while it is in his power, and while the mind is calm and undisturbed, I have, since I came to this place (for I had not time to do it before I left home) got Colonel Pendleton to draft a will for me, by the directions I gave him, which will I now enclose. The provision made for you in case of my death will, I hope, be agreeable.

I shall add nothing more, as I have several letters to write, but to desire that you will remember me to your friends, and to assure you that I am with the most unfeigned regard, my dear Patsy, your affectionate, &c.

4. ADAM'S FALL: THE TRIP TO CAMBRIDGE

When Congress sent great Washington
All clothed in power and breeches,
To meet old Britain's warlike sons
And make some rebel speeches;

'Twas then he took his gloomy way
Astride his dapple donkeys,
And travelled well, both night and day,
Until he reached the Yankees.

Away from camp, 'bout three miles off,
From Lily he dismounted,
His sergeant brushed his sun-burnt wig
While he the specie counted.

All prinkéd up in full bag-wig,
The shaking notwithstanding,
In leathers tight, oh glorious sight!
He reached the Yankee landing.

The women ran, the darkeys too;
And all the bells, they tolléd;
For Britain's son, by Doodle doo,
We're sure to be consoléd. . . .

Full many a child went into camp,
All dressed in homespun kersey,
To see the greatest rebel scamp
That ever crossed o'er Jersey. . . .

Upon a stump, he placed himself,
Great Washington did he,
And through the nose of lawyer Close Proclaimed great Liberty.

The patriot brave, the patriot fair,
From fervor had grown thinner,
So off they marched, with patriot zeal,
And took a patriot dinner.

5. WASHINGTON SURVEYS THE CONDITION OF THE ARMY

To his brother John Augustine Washington.

Camp at Cambridge, July 27, 1775

On the 2nd Inst. I arrived at this place, after passing through a great deal of delightful Country, covered with grass, (although the Season has been dry) in a very different manner to what our Lands in Virginia are.

I found a mixed multitude of People here, under very little discipline, order, or Government. I found the enemy in possession of a place called Bunker's Hill, on Charles Town Neck, strongly Intrenched, and Fortifying themselves; I found part of our Army on two Hills, (called Winter and Prospect Hills) about a Mile and a quarter from the enemy on Bunker's Hill, in a very insecure state; I found another part of the Army at this Village; and a third part at Roxbury, guarding the Entrance in and out of Boston.

My whole time, since I came here, has been Employed in throwing up Lines of Defence at these three several places; to secure, in the first Instance, our own Troops from any attempts of the Enemy; and, in the next, to cut off all Communication between their troops and the Country; For to do this, and to prevent them from penetrating into the Country with Fire and Sword, and to harass them if they do, is all that is expected of me; and if effected, must totally overthrow the designs of Administration, as the whole Force of Great Britain in the Town and Harbour of Boston can answer no other end than to sink her under the disgrace and weight of the expense. Their Force, including Marines, Tories, &c., are computed, from the best accounts I can get, at about 12,000 Men; ours, including Sick absent, &c., at about 16,000; but then we have a Cemi Circle of Eight or Nine Miles, to guard to every part of which we are obliged to be equally attentive; whilst they, situated as it were in the Center of the Cemicircle, can bend their whole Force (having the entire command of the Water), against any one part of it with equal facility; This renders our Situation not very agreeable, though necessary; however, by incessant labour (Sundays not excepted), we are in a much better posture of defence than when I first came. . . .

The Enemy are sickly, and scarce of Fresh provisions. Beef, which is chiefly got by slaughtering their Milch Cows in Boston, sells from one shilling to 18d. Sterling per lb.; and that it may not get cheaper, or more plenty, I have drove all the Stock, within a considerable distance of this place, back into the Country, out of the Way of the Men of war's Boats; In short, I have, and shall continue to do, every thing in my power to distress them. The Transports are all arrived and their whole Reinforcement is Landed, so that I can see no reason why they should not, if they ever attempt it, come boldly out and put the matter to Issue at once; if they think themselves not strong enough to do this, they surely will carry their Arms (having Ships of War and Transports ready) to some other part of the Continent, or relinquish the dispute; the last of which the Ministry, unless compelled, will never agree to do. Our Works, and those of the Enemy are so near and quite open between that we see every thing that each other is doing. I recollect nothing more worth mentioning. I shall therefore conclude with my best wishes, and love to my Sister and Family, and Compliments to any enquiring Friends, your most affectionate brother.

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, III, 371-373.

II. BOSTON UNDER SIEGE

No other city in America had suffered so much from the quarrel with the mother country as Boston. Troops had been quartered there in 1768, and in 1770 had perpetrated the famous "massacre"; it had been the scene of the most giddy of many "tea parties"; it had been singled out for punishment and perhaps destruction by the Intolerable Acts. Now, after Lexington and Concord, it was an occupied city and a city besieged. Many of its inhabitants had fled the city at the commencement of hostilities, and during the summer Gage permitted others to go. By July its population had declined from 17,000 to less than 7,000 civilians.

Not all of those who remained behind were Loyalists. Some stayed because they had no other place to go; others—like John Andrews—to take care of their property or their business; still others for personal or professional reasons. When Howe finally sailed away in March only about 1,000 Loyalists went with him—a small fraction of the remaining population. Meantime those who chose to stay on in the city suffered all the hardships of the siege and of exposure to the enemy. They endured shortages of food and fuel; they were exposed to the somewhat moderate dangers of bombardment and fire; their property was exposed to the ravages of a soldiery not too particular about distinctions between Loyalists and Rebels.

We give here two accounts from the pens of men who lived through the siege: the inveterate letter writer John Andrews, and Deacon Timothy Newell of the Brattle Street Church; one comment from the ever-vivacious Abigail Adams; one letter from an anonymous British officer whose opinions were equally contemptuous of American ladies and American soldiers; and a ballad which enjoyed wide—and perhaps undeserved—popularity in American camps at the time.

1. "PORK AND BEANS ONE DAY AND BEANS AND PORK ANOTHER"

Your favor of the 2nd May per post came to hand but a few days since. You earnestly request my writing you by every post, at which time you did not consider the embarrassments we are under in town, and that a letter cannot pass without being liable to the inspection of both parties, unless by water. I wrote you by Breck, as well as by Mr. Prince, which letters I presume you have received. If my brother can get a pass to go out, shall give him this to forward, if possible, without inspection. Its hard to stay cooped up here and feed upon salt provissions, more especially without one's wife, Bill, but at the same time would not wish to have her here under the present disagreeable circumstances—though I find an absolute necessity to be here myself, as the soldiery think they have a license to plunder every one's house and store who leaves the town, of which they have given convincing proofs already. And the wanton destruction of property at the late fire makes the duty, in my mind, more incumbent on me.

We have now and then a carcase offered for sale in the market, which formerly we would not have picked up in the street; but bad as it is, it readily sells for eight pence lawful money per lb., and a quarter of lamb when it makes its appearance, which is rarely once a week, sells for a dollar, weighing only three or three and a half pounds. To such shifts has the necessity of the times drove us; wood not scarcely to be got at twenty two shillings a cord. Was it not for a trifle of salt provisions that we have, 'twould be impossible for us to live. Pork and beans one day, and beans and pork another, and fish when we can catch it. Am necessitated to submit to such living or risque the little all I have in the world, which consists in my stock of goods and furniture to the amount of between two and three thousand sterling, as it's said without scruple that those who leave the town forfeit all the effects they leave behind. Whether they hold it up as only a means to detain people or not, I cant say—but in regard to slaves their actions have been consistant with the doctrine, however absurd. It has so far availed as to influence many to stay, who would otherways have gone.

2. TIMOTHY NEWELL DESCRIBES LIFE UNDER BRITISH OCCUPATION

10th July [1775]. Provincials last night attacked the centinels at the lines, and burnt Brown's shop.

12th. Two men of war made a heavy fire on Long Island. The Provincials last night in 65 whale boats and 500 men went over to Long Island and took off 31 head of cattle, with a number of sheep and quantity of hay, and likewise seized on and brought off fourteen of the King's mowers with the family belonging to the island. The next day they returned again and set fire to the mansion house and barn, etc.—this within sight of the man of war, who kept up a constant fire on them.

14th. Last night was awoke by the discharge of cannon on the lines. Master James Lovell, Master Leach, John Hunt, have been imprisoned some time past—all they know why it is so is they are charged with free speaking on the public measures; Dorrington, his son and daughter and the nurse for blowing up fires in the evening—they are charged with giving signals in this way to the army without.

20th. Mr. Carpenter was taken by the night patrol. Upon examination he had swam over to Dorchester and back again, was tried here that day and sentence of death passed on him and to be executed the next day—his coffin brot into the gaol yard, his halter bought and he dressed as criminals are before execution. Sentence was respited and a few days after was pardoned.

23d. The Castle, it is publicly talked, will be dismantled. This evening many guns fired at and from the man of war at N. Boston. Ten or twelve transports it is said sailed this day with 150 soldiers upon a secret expedition for provisions.

August 1st. This week passed tolerably quiet. Last night at half past 12 oclock was awoke with a heavy firing from a man of war at the Provincials on Phip's farm. From the lines at Charlestown and Boston it appeared as if a general attack was made. The firing continued till 6 oclock. The George Tavern was burnt by the Regulars and the house at the light house by the Provincials (about 300) who took about 30 soldiers and a number of carpenters. This morning half past 4 oclock awoke with cannonade and small arms from Charlestown which lasted till eleven oclock after that.

This day was invited by two gentlemen to dine upon rats. The whole of this day till sunset a constant fire up Mistic River from the lines and out centinels at Charlestown and the Provincials from Mount Prospect.

4th. John Gill imprisoned, charged with printing sedition, treason and rebellion.

6th. Skirmishing up Mistic River, upon which the Provincials and they had a skirmish, many shots exchanged but nothing decisive.

15th. Cannonade from the lines most of this afternoon on both sides. The General's fleet of transports arrived from their cruise, having taken from the islands of Gardners, etc., about two thousand sheep, one hundred and ten oxen, butter, eggs, etc., etc.

16th. Cannonade from both lines.

17th. Cannonade again.

19th. Ditto. A 42-pounder split on the lines, killed a bombardier and wounded one or two men.

20th to 25th. Daily firing from the lines and from the centinels on both sides.

27th Sabbath. Cannonading from the lines at Charlestown on new works—a nearer approach, also much firing of small arms.

29th. Several bombs from ditto on ditto in the night.

30th. Ditto. In the night ditto. Bombarding from the lines on Bunkers Hill.

1st Sept. Ditto. Almost constant firing from the centinels at each other. New works arise upon the Neck by the Provincials who approach very near.

11th. Sept. A serjent and 5 men taken by the Provincials at Dorchester.

12th. Went in a boat to relieve a lad blown off in a canoe.

17th. [Oct.] Two floating batteries from the Provincials from Cambridge River fired a number of cannon into the camp at the Common; the shot went thro houses by the Lamb Tavern, etc. A deserter who came in this morning says one of the cannon split and killed and wounded several. 5 or 6 hats, a waistcoat and part of a boat came on shore at the bottom of the Common.

25th. Several nights past the whole army was ordered not to undress. The cannon all loaded with grape shot from a full apprehension the Provincials would make an attack upon the town. The streets paraded all night by the Light Horse.

27th. The spacious Old South Meeting House taken possession of by the Light Horse 17th Regiment of Dragoons commanded by Lieut. Col. Samuel Birch. The pulpit, pews and seats all cut to pieces and carried off in the most savage manner as can be expressed, and destined for a riding school. The beautiful carved pew with the silk furniture of Deacon Hubbard's was taken down and carried to —'s house by an officer and made a hog sty. The above was effected by the solicitation of General Burgoyne.

30th. A soldier, one of the Light-Horse men, was hanged at the head of their camp for attempting to desert. Proclamation issued by General Howe for the inhabitants to sign an Association to take arms, etc.

November 4th. A Proclamation issued for people to give in their names to go out of town, but before the time limited expired a stop was put to it. This like others of the kind seems only designed to continue the vexation of the people.

9th. Several companies of Regulars from Charlestown went over to Phip's farm to take a number of cattle feeding there. The Provincials came upon them and soon drove them on board boats after an engagement. It is said several are wounded and none killed, but they supposed many of the Provincials killed.

16th. Many people turned out of their houses for the troops to enter. The keys of our meeting house cellars demanded of me by Major Sheriff by order of General Howe. Houses, fences, trees, etc., pulled down and carried off for fuel. My wharf and barn pulled down by order of General Robinson. Beef, mutton, pork at 1/6 pr. pound, geese 14/, fowls 6/8. L[awful] M[oney].

19th. A large ship arrived from Plymouth in England with every kind of provisions dead and alive, hogs, sheep, fowls, ducks, eggs, mince meat, etc, ginger-bread, etc. Memorandum 25 regiments of Kings troops now in this distressed town.

24th. November. A transport ship carried about 400 of our inhabitants to Point Shirley. One poor Dutch woman attempted to carry with her about 60 dollars. Morrison the deserter seized them and carried them to the town major. Ten dollars was stopped by him.

3. "THE PRESENT STATE IS THAT OF THE MOST ABJECT SLAVES"

Braintree, 5 July, 1775

I should have been more particular, but I thought you knew every thing that passed here. The present state of the inhabitants of Boston is that of the most abject slaves, under the most cruel and despotic of tyrants. Among many instances I could mention, let me relate one. Upon the 17th of June, printed handbills were posted up at the corners of the streets and upon houses, forbidding any inhabitants to go upon their houses, or upon any eminence, on pain of death; the inhabitants dared not to look out of their houses, nor to be heard or seen to ask a question. Our prisoners were brought over to the Long Wharf, and there lay all night, without any care of their wounds or any resting-place but the pavements, until the next day, when they exchanged it for the jail, since which we hear they are civilly treated.

Their living cannot be good, as they can have no fresh provisions; their beef, we hear, is all gone, and their own wounded men die very fast, so that they have a report that the bullets were poisoned. Fish they cannot have, they have rendered it so difficult to procure; and the admiral is such a villain as to oblige every fishing schooner to pay a dollar every time it goes out. The money that has been paid for passes is incredible. Some have been given ten, twenty, thirty and forty dollars, to get out with a small proportion of their things. It is reported and believed that they have taken up a number of persons and committed them to jail, we know not for what in particular. Master Lovell is confined in the dungeon; a son of Mr. Edes is in jail, and one Wilburt, a ship carpenter, is now upon trial for his life. God alone knows to what length these wretches will go, and I hope restrain their malice.

I would not have you be distressed about me. Danger, they say, makes people valiant. Hitherto I have been distressed, but not dismayed. I have felt for my country and her sons, and have bled with them and for them. Not all the havoc and devastation they have made has wounded me like the death of Warren. We want him in the Senate; we want him in his profession; we want him in the field. We mourn for the citizen, the senator, the physician, and the warrior. May we have others raised up in his room.

4. "AS TO THEIR TAKING UP ARMS, IT IS MERE BULLYING"

Letter from an officer in the British Army.

Boston, November 22, 1775

According to my promise I write to you on my arrival here. The troops are just put into quarters. The workmen at Boston were so mulish that the General was obliged to send to Nova Scotia for carpenters and bricklayers to fit up barracks for our accommodation. The country is very plentiful, and all sorts of provisions cheaper than in London, tho' much risen from such a number of people being got together. The inhabitants of this province retain the religious and civil principles brought over by their forefathers, in the reign of King Charles I, and are at least an hundred years behind hand with the people of England in every refinement. With the most austere show of devotion, they are destitute of every principle or religion of common honesty, and are reckoned the most arrant cheats and hypocrites on the whole continent of America. The women are very handsome, but, like old mother Eve, very frail. Our camp has been as well supplied in that way since we have been on Boston common, as if our tents were pitched on Blackheath.

As to what you hear of their taking up arms to resist the force of England, it is mere bullying, and will go no further than words: whenever it comes to blows, he that can run fastest will think himself best off. Believe me, any two regiments here ought to be decimated, if they did not beat in the field the whole force of the Massachusetts Province; for tho' they are numerous, they are but a mob without order or discipline, and very awkward at handling their arms. If you have ever seen a train-band colonel marching his regiment from Ludgate-hill to the Artillery-Ground, in them you have an epitome of the discipline of an American army.

We expect to pass the winter very quietly. The Saints here begin to relish the money we spend among them, and I believe, notwithstanding all their noise, would be very sorry to part with us.

5. THE IRISHMAN'S EPISTLE TO THE TROOPS IN BOSTON

By my faith, but I think ye're all makers of bulls,
With your brains in your breeches, your —— in your skulls.
Get home with your muskets, and put up your swords,
And look in your books for the meaning of words.
You see now, my honeys, how much you're mistaken,
For Concord by discord can never be beaten.

How brave ye went out with your muskets all bright,
And thought to be-frighten the folks with the sight;
But when you got there how they powdered your pums,
And all the way home how they peppered your ——,
And is it not, honeys, a comical crack,
To be proud in the face, and be shot in the back?

How come ye to think, now, they did not know how To be after their firelocks as smartly as you?
Why, you see now, my honeys, 'tis nothing at all
But to pull at the trigger, and pop goes the ball.

And what have you got now with all your designing,
But a town without victuals to sit down and dine in;
And to look on the ground like a parcel of noodles,
And sing how the Yankees have beaten the Doodles.
I'm sure if you're wise you'll make peace for dinner,
For fighting and fasting will soon make ye thinner.

III. CREATING AN AMERICAN ARMY

Washington could write his friend Schuyler on July 28 that "confusion and disorder reigned in every department," and also that "we mend every day." As the summer wore on it was the confusion and disorder that made the sharpest impression and excited the most passionate observation, though it was perhaps the mending that was ultimately the most important. The problems that confronted Washington when he took command appeared well-nigh insuperable. The army was not an army in any accepted sense of the word, but an agglomeration of forces still technically under state control, and even paid and supplied (after a fashion) by the states; the soldiers were not soldiers in the eighteenth-century sense of the word, but a haphazard collection of volunteers, skillful enough in the use of musket or rifle, but almost wholly without experience or training, disrespectful of officers, fiercely resentful of discipline, ignorant of the rules of hygiene, wasteful and disorderly.

Almost everything was wanting—muskets, powder, lead, blankets, food, medicine, tents, tools and—of course—money.

We give here a potpourri of description and commentary on conditions in the American camps. The first is from the pen of an anonymous British officer and describes conditions between Lexington and Bunker's Hill; the second from the same Reverend William Emerson to whom we owe one of the best accounts of Concord. The third and most circumstantial picture is drawn by the gifted young Benjamin Thompson of Woburn, Massachusetts, and Concord, New Hampshire. A protégé of Governor Wentworth—who made him a major in the New Hampshire Provincial Regiment at twenty—Thompson had at first wavered between the Patriot and Royal causes and then—probably because he got better terms—thrown in his lot with the British. Though as commander of a regiment in the South and on Long Island he later inflicted a good deal of damage on the Americans, and then lived the rest of his life abroad (as Count Rumford of the Holy Roman Empire), he provided in his will for a chair of physics at Harvard College. A final letter describes some of the difficulties Washington experienced with the riflemen from Pennsylvania and Virginia—good soldiers, but better suited to frontier warfare against the Indians than to the discipline of an army camp.

1. "A DRUNKEN, CANTING, LYING, PRAYING RABBLE"

My curiosity led me to make use of the privilege of my profession to visit the New-England camp, and some as acquaintances in it who had formerly been my fellow-students at Edinburgh. Among others I saw ——— who attends a number of those that were wounded on the 19th of April. I did not think it fair to ask him the particulars of that day, as we are on different sides; but he assured their loss greatly exceeds that of the regulars.

There is a large body of them in arms near the town of Boston. Their camp and quarters are plentifully supplied with all sorts of provisions, and the roads are crowded with carts and carriages, bringing them rum, cyder, etc., from the neighbouring towns, for without New-England rum, a New-England army could not be kept together; they could neither fight nor say their prayers, one with another; they drink at least a bottle of it a man a day. I had the honour to see several of their great generals, and among the rest, General Judadah Pribble: He is a stout looking old fellow, seems to be turned of 70.

This army, which you will hear so much said, and see so much wrote about, is truly nothing but a drunken, canting, lying, praying, hypocritical rabble, without order, subjection, discipline, or cleanliness; and must fall to pieces of itself in the course of three months, notwithstanding every endeavour of their leaders, teachers, and preachers, though the last are the most canting, hypocritical, lying scoundrels that this or any other country ever afforded. You are mistaken, if you think they are Presbyterian; they are Congregationists, divided and subdivided into a variety of distinctions, the descendants of Oliver Cromwell's army, who truly inherit the spirit which was the occasion of so much bloodshed in your country from the year 1642 till the Restoration, but these people are happily placed at a distance from you, and though they may occasion a little expence of men and money before they are reduced to order, yet they cannot extend the calamities of war to your island. They have not been hitherto the least molested since the affair at Lexington. Time has been given for their passions to subside, but I do not suppose that the General's patience will continue much longer; he is at present confined to the town of Boston, and all supplies from the country stopped, and both the navy and the army live upon salt provisions of that sort; I am well informed, there are nine months provisions in the town.

2. THE REVEREND WILLIAM EMERSON DESCRIBES CONDITIONS IN THE AMERICAN CAMP

'Tis also very diverting to walk among the camps. They are as different in their form as the owners are in their dress; and every tent is a portraiture of the temper and taste of the persons that incamp in it. Some are made of boards, some of sailcloth, and some partly of one and partly of the other. Others are made of stone and turf, and others again of birch and other brush. Some are thrown up in a hurry and look as if they could not help it—mere necessity—others are curiously wrought with doors and windows done with wreaths and withes in the manner of a basket. Some are your proper tents and marquees, and look like the regular camp of the enemy. These are the Rhode-Islanders, who are furnished with tent equipage from among ourselves and every thing in the most exact English taste. However I think that the great variety of the American camp is, upon the whole, rather a beauty than a blemish to the army. . . .

There is a great overturning in camp as to order and regularity. New lords new laws. The Generals Washington and Lee are upon the lines every day. New orders from his Excellency are read to the respective regiments every morning after prayers. The strictest government is taking place, and great distinction is made between officers and soldiers. Everyone is made to know his place and keep it, or be tied up and receive not 1000 but thirty or forty lashes according to his crime. Thousands are at work every day from four till eleven o'clock in the morning. It is surprising how much work has been done.

—FRENCH, First Year of the American Revolution, pp. 300-301.

3. THE AMERICAN SOLDIERS ARE DIRTY, NASTY, INSUBORDINATE AND QUARRELSONE

Observations by Benjamin Thompson (afterward Count Rumford).

Boston, November 4, 1775

. . . The army in general is not very badly accoutered, but most wretchedly clothed, and as dirty a set of mortals as ever disgraced the name of a soldier. They have had no clothes of any sort provided for them by the Congress (except the detachment of 1,133 that are gone to Canada under Col. Arnold, who had each of them a new coat and a linen frock served out to them before they set out), tho' the army in general, and the Massachusetts forces in particular, had encouragement of having coats given them by way of bounty for inlisting. And the neglect of the Congress to fulfill their promise in this respect has been the source of not a little uneasiness among the soldiers.

They have no women in the camp to do washing for the men, and they in general not being used to doing things of this sort, and thinking it rather a disparagement to them, choose rather to let their linen, etc., rot upon their backs than to be at the trouble of cleaning 'em themselves. And to this nasty way of life, and to the change of their diet from milk, vegetables, etc., to living almost intirely upon flesh, must be attributed those putrid, malignant and infectious disorders which broke out among them soon after their taking the field, and which have prevailed with unabating fury during the whole summer.

The leading men among them (with their usual art and cunning) have been indefatigable in their endeavors to conceal the real state of the army in this respect, and to convince the world that the soldiers were tolerably healthy. But the contrary has been apparent, even to a demonstration, to every person that had but the smallest acquaintance with their camp. And so great was the prevalence of these disorders in the month of July that out of 4,207 men who were stationed upon Prospect Hill no more than 2,227 were returned fit for duty.

The mortality among them must have been very great, and to this in a great measure must be attributed the present weakness of their regiments; many of which were much stronger when they came into the field. But the number of soldiers that have died in the camp is comparatively small to those vast numbers that have gone off in the interior parts of the country. For immediately upon being taken down with these disorders they have in general been carried back into the country to their own homes, where they have not only died themselves, but by spreading the infection among their relatives and friends have introduced such a general mortality throughout New England as was never known since its first planting. Great numbers have been carried off in all parts of the country. Some towns 'tis said have lost near one-third of their inhabitants; and there is scarce a village but has suffered more or less from the raging virulence of these dreadful disorders. . . .

The soldiers in general are most heartily sick of the service, and I believe it would be with the utmost difficulty that they could be prevailed upon to serve another campaign. The Continental Congress are very sensible of this, and have lately sent a committee to the camp to consult with the general officers upon some method of raising the necessary forces to serve during the winter season, as the greatest part of the army that is now in the field is to be disbanded upon the last day of December.

Whether they will be successful in their endeavours to persuade the soldiers to re-inlist or not, I cannot say, but am rather inclined to think that they will. For as they are men possessed of every species of cunning and artifice, and as their political existence depends upon the existence of the army, they will leave no stone unturned to accomplish their designs.

Notwithstanding the indefatigable endeavours of Mr. Washington and the other generals, and particularly of Adjutant General Gates, to arrange and discipline the army, yet any tolerable degree of order and subordination is what they are totally unacquainted with in the rebel camp. And the doctrines of independence and levellism have been so effectually sown throughout the country, and so universally imbibed by all ranks of men, that I apprehend it will be with the greatest difficulty that the inferior officers and soldiers will be ever brought to any tolerable degree of subjection to the commands of their superiors.

Many of their leading men are not insensible of this, and I have often heard them lament that the existence of that very spirit which induced the common people to take up arms and resist the authority of Great Britain, should induce them to resist the authority of their own officers, and by that means effectually prevent their ever making good soldiers.

Another great reason why it is impossible to introduce a proper degree of subordination in the rebel army is the great degree of equality as to birth, fortune and education that universally prevails among them. For men cannot bear to be commanded by others that are their superiors in nothing but in having had the good fortune to get a superior commission, for which perhaps they stood equally fair. And in addition to this, the officers and men are not only in general very nearly upon a par as to birth, fortune, etc., but in particular regiments are most commonly neighbours and acquaintances, and as such can with less patience submit to that degree of absolute submission and subordination which is necessary to form a well-disciplined corps.

Another reason why the army can never be well united and regulated is the disagreement and jealousies between the different troops from the different Colonies; which must never fail to create disaffection and uneasiness among them. The Massachusetts forces already complain very loudly of the partiality of the General to the Virginians, and have even gone so far as to tax him with taking pleasure in bringing their officers to court martials, and having them cashiered that he may fill their places with his friends from that quarter. The gentlemen from the Southern Colonies, in their turn, complain of the enormous proportion of New England officers in the army, and particularly of those belonging to the province of Massachusetts Bay, and say, as the cause is now become a common one, and the experience is general, they ought to have an equal chance for command with their neighbours.

Thus have these jealousies and uneasiness already begun which I think cannot fail to increase and grow every day more and more interesting, and if they do not finally destroy the very existence of the army (which I think they bid very fair to do), yet must unavoidably render it much less formidable than it otherways might have been.

Of all useless sets of men that ever incumbered an army, surely the boasted riflemen are certainly the most so. When they came to the camp they had every liberty and indulgence allowed them that they could possibly wish for. They had more pay than any other soldiers; did no duty; were under no restraint from the commands of their officers, but went when and where they pleased, without being subject to be stopped or examined by any one, and did almost intirely as they pleased in every respect whatever. But they have not answered the end for which they were designed in any one article whatever. For instead of being the best marksmen in the world, and picking off every regular that was to be seen, there is scarcely a regiment in camp but can produce men that can beat them at shooting, and the army is now universally convinced that the continual fire which they kept up by the week and month together has had no other effect than to waste their ammunition and convince the King's troops that they are not really so formidable adversaries as they would wish to be thought. . . .

4. THE VIRGINIA REGIMENT OF RIFLEMEN MUTINY OUT OF BOREDOM

Prospect Hill, Sept. 13, 1775

. . . Our camp is separate from all others about 100 yards—all our courts martial and duty was separate—we were excused from all working parties, camp guards, and camp duty. This indulgence, together with the remissness of discipline and care in our young officers, had rendered the men rather insolent for good soldiers. They had twice before broke open our guard house and released their companions who were confined there for small crimes, and once when an offender was brought to the post to be whipped, it was with the utmost difficulty they were kept from rescuing him in the presence of all their officers—they openly damned them and behaved with great insolence. However the colonel was pleased to pardon the man and all remained quiet.

But on Sunday last, the adjutant having confined a serjeant for neglect of duty and murmuring, the men began again and threatened to take him out. The adjutant, being a man of spirit, seized the principal mutineer and put him in also, and coming to report the matter to the colonel, where we, all sitting down after dinner, were alarmed with a huzzaing and upon going out found they had broke open the guard house and taken the man out. The colonel and lieutenant colonel with several of the officers and friends seized the fellow from amongst them and ordered a guard to take him to Cambridge at the Main Guard, which was done without any violent opposition, but in about 20 minutes 32 of Capt. Ross's company with their loaded rifles swore by God they would go to the Main Guard and release the man or lose their lives, and set off as hard as they could run—it was in vain to attempt stopping them.

We stayed in camp and kept the others quiet—sent word to General Washington, who reinforced the guard to 500 men with fixed bayonets and loaded pieces. Col. Hitchcock's regiment (being the one next us) was ordered under arms and some part of General Green's brigade (as the generals were determined to subdue by force the mutineers and did not know how far it might spread in our battalion). Generals Washington, Lee and Green came immediately, and our 32 mutineers who had gone about half a mile towards Cambridge and taken possession of a hill and woods, beginning to be frightened at their proceedings, were not so hardened but upon the General's ordering them to ground their arms they did it immediately. The General then ordered another of our company's (Capt. Nagles) to surround them with their loaded guns, which was immediately done and did the company great honor. However, to convince our people (as I suppose, mind) that it did not altogether depend upon themselves, he ordered two of the ring leaders to be bound. I was glad to find our men all true and ready to do their duty except these 32 rascals—26 were conveyed to the Quarter Guard on Prospect Hill and 6 of the principals to the Main Guard.

You cannot conceive what disgrace we are all in and how much the General is chagrined that only one regiment should come from the South and that set so infamous an example: and in order that idleness shall not be a further bane to us, the general orders on Monday were "That Col. Thompson's regiment shall be upon all parties of fatigue (working parties) and do all other camp duty with any other regiment."

The men have since been tried by a general court martial and convicted of mutiny and were only fined 20s each for the use of the hospital—too small a punishment for so base a crime and mitigated no doubt on account of their having come so far to serve the cause and its being the first crime. The men are returned to their camp, seem exceedingly sorry for their misbehavior and promise amendment.

This will, I hope, awaken the attention of our officers to their duty (for to their remissness I charge our whole disgrace) and the men being employed will yet no doubt do honor to their provinces, for this much I can say for them: that upon every alarm it was impossible for men to behave with more readiness or attend better to their duty; it is only in the camp that we cut a poor figure. Tomorrow morning or some time in the day may perhaps restore our honor, if we behave in the day of battle as well as I hope we shall; you must know that this is a conjecture of my own and founded on no better materials than a poor unexperienced judgement.

—LUKENS, "Letter," American Historical Record, I, 547-548.

IV. HOLDING THE ARMY TOGETHER

Undoubtedly the most difficult and vexatious of the many problems that confronted General Washington was the elementary one of holding the army together. Most of the soldiers had enlisted only until the end of the year, and the terms of enlistment of the Connecticut militia ran out on December 10, 1775. Some of the soldiers sought to anticipate their freedom by going home early; many of those who did leave took their muskets with them. Notwithstanding the most moving appeals from Washington and others, few of those whose time was up were willing to re-enlist. During December the army seemed to melt away, and Washington was fearful that the British would learn of his predicament and seize the offensive—as indeed they should have done. In January 1776 things took a turn for the better. Of the 7,000 or so due to go home, almost half finally re-enlisted, an example of patriotism which it would have been difficult to match in Britain at that time. On January 1 Washington flew the first Continental flag; there is some dispute about its pattern, but all agree that it contained thirteen red and white stripes. During January vacancies were filled up by re-enlistments and by new contingents that poured in not only from the New England states but from the states to the south, and the army increased to over 10,000 effectives.

We give quotations from a diary and general orders that illuminate the problem of discipline and re-enlistment, and second a group of extracts from the letters of General Washington, chiefly to his quondam secretary, Joseph Reed of Philadelphia. Washington is not ordinarily thought of as a historian, but no other participant in the war contributed so much or so well to the historical records as he did.

1. SIMEON LYMAN REFUSES TO BE TERRIFIED INTO RE-ENLISTMENT

From the journal of a Connecticut soldier.

Wednesday, November 29th, [1775]. In the morning the whole regiment was ordered to parade before the genera[l's] door, and they formed a hollow square, and the general came in and made a speech to us, and then those that would stay till January must follow the fifers and colors, and the captains turned out and they marched round the company several times, and there was about a 100 soldiers turned out. The most of them had listed to stay another year, and they was led down to the colonel's and treated, and the rest was dismissed to return to their tents again, and I washed my clothes, and about sunset we went out and chose 2 corporals, and then they brought 2 bottles of brandy and they drank it, and then they was dismissed.

Thursday, 30th. About 12 o'clock they fired about 10 cannon to salute. In the afternoon we was ordered out to see who would stay 3 weeks longer, and there was but three that would stay and they had listed to stay another year, and they dismissed them.

December, Friday, 1st. We was ordered to parade before the general's door, the whole regiment, and General Lee and General Solivan came out, and those that would not stay 4 days longer after their enlistments was out they was ordered to turn out, and there was about 3 quarters turned out, and we was ordered to form a hollow square, and General Lee came in and the first words was "Men, I do not know what to call you; [you] are the worst of all creatures," and flung and curst and swore at us, and said if we would not stay he would order us to go on Bunker Hill and if we would not go he would order the riflemen to fire at us, and they talked they would take our guns and take our names down, and our lieutenants begged of us to stay and we went and joined the rest, and they got about 10 of their guns, and the men was marched off, and the general said that they should go to the work house and be confined, and they agreed to stay the four days, and they gave them a dram, and the colonel told us that he would give us another the next morning, and we was dismissed. There was one that was a mind to have one of his mates turn out with him, and the general see him and he caught his gun out of his hands and struck him on the head and ordered him to be put under guard.

Saturday, 2d. I was on quarter guard in the morning. They was paraded before the colonel's door and he gave us a dram, and then they read some new orders to us and they said that we must not go out of our brigade without a written pass from our captain, and before night there was a paper set up on the general's door not to let the soldiers have any victual if they would not stay 3 weeks longer, and they said that they was 50 miles in the country, and some was mad and said they would not stay the 4 days, and the paper was took down as soon as it was dark, and another put up that General Lee was a fool and if he had not come here we should not know it. The sentries fired at each other all day by spells, and at night our guard took 4 of their horses, and the mortar piece that our men took from the regulars was brought to Cambridge. It was 13 inches across. They brought several chests of small arms, and General Put[nam] dashed a bottle on it and called it the royal congress.

Sunday, 3d. It was my turn to cook, and at night we had orders that if we would stay till 10th we should have a written pass, and we felt a good deal better for it.

Monday, 4th. I wrote a letter and drew off the advertisement that was sat up to keep us from having anything on the road. . . .

Saturday, 9th. The whole regiment was ordered out on the parade, and we was ordered to stand three deep, and the captains was in the front and the luten and the sergeants in the rear, and the general came round the whole, and we all made a salute to him, and then we was ordered to march down before the general's door, and those that was agoing to stay another year should march out and front the regiments, and they was dismissed to go to their tents, and the officers was ordered to view our arms, and then we was dismissed and we came home, and then we was ordered to turn [in] our guns and ammunition and our guns was to be priced, and orders was that all that was not well might march off, and those that had sent for horses and hey (no others) sot off, and when it came night we had orders to go on Plowd Hill and handle the lances all night, and they all said they would not go, and they did not get one.

Sunday, 10th. In the morning we was ordered to parade before the general's door, and we was counted off and dismissed, and we we[nt] to the luten and he gave us a dram, and then we marched off to Cambridge and I see the brass mortar piece, and then we marched to Watertown and then to Waltham and then to Western, then to Sutbury. There we stayed all night and I got a good supper and lay in a good bed. We traveled 15 miles and it was wet and sloppy and it rained all night.

2. THE CONNECTICUT TROOPS DEPART

GENERAL ORDERS

Head Quarters, Cambridge, December 3, 1775

Parole Sawbridge. Countersign Hartley.

It is with surprise and Astonishment The General learns, that notwithstanding the Information that was communicated to the Connecticut Troops, of the Relief being ordered to supply their places, by the 10th of this month; that many of them have taken their Army with them and gone off, not only without leave, but contrary to express Orders; this is therefore to inform those who remain, that the General has sent an Express to the Governor of Connecticut, with the names of such men as have left the Camp, in Order, that they may be dealt with, in a manner suited to the Ignominy of their behaviour. The General also informs those who remain, that it is necessary for them to obtain a written discharge, from the Commanding Officer of the Regt. they belong to, when they are dismissed on the 10th Instant; that they may be distinguished from, and not treated, as Deserters.

The Colonels and commanding Officers of the Connecticut Regiments, are to give in the Names of all those of their respective regiments, for the purpose above mentioned.

3. GENERAL WASHINGTON DESCRIBES CONDITIONS IN THE AMERICAN ARMY

To the New York Legislature.

Camp at Cambridge, August 8, 1775

Gentlemen: It must give great concern to any Considerate Mind that, when this whole Continent, at vast expense of Blood and Treasure, is endeavouring to Establish Liberties on the most secure and Solid Foundations, not only by a laudable Opposition of Force to Force, but by denying itself the usual advantages of Trade; there are men among us so basely sordid as to Counteract all our Exertions, for the sake of a little Gain. You cannot but have heard that the Distresses of the Ministerial Troops for fresh Provisions and many other Necessaries, at Boston, were very great; It is a Policy, Justifiable by all the Laws of War, to endeavour to increase them; Desertions, Discouragement, and a Dissatisfaction with the Service, besides weakening their strength, are some of the Natural Consequences of such a Situation; and, if continued, might afford the fairest Hope of Success, without further Effusion of human Blood. A vessel cleared lately out of New York for St. Croix, with fresh Provisions, and other Articles, has just gone into Boston, instead of pursuing her Voyage to the West Indies; I have endeavoured to discover the Name of the Captain or Owner, but, as yet, without success. . . . I make no doubt you will be able to discover and expose the Villain. And if you could fall upon some effectual Measures, to prevent the like in future, it would be doing a Signal Service to our Common Country.

To Lund Washington.

Camp at Cambridge, August 20, 1775

... The People of this government have obtained a Character which they by no means deserved; their officers generally speaking are the most indifferent kind of People I ever saw. I have already broke one Colo. and five Captains for Cowardice and for drawing more Pay and Provisions than they had Men in their Companies; there is two more Colos. now under arrest, and to be tried for the same offences; in short they are by no means such Troops, in any respect, as you are led to believe of them from the accts. which are published, but I need not make myself Enemies among them by this declaration, although it is consistent with truth. I dare say the Men would fight very well (if properly Officered) although they are an exceeding dirty and nasty people; had they been properly conducted at Bunkers Hill . . . or those that were there properly supported, the Regulars would have met with a shameful defeat, and a much more considerable loss than they did . . . ; it was for their behaviour on that occasion that the above Officers were broke, for I never spared one that was accused of Cowardice but brot 'em to immediate Tryal. . . .

To Richard Henry Lee.

... As we have now nearly compleated our Lines of Defence, we [have] nothing more, in my opinion, to fear from the Enemy, provided we can keep our men to their duty and make them watchful and vigilant; but it is among the most difficult tasks I ever undertook in my life to induce these people to believe that there is, or can be, danger till the Bayonet is pushed at their Breasts; not that it proceeds from any uncommon prowess, but rather from an unaccountable kind of stupidity in the lower class of these people which, believe me, prevails but too generally among the officers of the Massachusetts part of the Army who are nearly of the same kidney with the Privates, and adds not a little to my difficulties; as there is no such thing as getting of officers of this stamp to exert themselves in carrying orders into execution—to curry favor with the men (by whom they were chosen, and on whose smiles possibly they may think they may again rely) seems to be one of the principal objects of their attention. . . .

There has been so many great, and capital errors, and abuses to rectify—so many examples to make—and so little Inclination in the officers of inferior Rank to contribute their aid to accomplish this work, that my life has been nothing else (since I came here) but one continued round of annoyance and fatigue; in short no pecuniary recompense could induce me to undergo what I have, especially as I expect, by shewing so little countenance to irregularities and publick abuses, to render myself very obnoxious to a greater part of these People.

To the President of Congress.

Camp at Cambridge, September 21, 1775

... It gives me great Pain to be obliged to sollicit the Attention of the Hon. Congress to the State of the Army, in Terms which imply the Slightest Apprehension of being neglected: But my Situation is inexpressibly distressing to see the Winter fast approaching upon a naked Army, the time of their Service within a few Weeks of expiring, and no Provision yet made for such important Events. Added to this the Military Chest is totally exhausted. The Paymaster has not a single Dollar in Hand. The Commissary General assures me he has strained his Credit to the utmost for the Subsistence of the Army:—The Quarter Master General is precisely in the same situation, and the greater part of the Army in a State not far from mutiny, upon the Deduction from their stated Allowance. I know not to whom to impute this Failure, but I am of opinion, if the Evil is not immediately remedied and more Punctuality observed in the future, the Army must absolutely break up.

To Joseph Reed.

. . . What an astonishing thing it is that those who are employed to sign the Continental bills should not be able, or inclined, to do it as fast as they are wanted. They will prove the destruction of the army, if they are not more attentive and diligent. Such a dearth of public spirit, and want of virtue, such stock-jobbing, and fertility in all the low arts to obtain advantages of one kind or another, in this great change of military arrangement, I never saw before, and pray God I may never be witness to again. What will be the ultimate end of these manoeuvres is beyond my scan. I tremble at the prospect. We have been till this time enlisting about three thousand five hundred men. To engage these I have been obliged to allow furloughs as far as fifty men a regiment, and the Officers I am persuaded indulge as many more. The Connecticut troops will not be prevailed upon to stay longer than their term (saving those who have enlisted for the next campaign, and mostly on furlough), and such a dirty, mercenary spirit pervades the whole, that I should not be at all surprised at any disaster that may happen. In short, after the last of this month our lines will be so weakened, that the minutemen and militia must be called in for their defence; these, being under no kind of government themselves, will destroy the little subordination I have been laboring to establish, and run me into one evil whilst I am endeavoring to avoid another; but the lesser must be chosen. Could I have foreseen what I have, and am likely to experience, no consideration upon earth should have induced me to accept this command. A regiment or any subordinate department would have been accompanied with ten times the satisfaction, and perhaps the honor.

To Joseph Reed.

Cambridge, January 4, 1776

. . . It is easier to conceive than to describe the situation of my mind for some time past, and my feelings under our present circumstances. Search the vast volumes of history through, and I much question whether a case similar to ours is to be found; to wit, to maintain a post against the flower of the British troops for six months together, without —, and at the end of them to have one army disbanded and another to raise within the same distance of a reinforced enemy. It is too much to attempt. What may be the final issue of the last manoeuvre, time only can tell. I wish this month was well over our heads. The same desire of retiring into a chimney-corner seized the troops of New Hampshire, Rhode Island, and Massachusetts, (so soon as their time expired,) as had worked upon those of Connecticut, notwithstanding many of them made a tender of their services to continue, till the lines could be sufficiently strengthened. We are now left with a good deal less than half raised regiments, and about five thousand militia, who only stand engaged to the middle of this month; when, according to custom, they will depart, let the necessity of their stay be never so urgent. Thus it is, that for more than two months past, I have scarcely emerged from one difficulty before I have plunged into another. How it will end, God in his great goodness will direct. I am thankful for his protection to this time. We are told that we shall soon get the army completed, but I have been told so many things which have never come to pass, that I distrust every thing. . . .

To Joseph Reed.

Cambridge, February 10, 1776

. . . I know the unhappy predicament I stand in; I know that much is expected of me; I know, that without men, without arms, without ammunition, without any thing fit for the accommodation of a soldier, little is to be done; and, which is mortifying, I know, that I cannot stand justified to the world without exposing my own weakness, and injuring the cause, by declaring my wants, which I am determined not to do, further than unavoidable necessity brings every man acquainted with them.

If, under these disadvantages, I am able to keep above water, (as it were) in the esteem of mankind, I shall feel myself happy; but if, from the unknown peculiarity of my circumstances, I suffer in the opinion of the world, I shall not think you take the freedom of a friend, if you conceal the reflections that may be cast upon my conduct. My own situation feels so irksome to me at times, that, if I did not consult the public good, more than my own tranquillity, I should long ere this have put every thing to the cast of a Dye. So far from my having an army of twenty thousand men well armed &c., I have been here with less than one half of it, including sick, furloughed, and on command, and those neither armed nor clothed, as they should be. In short, my situation has been such, that I have been obliged to use art to conceal it from my own officers. The Congress, as you observe, expect, I believe, that I should do more than others,—for whilst they compel me to enlist men without a bounty, they give 40 dollars to others, which will, I expect, put a stand to our enlistments; for notwithstanding all the public virtue which is ascrib'd to these people, there is no nation under the sun, (that I ever came across) pay greater adoration to money than they do. I am pleas'd to find that your Battalions are cloathed and look well, and that they are filing off for Canada. I wish I could say that the troops here had altered much in Dress or appearance. Our regiments are little more than half compleat, and recruiting nearly at a stand. In all my letters I fail not the mention of Tents, and now perceive that notice is taken of yr. application. I have been convinced, by General Howe's conduct, that he has either been very ignorant of our situation (which I do not believe) or that he has received positive orders (which, I think, is natural to conclude) not to put anything to the hazard till his reinforcements arrive; otherwise there has been time since the first of December, that we must have fought like men to have maintained these Lines, so great is their extent. . . .

V. THE BRITISH IN BOSTON ARE FRUSTRATED AND BORED

Gage should have abandoned Boston after the flight from Concord, and certainly after Bunker's Hill, but there were persuasive reasons why neither he nor his successor felt that they could do so. They did not want to appear to be driven out by the Americans: neither their pride nor their government would have stood for that. They did not have enough shipping to transport the army and the governmental and Loyalist dependents, along with accumulated supplies and material of war. And, perhaps most important of all, they did not have anywhere to go. So, notwithstanding the fact that strategically Boston was no longer of any value to them, and that by allowing themselves to be besieged they tied up the largest army and naval forces available to suppress the rebellion, they hung on.

Boston was not a very pleasant city for an occupying army, and both officers and men seem to have had a dull time of it, though it did have the advantage of being comparatively safe. Officers consoled themselves with amateur dramatics, and a riding academy in the Old South Church and—if we are to trust one letter writer—with complaisant Boston girls; the privates did not have even these consolations. The whole army suffered from scurvy and from smallpox which “raged in the streets and cantonments.” Almost everything that the army needed, except fish, had to be brought in from England, Canada or the West Indies at some risk and great expense: food, clothing, medicines, ammunition, fodder. At first the army used whatever wood was available for fuel; they tore down the houses that still stood in Charlestown, old houses in Boston, barns, fences, even the steeple of the Old North Church, and they cut down many fine trees, including the famous Liberty Elm, which had been a rallying place for the Sons of Liberty. After this supply was exhausted, they depended on the mother country for coal, as for other supplies. Bad fortune attended this as so many other operations of George III's government. A prodigious quantity of supplies was shipped from Britain: 5,000 oxen, 14,000 sheep, 10,000 butts of beer, oats, hay, flour and other necessities, but the transports were delayed, the food rotted, the flour mildewed, half the animals died; when the fleet neared American waters it was scattered by storm, some of the ships driven to the West Indies, others picked up by American privateers; in the end only a fraction of the provisions reached Boston.

1. "THEY GROW DAILY MORE BOLD"

As far as I can guess from a matter not perfectly known, we at present are worse off than the rebels. In point of numbers they so far surpass us that we are like a few children in the midst of a large crowd. Trusting to this superiority, they grow daily more and more bold, menacing us most insolently; and we fear when the days shorten and dark nights come on, they'll put some of their threats in execution, unless other reinforcements and a fleet of war arrive soon. They know our situation, as well as we do ourselves, from the villains that are left in town, who acquaint them with all our proceedings, making signals by night with gunpowder, and at day, out of church steeples. About three weeks ago three fellows were taken out of one of the latter, who confess they had been so employed for seven days. Another was caught last week swimming over to the rebels with one of their General's passes in his pocket. He will be hanged in a day or two. Since we have been here we have been reinforced by four regiments; but many of the men are ill with fluxes, occasioned by the bad water which they got on landing, and the want of fresh provisions.

No action has happened since the 17th of June; a few shot have been exchanged by scouting parties: one morning they beat in our advanced guard, and burnt the guard-house; and on the 19th instant they set fire to the light house and one of our men of war lying but a mile from it; as it was calm we could not get at them, their whale-boats, in which they made their escape, out-rowing any of our boats, and a small island lying between them and the ship prevented her firing on them. They took from the light-house a six-pounder and a swivel.

2. THE BRITISH ENTERTAIN THEMSELVES WITH AMATEUR THEATRICALS

From the Narrative Journal of Lieutenant Martin Hunter of the British Light Infantry.

I was appointed Lieutenant in Orders next day [after the battle of Bunker's Hill], very vain of my promotion, and a few days after removed to the Light Infantry Company. About a month after the action I was taken ill, brought on by eating green apples, and obliged to go to Boston; and I am very certain I should not have recovered if it had not been for General Grant's good soup. He was so good as [to] send me a basin every day. Fresh meat was not then to be had for love or money. I was indebted to Captain Brown of the 52nd, who was the General's brigade-major, for this mark of the General's favour. Captain Symes of the 52nd was also very good to me. He regularly sent me milk from Charlestown every morning. The scarcity of meat at this time was so great that Lord Percy killed a foal, had it roasted, and invited a party to dinner, and Major Musgrave's fat mare was stolen, killed, and sold in the market for beef.

Redoubts were made on Charlestown Heights, and the troops remained in camp some time after the ground was white with snow. Broke up camp, and the regiment ordered into quarters at Boston. A strong detachment, of a field-officer and three hundred men, were left in the redoubt. This detachment was relieved from Boston every fortnight.

Plays were acted twice every week by the officers and some of the Boston ladies. Miss Sally Fletcher acted the part of Zara. She was a very pretty girl and did it very well. A farce called "The Blockade of Boston," written, I believe, by General Burgoyne, was acted. The enemy knew the night it was to be performed and made an attack on the mill at Charlestown at the very hour that the farce began. I happened to be on duty in the redoubt at Charlestown that night. The enemy came along the mill-dam and surprised a sergeant's guard that was posted at the mill. Some shots were fired, and we all immediately turned out and manned the works. A shot was fired by one of our advanced sentries, and instantly the firing commenced in the redoubt, and it was a considerable time before it could be stopped. Not a man of the enemy was within three miles of us, and the party that came along the mill-dam had effected their object and carried off the sergeant's guard. However, our firing caused a general alarm at Boston, and all the troops got under arms.

An orderly sergeant that was standing outside the playhouse door heard the firing and immediately ran into the playhouse, got upon the stage and cried, "Turn out! Turn out! They are hard at it, hammer and tongs." The whole audience thought that the sergeant was acting a part in the farce, and that he did it so well that there was a general clap, and such a noise that he could not be heard for a considerable time. When the clapping was over he again cried, "What the deuce are you all about? If you won't believe me, by Jasus, you need only go to the door, and there you will see and hear both!" If it was the intention of the enemy to put a stop to the farce for that night they certainly succeeded, as all the officers immediately left the playhouse and joined their regiments.

The detachment at Charlestown was relieved three days after, and we returned to Boston.

3. "NOTHING IS TO BE SEEN BUT DISTRACTIONS AND MELANCHOLY"

Letter sent to England by an officer at Boston.

Boston, August 18, 1775

In my last of the preceding month I informed you of my resolution to resign my commission. Since that time I have made no less than three applications to the generals for that purpose; but all the answer I can obtain is that my request shall be considered of; if it is complied with, be assured that it will be followed by 20 or 30 more, no less a number of brave, honest brother officers having declared their abhorrence of the inhuman service we are upon, and of the shocking outrages that have been committed.

The discontent of our army, occasioned by a scarcity of provisions, the dreadful mortality that has crept into it, and the advancement, insolence and self-sufficiency of a number of Scotch officers, is inconceivable. This very day several common soldiers were reprimanded, and threatened with the most exemplary punishment, for swearing they ought to be commanded by Englishmen, and that they would not sacrifice their lives in an attempt to butcher their friends and fellow subjects for any interested North Briton upon earth. This is the first instance of the kind; but as there is a general murmur, and too much room for complaint, it is likely to be productive of very serious consequences.

Boston, the metropolis of North America (where we now are, and have been so long cooped up) may very justly be termed the grave of England and the slaughter house of America. Nothing is to be heard in it but execrations and clamour; nothing is to be seen but distractions and melancholy, disease and death. The soldiery, and inhabitants likewise, I am sure have done sufficient penance here for the sins of their whole lives. The latter are all ruined; many that were worth 16 or 20 thousand pounds have not a sixpence left; and if any one of them in the anguish of his heart, or the bitterness of his soul, dares mutter any thing like resentment for the loss of his fortune, a distressed family or a murdered friend, he is immediately thrown into a loathsome prison.

If we hear a gun fired upon the Neck, we are all under arms in a moment, and tremble lest the Provincials should force their way into the town and put us all to the sword for our cruelty at Lexington and setting fire to the large, ancient and flourishing town of Charlestown. Certainly our conduct at both places was alike inhuman and unjustifiable; and if heaven punishes us for it, it is no more than we deserve.

With regard to diet, we are obliged to live on salt beef and salt pork, much the greater part of which is as hard as wood, as lean as carion, and as rusty as the devil. Could we have good beer, it would, in some measure, prevent their pernicious effects and alleviate the hardships we labour under; but that is impossible, our only beverage being new rum or spruce liquor, which soon throws us into the bloody flux and runs us off our legs in a few days, and has made the remains of our famished army look like so many regiments of skeletons. Could you view our hospitals and see how fast we drop off, your very heart would bleed within you. Thirty bodies are frequently thrown into a trench at a time, like those of so many dogs, no bell being suffered to toll upon the occasion.

But the glorious expedition we are upon is approved of by an all-wise, all-merciful Ministry; and therefore all must be right. Your news-writers, indeed, have had the modesty to assert that we are in high spirits, and want for nothing; but unless we have a speedy supply of English flour, sheep, oxen, coals, potatoes, porter, cloaths, etc., we shall perish for want of them; and when the Ministry hire transports for sending the various articles I have enumerated, the nation will know what credit is to be given to their pensioned scribes and political observation writers. 'Tis well for our generals that we have no where to run to; for could the men desert, I am of opinion that they would soon be left by themselves; but situated as we are, we must unavoidably live and die together.

We have often endeavoured to fall upon the Provincials by surprize; but their vigilance has as constantly frustrated our design. I am glad of it, and sincerely wish, with you, that an obstinate, bloody minded Junto might be brought to repentance; for it is much more reasonable that a few desperadoes should be hung up, ad terrorem, for an example to posterity, than that the common rights of mankind should be violated, and thousands of innocent people should perish.

VI. THE BRITISH NAVY INEFFECTIVELY HARASSES THE AMERICANS

Meantime what was the Navy doing? That Britain ruled the waves, nobody would deny, yet the British failed egregiously to get any benefit out of their naval superiority. In part this was because Admiral Graves preferred writing dispatches to fighting battles, and was in any event reluctant to assume the offensive without specific orders. In part it was because the First Lord of the Admiralty, Lord Sandwich, was perhaps the most corrupt man in British public life, and as inefficient as he was corrupt. But a large part of the explanation is much simpler: there was nothing much that the Navy could do. There was as yet no American Navy to fight; the hundreds of whale and fishing boats, upon which the Americans depended for their operations in Boston harbor and surrounding waters, were far too small, too swift and too elusive for the guns of the British men-of-war. The Navy could, of course, punish American coastal towns, and beginning in October it proceeded to undertake this, but in a desultory manner. Thus, though half a dozen towns had been marked out for destruction, only Falmouth—now Portland—was actually destroyed. Even when Graves was recalled and replaced by Vice-Admiral Molyneux Shuldham, conditions did not improve; the new vice-admiral's record of bad luck continued to pursue him in American waters.

We give here General Burgoyne's outburst on the futility of the Navy; Admiral Graves's own defense—written some time later and to be taken at a substantial discount; and accounts of the attacks on Bristol, Rhode Island, and Falmouth, Maine.

1. "WHAT THE ADMIRAL IS Not DOING"

General Burgoyne to Lord George Germain.

Boston, Aug. 20, 1775

... It may perhaps be asked in England what is the Admiral doing? I wish I was able to answer that question satisfactorily. But I can only say what he is not doing.

That he is not supplying the troops with sheep and oxen, the dinners of the best of us bear the meagre testimony; the want of broth in the hospitals bears a more melancholy one.

He is not defending his own flocks and herds, for the enemy has repeatedly and in the most insulting manner plundered his own appropriated islands.

He is not defending the other islands in the harbour, for the enemy landed in force, burned the lighthouse at noonday, and killed and took a party of marines almost under the guns of two or three men-of-war.

He is not employing his ships to keep up communication and intelligence with the servants and friends of Government at different parts of the continent, for I do not believe General Gage has received a letter from any correspondents out of Boston these six weeks.

He is surely intent upon greater objects, you will think: supporting in material points the dignity and terror of the British flag, and where a number of botes have been built for the rebels, privateers fitted out, prizes carried in, the King's armed vessels sunk, the crews made prisoners, the officers killed, he is doubtless enforcing instant restitution and reparation by the voice of his cannon and laying the towns in ashes which refuse his terms. Alas! he is not! The British thunder is diverted or controlled by pitiful attentions and Quaker-like scruples, and under such influence insult and impunity, like righteousness and peace, have kissed each other.

I should have hesitated in giving an account that may appear invidious, had not the facts been too notorious to expose me to that censure, and my feelings in this great cause too sensible to observe them without some impatience. Upon the whole when the supineness of this department is added to the diffidence of the other, and the defects of Quartermaster General, Adjutant General, Secretaries and commissaries are superadded to both, they will make altogether a mass of insufficiency that I am afraid would counteract and disappoint the ablest counsels in the world.

—GR. BRIT. HIST. MSS. COMM., 9th Report, III, 81.

2. ADMIRAL GRAVES EXHAUSTS EVERY RESOURCE TO ANNOY THE REBELS

Written in his own defense.

The Admiral was intent upon employing the small force which he had in the most effectual manner for the King's service. He assisted the army with convoys, seamen for their transports, and open boats for their outposts, almost to the disabling of the squadron; for sailors were not now to be procured, and the complements still remaining upon the lowest peace-establishment, a few desertions or a moderate sickness reduced them below the power of acting with any good effect. And what a situation was the Admiral's! Wholly uncertain with respect to the future measures of Administration towards the Colonies; in a very great want of all naval stores, as well as of artificers; on an enemy's coast with winter approaching, when navigation is holden by the Americans themselves to be no longer practicable, and yet the critical situation both of the fleet and army such that his few tattered cruizers must at all hazards be kept out to protect and conduct into port the precarious supplies expected from England, as what alone could enable us to maintain ourselves at Boston; and to sum up all, no accounts, no directions, no orders from home.

However, under all these disadvantages, the Admiral zealously continued to exert every power and exhaust every resource to annoy the Rebels, and to cover our beleaguered army.

3. BRISTOL BUYS OFF A BOMBARDMENT

Extract of a letter from Bristol, in the New York Gazette, October 23, 1775.
October 8, 1775

Yesterday afternoon appeared in sight of Bristol Harbor a very formidable fleet, consisting of sixteen sail, viz.: three men-of-war, one bomb ketch and other armed vessels, all of which, excepting the Glasgow, which ran ashore at Papaquash Point, drew up in a line of battle from one end of the town to the other. Soon after they had moored, a barge came from the Rose to the head of a wharf, with the lieutenant who asked if there were any gentlemen on the wharf? William Bradford, being present, answered yes, whereupon the lieutenant informed him Captain Wallace had a demand to make on the town and desired that two or three of the principal men or magistrates of the town would go on board his ship within an hour and hear his proposals; otherwise hostilities would be commenced against the town.

The above gentleman replied, as a magistrate, that, in his opinion, Captain Wallace was under a greater obligation to come ashore and make his demands known to the town than for the magistrates to go on board his ship to hear them; and added that if Captain Wallace would come to the head of the wharf the next morning, he should be treated as a gentleman, and the town would consider of his demands. With this answer the lieutenant returned on board the Rose.

The inhabitants, being made acquainted with the above association, repaired to the wharf and waited with the utmost impatience for a reply from Captain Wallace, till an hour had expired, when the whole fleet began a most heavy cannonading, and the bomb vessel to bombard and heave shells and carcasses into the town; which continued without intermission an hour and a half.

In the mean time, Colonel Potter, in the hottest of the fire, went upon the head of the wharf, hailed the Rose, went on board and requested a cessation of hostilities till the inhabitants might choose a committee to go on board and treat with Captain Wallace; which request was complied with; and six hours were allowed for the above purpose. Colonel Potter returned and made a report to the committee of inspection, who chose a select committee to hear Captain Wallace's demands, which, after they had gone on board, Captain Wallace informed them were a supply of two hundred sheep and thirty fat cattle. This demand, the committee replied, it was impossible to comply with; for the country people had been in and driven off their stock, saving a few sheep and some milch cows.

After some hours had expired during the negotiation without coming to any agreement, Captain Wallace told them: "I have this one proposal to make: if you will promise to supply me with forty sheep, at or before twelve o'clock, I will assure you that another gun shall not be discharged."

The committee, seeing themselves reduced to the distressing alternative, either to supply their most inveterate enemy with provisions or to devote to the flames the town, with all the goods, besides near one hundred sick persons who could not be removed without the utmost hazard of their lives—I say, seeing themselves reduced to this dreadful dilemma of two evils, reluctantly chose the least, by agreeing to supply them with forty sheep at the time appointed, which was punctually performed. . . .

What equally challenges our admiration and gratitude to God is that no more lives were lost, or persons hurt, by such an incessant and hot fire; the streets being full of men, women and children the whole time. The shrieks of the women, the cries of the children and groans of the sick would have extorted a tear from even the eye of a Nero.

—MOORE, Diary of the American Revolution, I, 148-150.

4. THE BOMBARDMENT OF BRISTOL, RHODE ISLAND

October, 'twas the seventh day,
As I have heard the people say,
Wallace—his name be ever curs't—
Came on our harbour just at dusk,

And there his ship did safely moor
And quickly sent his barge ashore,
With orders that should not be broke,
Or that we might expect a smoke,

Demanding that our magistrates
Should quickly come on board his ship
And let him have some sheep and cattle
Or that they might expect a battle.

At eight o'clock by signal given,
Our peaceful atmosphere was riven;
Women with children in their arms
With doleful cries ran to the farms.

With all their firing and their skill
They did not any person kill,
Neither was any person hurt
Except the Reverend Parson Burt.

And he was not killed by a ball,
As judged by jurors one and all,
But being in a sickly state,
He frightened fell, which proved his fate.

Another truth to you I'll tell
That you may see they levelled well,
For aiming for to kill the people,
They fired their shot into a steeple.

They fired low, they fired high,
The women scream, the children cry,
And all their firing and their racket
Shot off the topmast of a packet!

5. THE BRITISH BURN FALMOUTH

A. "ORDERS TO EXECUTE A JUST PUNISHMENT ON THE TOWN"

To the People of Falmouth.

Canceau, Falmouth, Oct. 16, 1775

After so many premeditated attacks on the legal prerogatives of the best of Sovereigns, after the repeated instances you have experienced in Britain's long forbearance of the rod of correction, and the merciful and paternal extension of her hands to embrace you, again and again, have been regarded as vain and nugatory; and in place of a dutiful and grateful return to your King and parent state, you have been guilty of the most unpardonable rebellion, supported by the ambition of a set of designing men, whose insidious deeds have cruelly imposed on the credulity of their fellow-creatures, and at last have brought the whole into the same dilemma, which leads me to feel not a little the woes of the innocent of them, in particular on the present occasion, from my having it in orders to execute a just punishment on the Town of Falmouth. In the name of which authority, I previously warned you to remove without delay the human species out of the said Town, for which purpose I give you the time of two hours; at the period of which, a red pendant will be hoisted at the main topgallant mast head, with a gun. But should your imprudence lead you to show the least resistance, you will in that case free me of that humanity so strongly pointed out in my orders, as well as in my inclination. I also observe that all those who did, on a former occasion, fly to the King's ship under my command for protection, that the same door is now open and ready to receive them. . . .

B. "ALL THE COMPACT PART OF THE TOWN IS GONE"

January 15, 1776

Report by the Selectmen of Falmouth on the Destruction.

It was about 9 o'clock on Wednesday, being the 18th of October, that the firing began from all the . . . vessels, with all possible briskness, discharging on every part of the town which lay on a regular descent toward the harbour an horrible shower of balls, from three to nine pounds weight, bombs, carcasses, live shells, grape-shot and musket-balls. The firing lasted, without many minutes cessation, until about six o'clock P.M., during which time several parties came ashore and set buildings on fire by hand. Parties of our people, and others from the neighboring towns, ran down to oppose them, and it is thought killed several. One officer, after he fell, was stripped of a neat pair of pistols, his flask and cockade. Through the goodness of God no life was lost on our side, and only one man wounded. . . . Had no opposition been made, we do not believe they would have left one building standing; and more opposition would have been made had not the people's attention been taken up in securing their effects. Besides, it was very unfortunate that our companies of sea-coast men were put under the direction of a committee; for they did not, and we suppose could not, get together in the hurry of affairs, and therefore could give no authoritative directions.

As near as we can judge, about three-quarters of the buildings, reckoning according to their value, are consumed, consisting of about 130 dwelling-houses, many of which held two or three families apiece, besides barns, and almost every store and warehouse in town. St. Paul's Church, a large new building, with the bell; a very elegant and costly new court-house, not quite finished; a fine engine, almost new; the old town house and the publick library, were all consumed. But one or two wharves have escaped the flames; and every vessel in the harbour, of any considerable bigness, was burnt, excepting two, which the enemy carried away with them. The warning given was so short that but few teams could be procured to remove the goods out; much was caried out by hand; but, as far as we can learn, not much more than half of the moveables were saved out of the buildings that were burnt. All the compact part of the town is gone; and among the hundred dwelling-houses that are standing, there are but few good buildings, and those damaged with balls passing through them or bombs bursting. . . .

C. "THE SAME DESOLATION IS MEDITATED UPON ALL THE TOWNS ON THE COAST"

Camp at Cambridge, Oct. 24, 1775

Sir: My conjecture of the destination of the late squadron from Boston in my last has been unhappily verified by an outrage exceeding in barbarity and cruelty every hostile act practiced among civilized nations. I have enclosed the account given me by Mr. Jones, a gentleman of the Town of Falmouth, of the destruction of that . . . village. . . . The orders shown by the Captain for this horrid procedure by which it appears the same desolation is meditated upon all the Towns on the coast, made it my duty to communicate it as quickly and extensively as possible. As Portsmouth was the next place to which he proposed to go, General Sullivan was permitted to go up and give them his assistance and advice, to ward off the blow. I flatter myself the like event will not happen there, as they have a fortification of some strength, and a vessel has arrived at a place called Sheepscut, with one thousand five hundred pounds of powder. . . .

VII. BOSTON REDEEMED

All through the winter the two armies watched each other across the narrow necks of Boston and Charlestown peninsulas, both growing stronger, yet neither strong enough to take the offensive. General Howe had replaced Gage, Admiral Shulldham supplanted the inept Graves, and the British forces had grown to some 7,000 or 8,000, but they still stood on the defensive. What else, after all, could they do? By now the Americans were firmly entrenched, and even if, at great cost, the British had broken through the American lines they would have gained nothing. As General Burgoyne wrote to an English friend, "Look, my Lord, upon the country near Boston—it is all fortification. Driven from one hill you will see the enemy retrenched upon the next and every step we move must be the slow step of a siege." Washington, whose army was being built up to 16,000, was eager to fight, but he, too, was stopped by considerations of matériel. Over 2,000 of his men lacked muskets; there were never more than nine or ten rounds of ammunition per man; and there were not enough cannon for an effective bombardment of Boston or advancing British lines. Yet with every day Washington grew more impatient. He knew that Howe would withdraw from the city at the earliest feasible moment, and he was eager to force him to give battle, not only in order to inflict losses on him, but to stiffen American morale. In January he submitted to his council of war "the indispensable necessity of making a Bold attempt to conquer the Ministerial Troops before they can be reinforced in the spring," but found no support.

Then late in January the picture changed. Colonel Knox, the stout and amiable Boston bookseller who had become colonel of artillery, brought 43 cannon and 14 mortars from Ticonderoga over the mountains to Framingham, on January 25, and in the course of the next month these were brought into the American lines. At the same time powder and ammunition stocks were built up to the point where Washington felt he could afford a bombardment and an attack.

Now Washington prepared to force the issue. The British held Charlestown peninsula, but with unpardonable folly they had failed to seize and fortify Dorchester Heights to the south of Boston. Washington took advantage of this oversight—if it can be called that. On March 2 he opened a heavy bombardment on Boston Neck, and on the evening of March 4 General John Thomas, with a picked force of 2,000 men, moved onto Dorchester Heights. Washington knew that he would have to have some kind of fortifications for his men by next morning, and as the ground was frozen they could not dig in as they had on Breed's Hill. With characteristic ingenuity they had prefabricated their entrenchments. During the previous weeks they had constructed portable timber frames which could be filled with hay, and barrels to fill with dirt and stones. When General Thomas moved onto the Heights he was accompanied by 350 ox carts loaded with these materials. Working feverishly through the night, the American advance forces threw up their timber wall, cut down fruit trees to form an abatis in front of the timber, and in front of these placed their stone-filled barrels, useful in defense and dangerous on offense. It was, said the British Engineer Archibald Robertson, "a most astonishing night's work, and must have employed from 15 to 20,000 men."

Howe found himself in the predicament that had faced Gage back in June. Like Gage he decided to attack at once. But as the British surveyed the American position on Dorchester Heights, almost impregnable with entrenchments and artillery, and manned now by some 4,000 men, they came to realize that an attack might well be suicidal. What, then, to do? Happily fate intervened; that night a storm of hurricane proportions blew up, making it quite impossible to transport troops to the beaches below Dorchester Heights, and by the time the storm had spent itself the American position really was impregnable. Howe rightly concluded that he had no choice but to pull out. There was a tacit agreement on both sides not to damage the city while preparations for evacuation went forward. On St. Patrick's Day, March 17, the British sailed away—some 10,000 soldiers and sailors, and about 1,000 Loyalist refugees. "The last trump," said Washington, "could not have struck them with greater consternation." For ten days the fleet lingered in Nantasket Roads, then sailed for Halifax. The battle for Boston was over.

We are fortunate in having a number of vivid accounts of this last chapter of the siege of Boston. Knox himself tells of the hauling of the cannon from Lake Champlain; Samuel Webb of Connecticut describes the preparations for the offensive. Colonel Stuart, son of former Prime Minister Bute, makes clear the hopelessness of the British position, as does Sir William Howe, himself so largely responsible for that hopelessness. The ubiquitous Reverend William Gordon, already planning to write a history of the war, tells the whole story of the attack from the beginning of the bombardment to the final evacuation. And finally Deacon Newell of the Brattle Street Church, who had endured so many indignities, celebrates in his journal the deliverance of his city.

1. TRANSPORTING THE TICONDEROGA CANNON TO BOSTON

Journal of Henry Knox of the Continental Army.

January 1st to the 4th [1776]. Employed in getting holes cut in the different crossing places in the river in order to strengthen the ice. This day, the 4th, arrived a brass 24-pounder and a small mortar. I this day sent a letter to Genl Washington, one to Brig Genl Gates, also one to Capt Baylor and one to my lovely Lucy.

In the afternoon much alarmed by hearing that one of the heaviest cannon had fallen in to the river at Half Moon Ferry. This Genl Schuyler came and informed me just as I was going to sit down to dinner. I immediately set out for a slay and went up to the Half Moon where I reached at dusk, and not hearing of the others and fearing that they would meet the same fate, I sent off an express to Sloss's ferry, about 7 miles distant, with a letter to Mr. Schuyler informing him of my excessive surprize at the careless manner in which he carried the cannon over, without taking those precautions which by his instructions he was bound to have done and by no means to attempt crossing where he was untill I came. The express returned and informed that they had all got safely over. I then sent off another express to Mr. Swartz to cross at Sloss's, as the ice was so much stronger there than at Half Moon, the usual place of crossing. . . .

Sunday Jan 7th Albany. The cannon, which the night before last came over at Sloss's ferry, we attempted to get over the ferry here, which we effected excepting the last, which fell into the river notwithstanding the precautions we took, and in its fall broke all the ice for 14 feet around it. This was a misfortune as it retarded the dispatch which I wished to use in this business. We pushed the 10 sleds on, which got over safe, and then I went to getting the drowned cannon out, which we partly effected, but by reason of the nights coming could not do it entirely.

8th. Went on the ice about 8 o'clock in the morning and proceeded so cautiously that before night we got over three sleds and were so lucky as to get the cannon out of the river, owing to the assistance the good people of the city of Albany gave, in return for which we christened her—The Albany.

The 9th. Got several spare slays, also some spare string of horses, in case of any accident. After taking my leave of General Schuyler and some other of my friends in Albany, I sat out from there about twelve o'clock and went as far as Claverac, about 9 miles beyond Kinderhook. I first saw all the cannon set out from the ferry opposite Albany.

10th. Reached No. 1, after having climbed mountains from which we might almost have seen all the kingdoms of earth.

11th. Went 12 miles thro' the Green Woods to Blanford. It appeared to me almost a miracle that people with heavy loads should be able to get up and down such hills as are here, with any thing of heavy loads. 11th. At Blanford we overtook the first division who had tarried here untill we came up, and refused going any further, on account that there was no snow beyond five or six miles further in which space there was the tremendous Glasgow or Westfield Mountain to go down. But after about three hours persuasion, I hiring two teams of oxen, they agreed to go.

2. THE BALANCE OF FORCES IN THE SIEGE OF BOSTON

From the Journal of Lieutenant Samuel Webb of the Continental Army.

March 1, 1776. Our affairs growing now to a critical situation, I can no longer neglect minuteing the daily occurrences and manoevers of our army, and that of our enemy, which has been besieged and close blockaded by land ever since the 19th of April last—by an army which they have called a set of poltroons and cowards—in which they must have altered their sentiments or they would have ventured an attempt to raise the siege.

The greatest preparations are now making to approach our enemies with an endeavour to rout them from their garrison—for while the sea is open to them they will get supplied with provisions—and they are in hourly expectation of large reinforcements from England. Their garrison at present amount to about 6000 effective men. Boston being a peninsula they are fortified in the strongest manner possible; even the strong fortifications of Gibraltar is said not to equal them. They have cut a canal thro' the Neck, by which Boston is now an island.

On the south and west sides they are strongly fortified by a chain of forts both on the ridge of hills running the whole length of the town, and below all round the waters edge. On the north and east sides lie a number of ships of war, which sufficiently prevent our attempting to penetrate in that way, having no naval force equal to that lying in the harbour. Opposite the north east of the town lies Noddle Island, which at low water you can get on to from the main at Chelsea. This point runs in bluff and looks over the shipping not more than 400 yards distance, nor exceeding 600 to the thick settled part of the town.

Directly east of the old fortification gates on the south part of the town lies Dorchester Point, which commands the south part of the town and is at least 600 yards within their outer lines on the Neck next Roxbury. A strong battery erected on this point would enable us to cut off the communication between the town and their outworks on the Neck, at the same time annoy the ships and town. Neither of these two posts are taken possession, owing, on the side of the enemy, to want of a proper number of men to garrison them, and on ours powder and artillery to maintain them, but having lately been supplied with some of both these necessary articles, we are now making preparations to take possession of both, by erecting great number of facines, gabions, pressing hay, etc. etc.

Our commander-in-chief is determined to loose no time in putting into execution this plan, for should the enemy be enabled by reinforcements to maintain these posts they would enlarge their limits greatly by which means have it in their power frequently to make excursions into the country adjoining and lay waste with fire and sword our villages, farms, houses, etc. The enemy seem equally sensible of the importance of these two posts, and 'tis said their commander has swore if we brake ground on either he will sally on us—if he was sure of looseing two thirds of his army. This is what we wish for, trusting (through the assistance of Heaven) this would be a means of rescuing from their hands our capital and many of our friends, who are now confined there contrary to the solemn compact made between Genl. Gage and them.

Should they sally on us, we have a prospect of making them to take to their ships and flee; in this case we fear the loss of the town by their seting fire to it, but this is trifeling in comparison to the loss of our valuable privileges, which may God preserve us in the enjoyment of. The enemy are erecting two batteries on Mount Whoredom, against ours on Lechmores Point, and the one on Cobble-Hill known by the name of Putnam's Impregnable Battery. . . .

Our worthy commander in chief (in orders a day or two past) has in the most pathetic terms told the soldiery that on our present conduct depends the salvation of America; that in all probability e'er long we shall be called to the field of battle; that he is confident his troops will behave as deserves the cause we are contending for; but that in all army's their are those who would flee before a much smaller number, and that should any such be found sculking or retreating before the enemy without orders, they must expect instant death by way of example to others.

3. WASHINGTON SEIZES THE HEIGHTS OF DORCHESTER

Jamaica Plain, April 6, 1776

Our brave and sensible commander in chief his Excellency Gen'l Washington, having laid his plan for seizing and fortifying Dorchester hills that overlook the town, . . . applied to the New England governments . . . for a reinforcement of some thousands for two months, ending with the last of March, which was accordingly sent. Our troops were busied in making fascines and in getting every other matter in readiness. A battle was expected and ardently wished for, whenever we should possess the hills. It was urged by some to go on so as that the engagement might happen on the 5th of March, the day on which the unarmed mob was fired upon at Boston by Capt. Preston's men. It was accordingly concluded to enter upon the work the 4th at night.

In the mean time to amuse the enemy, our bomb batteries being finished on Cambridge and Roxbury side, a few shells were thrown into town Saturday night March the third; till then it was not believed that we had so many warlike instruments, but we had sent to Ticonderoga and had brought over the lakes, while froze sufficient to bear, cannon, mortars and howittzs, to the amount of fifty and better; shells we got from the king's store at N. York. On the Lord's day night more shells were thrown, besides firing a number of cannon into the town. The Monday night it was repeated and increased considerably; but not one of our friends in town was hurt; about half a dozen soldiers lost their limbs.

All things being ready, as soon as the evening admitted of it, the undertaking went forward. The covering party consisting of 800 men led the way; then the carts with the entrenching tools; after that the main working body under Gen'l Thomas consisting of about 1200; a train of more than 300 carts loaded with fascines, presst hay, in bundles of seven or eight hundred, etc., closed the procession. Every one knew his place and business; the covering party when upon the ground divided, half went to the point next to Boston, the other to that next to the Castle. All possible silence was observed. The wind lay so as to carry what noise could not be avoided, by driving the stakes and picking against the frozen ground (for the frost was still more than a foot thick, about a foot and a half) to carry, I say, what noise could not be avoided into the harbour between the town and the castle, so as not to be heard and regarded by such as had no suspicion of what we were after, especially as there was a continued cannonade on both sides. Many of the carts made three trips, some four.

Gen'l Thomas told me that he pulled out his watch and found that by ten o'clock at night, they had got two forts, one upon each hill, sufficient to defend them from small arms and grape shot. The men continued working with the utmost spirit, till relieved the Tuesday morning about three. The neighbouring militia had been called in for three days to guard against accidents, and were in by twelve at night, some before, in the evening. The night was remarkably mild, a finer for working could not have been taken out of the whole 365. It was hazy below so that our people could not be seen, tho' it was a bright moon light night above on the hills.

When the ministerialists discovered in the morning early what we had been after, they were astonished upon seeing what we had done. Gen'l How was seen to scratch his head and heard to say by those that were about him that he did not know what he should do, that the provincials (he likely called them by some other name) had done more work in one night than his whole army would have done in six months. In this strong manner did he express his surprise. He soon called a council of war and determined upon attempting to dislodge our people (the Admiral having informed him that if we possessed those heights he could not keep one of his Majesty's ships in the harbour).

Spectators in abundance, Yours among the rest, were looking out upon the adjacent hills for a bloody battle. The wharf was thronged with soldiers, while numbers were going on board vessels; the provincials rejoiced at seeing it, clapped their hands and wished for the expected attack.

Gen. Washington said to those that were at hand, "Remember it is the fifth of March, and avenge the death of your brethren!" It was immediately asked what the General said by those that were not near enough to hear, and as soon answered; and so from one to another thro' all the troops, which added fresh fuel to the martial fire before kindled. . . .

The tide was turned, and the day too far spent to admit of the regulars coming out and attacking on the fifth of March. They would have been under great disadvantages had they landed after high water, at the point next to the town. Gen'l How proposed attacking therefore the next morning very early. . . .

I came home early, finding nothing could be done that evening; and being fatigued with riding forward and backward, and the exercise of body and mind natural to such a peculiar state of things, and designing to be up by day break and down in view of what might be going on, I went to bed about eight. I expected that the men of war would get as near to Dorchester hills as possible, that the next morning at day break a most heavy cannonade would begin; and I thought it probable that the regulars would land under cover of it, and proceed to attack the provincials. But when I heard in the night how amazingly strong the wind blew (for it was such a storm as scarce any one remembered to have heard) and how it rained towards morning, I concluded that the ships could not stir, and pleased myself with the reflection that the Lord might be working deliverance for us and preventing the effusion of human blood.

The event proved that it was so. The storm hindered the attack; and it was so given out afterward, in general orders by Gen. How as appears by one of the orderly books that fell into our hands. Immediately orders were given to prepare for embarking the troops, that the town might be speedily evacuated. The Tories were thunder-struck, and terribly dejected. All was hurry and confusion: the soldiers working like horses night and day, getting on board what they could as fast as possible. On the 17th of March in the morning they evacuated the town.

4. GENERAL HOWE JUSTIFIES HIS DECISION TO EVACUATE BOSTON

To the Earl of Dartmouth.

On Board His Majesty's Ship Chatham,
Nantasket Road, March 21, 1776

My Lord:—It is with great regret I am obliged to inform your lordship that after all my struggles to supply the army with provisions from the Southern provinces and the West Indies, from whence none of the vessels have yet returned, and after an anxious expectation of more transports to convey the troops, stores, civil officers, inhabitants, and effects, the enemy, by taking possession of and fortifying the commanding heights on Dorchester Neck, in order to force the ships, by their cannon, to quit the harbor, has reduced me to the necessity either of exposing the army to the greatest distresses by remaining in Boston, or of withdrawing from it under such straitened circumstances.

The importance of preserving this force, when it could no longer act to advantage, did not leave any room to doubt of the propriety of its removal; and since my determination, taken on the 7th instant, I have exerted every expedient to accomplish the arduous task, which was executed on the 17th following, in the forenoon, without the least molestation from the rebels, the transports having been previously watered, and fitted for sea in every respect, excepting the article of provisions, in the view of complying with His Majesty's commands for a movement from Boston, as soon as I might be enabled to effect it. . . .

The rebels, about the latter end of January, erected new works and batteries on a point of land opposite to West Boston, at a place known by the name of Phipps's Farm, which, laying under cover of their strongest posts, and so situated as to be supported by their whole force from Cambridge, was not to be prevented; soon afterwards the militia of the country was called in, and, having intelligence that the enemy intended to possess themselves of Dorchester Neck, I ordered a detachment from Castle William, on the 13th of February, under the command of Lieutenant-colonel Leslie, and one composed of grenadiers and light-infantry from Boston, commanded by Major Musgrave, to pass over the ice, with directions to destroy the houses and every kind of cover whatever upon that peninsula, which was executed, and six of the enemy's guard made prisoners.

On the 2d instant [March], at night, the rebels began a cannonade upon the town from Roxbury and Phipps's Farm, and threw some shells from both places, without doing any personal damage, and but little to the buildings; the same was repeated on the evenings of the 3d and 4th, by which only six men were wounded; the fire being returned from our batteries, but at such a distance as to be very uncertain in the execution.

It was discovered on the 5th, in the morning, that the enemy had thrown up three very extensive works, with strong abatis round them, on the commanding hill on Dorchester Neck, which must have been the employment of at least twelve thousand men in a situation so critical. I determined upon an immediate attack, with all the force I could transport. The ardor of the troops encouraged me in this hazardous enterprise; regiments were expeditiously embarked on board transports to fall down the harbor, and flat-boats were to receive other troops, making the whole two thousand four hundred men, to rendezvous at Castle William, from whence the descent was to be made, on the night of the 5th, but the wind unfortunately coming contrary and blowing very hard, the ships were not able to get to their destination, and this circumstance also making it impossible to employ the boats, the attempt became impracticable.

The weather continuing boisterous the next day and night, gave the enemy time to improve their works, to bring up their cannon, and to put themselves into such a state of defence that I could promise myself little success by attacking them under all the disadvantages I had to encounter; wherefore I judged it most advisable to prepare for the evacuation of the town, upon the assurance of one month's provision from Admiral Shulldham, who, in this emergency, as he has on every other occasion, offered all the assistance he could afford.

A thousand difficulties arose on account of the disproportion of transports for the conveyance of the troops, the well-affected inhabitants, their most valuable property, and the quantity of military stores to be carried away; however, as the enemy gave no interruption but during the nights, and that inconsiderable, I found the whole in readiness to depart on the 14th, if the wind had favored, and assisted by the abilities and assiduity of Captains Reynar and Montagu, of His Majesty's ships Chatham and Fowey, who superintended the embarkation, and by the alacrity of the officers under them, this operation was effected on the 17th, and the rear guard embarked at nine o'clock in the morning, without the least loss, irregularity, or accident. Such military stores as could not be taken on board were destroyed, and the utmost expedition is now using to get ready for sea in the best state our circumstances will allow; the admiral leaving all the ships-of-war he can spare from the convoy for the security and protection of such vessels as may be bound for Boston.

Every provision my situation would afford has been made for the accommodation of the inhabitants and the preservation of their effects; all the woolen goods, also, that I could find room for, belonging to those who chose to stay behind, the want of which is more distressing to the enemy than any other article whatever, have been shipped; inventories of them taken in the best manner possible, and put under the charge of proper persons, in order to be hereafter stored. The demolition of the castle has been effectually executed, and an armed ship is sent by the admiral, express, to advise the different governors on the continent of this removal. . . .

5. THE BRITISH EVACUATE BOSTON

Halifax, April 28, 1776

. . . Nothing particular happened till Feb; we took a few prizes, and the enemy were more than equally successful in this point.

About the middle of Feb. we were informed that the Rebels had a quantity of fascines and entrenching tools on Dorchester Neck for the purpose of throwing up works. Deserters informed the General that the enemy intended to bombard the town, and preparations were made to hinder their work. A battery of four 32-pounders was made on Shoredon Hill and another strong one at Boston's Point. The Rebels at the same time made a battery within point-blank cannon shot of our lines, and with such caution that we could not discover that it was intended for a battery.

On the 3rd March at 9 o'clock at even they began a pretty hot cannonade and bombardment. Their shells were thrown in an excellent direction, they took effect near the centre of the town, and tore several houses to pieces; the cannon was usually well fired, one shot killed 8 men of the 22nd Regt. and houses were pierced through and through with balls they fired from Phipps's Farm. Our lines were raked from the new battery they had made and tho' we returned shot and shell, I am very, very sorry to say with not quite so much judgement.

The bombardment continued for five nights, and a nobler scene it was impossible to behold: sheets of fire seemed to come from our batteries; some of the shells crossed one another in the air, and then bursting looked beautiful. The inhabitants were in a horrid situation, particularly the women who were several times drove from their houses by shot, and crying for protection.

On the 8th or 9th March, I forget which, they ceased firing, and at day-break next morning we perceived two posts upon the highest hills of Dorchester peninsula, that appeared more like majick than the work of human beings. They were each of them near 200 ft. long on the side next the town, and seemed to be strong cases of packed hay about 10 ft. high with an abattis of vast thickness round both. We discovered near 6000 people, most of them at work; they opened embrasures before 9 o'clock and about 2 o'clock had made a ditch and connected the two hills by a breastwork.

We fired a few shots, but the position was too strong to be affected; the General therefore determined to attack it. A quantity of artillery and three regiments immediately embarked under the command of General Jones, the Grenadiers, Lt. Infantry, and other regts. amounting in all to 2500 men commanded by General Howe, Lord Percy and General Robertson.

Brigadier Jones was to have staid with the three regts. aboard ship until he was joined by Gen. Howe at 9 o'clock at night, when the whole was to have gone in boats and landed. God knows whether it was a fortunate circumstance or not, but at any rate so high a wind arose that it was impossible for the boats to take to sea.

The next day the General assembled the field officers and acquainted us that the intended attack had failed through the inclemency of the weather, that he had consulted the engineers, who declared that the works had been so strengthened as to render any present attack very doubtful, and that should the enemy augment their works upon that peninsula from such a commanding height we should inevitably be drove from the town.

He also told us that there was no more than 6 weeks' provisions in the garrison, which obliged him to go to Halifax instead of to New York.

The principal citizens, on hearing that the town was to be evacuated, came to General Howe, and requested that the town might not be burnt; the General made answer that if the enemy molested him in his retreat he would certainly burn it; if not, he would leave the town standing.

This was made known by a flag of truce to the Rebels; in consequence of which we made our retreat unmolested.

We sailed soon after under convoy of the Admiral to this place. From a scarcity of transports we were crowded with two regts. in each ship and nothing could be more horrid. . . .

6. "THUS WAS THIS UNHAPPY TOWN RELIEVED"

Journal of Timothy Newell, a selectman of Boston.

[March] 17th Lord's day. This morning at 3 o'clock, the troops began to move—guards, chevaux de freze, crow feet strewed in the streets to prevent being pursued. They all embarked at about 9 oclock and the whole fleet came to sail. Every vessel which they did not carry off, they rendered unfit for use. Not even a boat left to cross the river.

Thus was this unhappy distressed town (through a manifest interposition of divine providence) relieved from a set of men whose unparralleled wickedness, profanity, debauchery and cruelty is inexpressible, enduring a siege from the 19th April 1775 to the 17th March 1776. Immediately upon the fleet's sailing the Select Men set off through the lines to Roxbury to acquaint General Washington of the evacuation of the town. After sending a message Major Ward, aid to General Ward, came to us at the lines and soon after the General himself, who received us in the most polite and affectionate manner, and permitted us to pass to Watertown to acquaint the Council of this happy event. The General immediately ordered a detachment of 2000 troops to take possession of the town under the command of General Putnam who the next day began their works in fortifying Forthill, etc., for the better security of the town. A number of loaded shells with trains of powder covered with straw were found in houses left by the Regulars near the fortification.

CHAPTER SIX

The Canadian Campaigns

FOR AMERICANS, Canada was the ignis fatuus of the Revolution. In 1759 the fate of the continent had been decided on the Plains of Abraham, before Quebec, and many Americans were convinced that history would repeat itself. But how would history go about repeating itself? Would Americans now play the role that the British had played, and wrest Canada from its masters by military force? Or would Canada—which was after all a “conquered” province, and overwhelmingly French—throw off the imperial ties and bind herself to the American states?

This was, at first, the official position. Surely the Canadians resented British tyranny just as keenly as other Americans! Surely they would see that their future was inextricably tied to the future of the rest of the continent! Surely they could be won over by persuasion, by kind words, by logic! On June 1, 1775, Congress formally resolved that there should be no expedition against Canada, and soon it was discussing the Commission which would be sent up to spread the gospel of freedom. And the Articles of Confederation—drafted as early as 1776 but not approved until 1777—contained the provision that “Canada, acceding to this confederation, shall be admitted into . . . the union, but no other colony shall be admitted . . . unless . . . by nine states.”

But on this matter as on so many others, Congress was inconsistent. Benedict Arnold, thirsting for action and for glory, was convinced that Canada could be conquered that very summer, and that he was the man to do it. So was Ethan Allen. In unison, though not in harmony, they had taken Ticonderoga, and Arnold had gone on to St. Johns, in Quebec, and captured it; now they were persuaded that they could do it again. Somehow they convinced the Congress, too, for on June 27 Congress reversed itself and voted “that if General Schuyler finds it practicable and that it will not be disagreeable to the Canadians, he shall immediately take possession of St. Johns, Montreal, and any other parts of the country.”

This seemed to leave out Arnold and Allen, but did not in fact do so; it was never easy to leave them out. Allen shortly joined General Schuyler’s miscellaneous forces gathering at Crown Point, and as for Arnold, he had already persuaded Washington to send him off on a rival invasion—through Maine and to Quebec.

General Schuyler—he had been appointed one of the four major generals under Washington, and in command in New York—did find an expedition to Canada practicable, and on July 18 reached Ticonderoga and began to organize such forces as he had, or could collect, for an offensive against Montreal. A month later the dashing and resourceful young Richard Montgomery arrived to be second in command; when Schuyler fell sick the command of the expedition passed to Montgomery. "Not a moment is to be lost," wrote Washington, but two months were lost before the expedition really accomplished anything. Finally St. Johns fell; then Montreal; then Montgomery prepared to march on Quebec, join forces with Arnold, reduce the ancient fortress, attach the fourteenth colony firmly to the other thirteen, and win the war in Canada.

Alas, everything went wrong. With superhuman courage and energy Arnold brought his forces through the wilderness of Maine and to the St. Lawrence. Montgomery joined him before Quebec, but the able British commander, General Guy Carleton, had reached the city first, somehow brought together a defensive force, strengthened the fortifications, and made the place well-nigh impregnable. There was an attack; Montgomery was killed, Arnold wounded, the American forces slaughtered or scattered. The great expedition turned into a fiasco and then a tragedy. Congress rushed reinforcements, but the British sent over stronger reinforcements. The Americans retreated; their retreat turned into a rout; they were decimated by smallpox and other diseases; what finally staggered into Ticonderoga and Crown Point was the wreck of an army.

Carleton was ready to turn the tables, to drive down along the Richelieu, Lake Champlain, Lake George to Albany and then down the Hudson, to cut off New England, to end the war as Montgomery and Arnold had hoped to end the war. He had been Arnold's nemesis; now the tables were turned, and Arnold—with the help of Nature and the weather—stopped him. Canada was not conquered, and was not to be conquered, but at least it was not to be the instrument of the destruction of the American cause.

We give here five chapters in the history of the Canadian campaigns: the Schuyler-Montgomery attack on St. Johns and Montreal; Arnold's heroic expedition through Maine and to Quebec; the assault on Quebec and its repulse; the agonized retreat from Quebec to Montreal to Chambly to Ticonderoga; the final and decisive fight on the waters of Lake Champlain, and the end of the counterattack.

I. THE BEGINNING: THE CAPTURE OF ST. JOHNS AND MONTREAL

The obvious approach to Quebec is by water up Lake Champlain and (in so far as rapids will allow) along the Richelieu River to the St. Lawrence. That is the route Abercromby took in '58 and Amherst in '59—though they didn't get very far; it is the route that Burgoyne used in '77—he got pretty far, but not far enough. When Congress decided on a Canadian expedition after all, it entrusted it, of necessity, to the commander in chief in New York, General Philip Schuyler. There was no particular reason why Schuyler should have been made a major general, and he proved to be an unlucky choice. Partly he had little of the kind of drive that Arnold, for example, had; partly he was sick; and partly he had no stomach for the expedition anyway. That he had difficulties is clear—who, in that day, didn't? It is equally clear that he made the most of them. Fortunately for the American cause General Montgomery joined him in mid-August. Montgomery had just the qualities that Schuyler lacked: energy, high spirits, resourcefulness and experience. Schuyler retired to Albany and Montgomery took command. There was a slow advance up the lake and the Richelieu, then a ridiculous two-month siege of the feebly held post at St. Johns. The ubiquitous Ethan Allen was there; impetuous as always, he decided to capture Montreal on his own, and was himself captured instead. Within a week the straggling army had reached Montreal. General Guy Carleton put up a show of resistance, but he had only 150 militia. He escaped, and made his way to Quebec; Montreal fell, without a struggle, on November 13. Precious weeks had been wasted, but the first stage of the campaign was crowned with success.

1. GENERAL SCHUYLER FINDS NONCHALANCE PREVAILING AT TICONDEROGA

... You will expect that I should say something about this place and the troops here. Not one earthly thing for offence or defence has been done; the commanding officer had no orders, he only came to re-enforce the garrison, and he expected the General! But this, my dear General, as well as what follows in this paragraph, I pray may be entre nous, for reasons I need not suggest. About ten o'clock last night I arrived at the landing place, the north end of Lake George, a post occupied by a captain and one hundred men. A sentinel, on being informed I was in the boat, quitted his post to go and awake the guard, consisting of three men, in which he had no success. I walked up and came to another, a sergeant's guard. Here the sentinel challenged, but suffered me to come up to him, the whole guard, like the first, in the soundest sleep. With a pen-knife only I could have cut off both guards, and then have set fire to the block-house, destroyed the stores, and starved the people here. At this post I have pointedly recommended vigilance and care, as all the stores from Fort George must necessarily be landed there. But I hope to get the better of this inattention. The officers and men are all good looking people, and decent in their deportment, and I really believe will make good soldiers as soon as I can get the better of this nonchalance of theirs. Bravery, I believe, they are far from wanting. As soon as I am a little settled, I shall do myself the honour to send you a return of my strength both on land and water.

I enclose your Excellency a copy of a letter from Colonel Johnson, with a copy of an examination of a person lately from Canada, contradictory of the accounts I gave you in my last from Saratoga. You will perceive that he is gone to Canada. I hope Carleton, if he should be able to procure a body of Indians, will not be in a hurry to pay us a visit. I wish to be a little more decently prepared to receive him, in doing which, be assured I shall lose no time. . . .

2. AMERICAN AGENTS STIR UP DISCONTENT AMONG THE CANADIANS

Journal of Thomas Ainslie, Collector of Customs of the Port of Quebec.

In June the Canadian peasants began to shew a disposition little to be expected from a conquered people who had been treated with so much lenity by Government. The agents and friends of the Congress had not been idle—by word and by writing they had poisoned their minds—they were brought to believe that the Minister had laid a plan to enslave them, and to make them the instruments of enslaving all the neighbouring provinces, that they would be continually at war, far removed from their wives and families. Armed strangers had appeared in some of the parishes below Quebec; they disappeared suddenly: nobody knew their business—it was conjectured that they came to learn the sentiments of the country people, and the state of Quebec. Those who knew with what facility the hunters of New England can traverse the woods had apprehensions that the rebels might send parties from their back settlements to harass us near Quebec, in the absence of Gen. Carleton, who was up the country to oppose their entry into Canada by way of St. Johns. Woodsmen may enter this province by more ways than one—by the Chaudiere and by St. Francis, rivers taking their rise in the mountains between Canada and New England; these passes are well known to the back settlers in Massachusetts and in New Hampshire. There is a third still easier than the two mentioned, by St. Johns River in Nova Scotia and Madawaska River over the carrying place to Kamouraska on the River St. Laurence about an hundred miles below Quebec. . . .

The agents for the Congress in this country represented to that body that nothing was to be apprehended from the Canadians in their present temper of mind, that so far from opposing the Continental troops, they would receive them with open arms, nay that perhaps great numbers would join them, for that they appeared to be thoroughly tinctured with the true spirit of rebellion, thanks to the never ceasing labours of the malcontents in this Province. . . .

They drew the most hideous pictures of the distresses and miseries that would be entailed on the present race, and on their latest posterity if the Quebec Act should take place. From the impressions made by these seditious people, the Canadians look upon the Rebels as their best friends, and are ready to receive them as the asserters of their rights and liberties.

Some of these Grumbletonians are friends to the Constitution but are highly incensed against the Quebec bill.

They see with pain that their malice has contributed to incline the Canadians to throw off their allegiance—they meant to stir them up to a general application for a repeal of the act, not to rebellion.

3. THE AMERICANS LAY SIEGE TO ST. JOHNS

Samuel Mott of Connecticut to Governor Jonathan Trumbull.

Camp before St. John's, October 6, 1775

Ever since the 17th of last month we have laid siege to this place; it is a very difficult place to come at, as it is almost surrounded with sunken swamps and marshy ground; many small occurrences have happened during the siege, which I cannot recapitulate. The enemy, it is thought, have fired six hundred bomb-shells, besides numbers of cannon-shot, and showers of grape-shot; but we have lost but about a dozen men by them all. They played very severely on us when we were erecting our batteries. I was for three days successively where the shot and shells came, and the grape-shot rattled around me like hail; but a good God has preserved me. . . .

Colonel Allen has been very serviceable in bringing in the Canadians and Indians; but being encouraged by some others, he has, rather contrary to his own judgment, crossed the river, about five miles below Montreal, with only about thirty New-England men and seventy Canadian friends, one hundred in the whole; and intended to augment his number of Canadians, and, if possible, get possession of Montreal; but he was the next morning met by St. Luke La Corne, with about four hundred Regulars and French Tories. They overpowered Allen, and he is either killed or taken, with about twenty of his men, (which was a severe stroke to us); he, however, made some havoc; he stood his ground firing till they surrounded him, although his men forsook him. The Town-Major of Montreal, with some other of the most potent Tories, were killed in the engagement.

On the 3d instant there was a severe engagement between the French Whigs on one side, and the French Tories and Regulars on the other side, at Chambly, about thirteen miles from this place. The Tory party had the advantage, as they fired about fifty cannon-shot on our Whigs, when they had only small arms to defend with. They lost several men on each side. The Whigs maintained their ground. In short, it is a melancholy prospect to see that all Canada is in one continued scene of war and bloodshed. If we don't carry our point, we have brought Canada into the most deplorable situation possible to conceive, as those people who have taken arms in our favour, with their wives and children, will be left to cruelty without mercy, and any of our army will hardly escape with safety. It is amazing to me that the Colonies should have so little sense of the importance of this expedition as not to give us a good large army, well furnished, in due season, which indeed would have nearly settled the controversy; but we have never yet been two thousand strong, exclusive of our friends of Canada, although we assume to ourselves all the airs of a potent army. . . .

I have been present with the General at a Congress and treaty with the Indians, where the heads of all the seven nations of Canada were present; and matters were conducted with great solemnity and to the mutual satisfaction of all.

Yesterday St. Luke La Corne (that arch devil incarnate), who has butchered hundreds, men, women and children, of our Colonies in the late war in the most inhuman manner, who has ever been a head and leader of the Canadians and all the Indians, now finding that, notwithstanding all his wiles and falsehoods, the Indians and more than half the Canadians are become friendly to us, he has now sent a message to us, desiring a conference with us. The General has agreed to a conference, to be held at La Prairie to-morrow: Major Brown and the aid-de-camp on our side, and that wretch, St. Luke, with the principal leaders of the Tory faction of Montreal, on the other side. It is a very delicate embassy, and the consequences will better manifest the event than it can be guessed. The Indians of all the tribes, and the Canadians who join us, have all learned English enough to say "Liberty" and "Bos-tonian," and all call themselves Yankee. The Indians boast much of it, and will smite on their breasts, saying, "Me Yankee."

It is very grievous to me that General Schuyler is not here; I had a very good understanding with him, and a good agreement in all the modes of prosecuting the expedition; but to my sorrow and the embarrassment of the service, there is not that good understanding as I could wish now. General Montgomery's chief confidant is one Col. Campbell, a Scotchman, who has been an officer in the Regulars and is now Deputy Quartermaster-General, and is very profane. I should be very sorry to inform your Honour that there is scarcely a word heard from head-quarters without some oaths and curses on every occasion; but I value myself on the righteousness of the cause, and hope in God for success. I have no great opinion of Montgomery's generalship, although I believe him to be a man of courage; that is but a small (though essential) qualification of a general.

For all the pretensions of New-York, there has not been one head colonel of a regiment seen in the army this year; and out of their three thousand five hundred men, we have never had more than six hundred down here, until within these four days there have come down between two and three hundred more. I recollect nothing more material. The firing goes on now pretty briskly. The enemy are very strongly fortified. The event of each day can only be told or even guessed at the close of it.

4. ST. JOHNS FALLS: "A FATAL STAB TO THE FOES OF FREEDOM"

Letter of an officer of the New York troops in Canada.

St. John's, November 3, 1775

I have the pleasure to inform you that I had the honour of marching into and taking possession of this fortress, at the head of my company, and about two hundred men from the different corps of which our army is composed, about nine o'clock this morning, when the garrison, consisting of about six hundred men, marched out and grounded their arms on the plains to the westward of the fort (agreeable to the terms of the enclosed capitulation), and were immediately embarked in batteaus for Captain Mead's encampment, and from thence to be sent under guard, as speedily as possible, for Ticonderoga, Connecticut, or any other place which the Continental Congress may direct. I most sincerely congratulate you on this most fortunate event, which, in my opinion, will be a most fatal stab to the hellish machinations of the foes of freedom, as it will facilitate the reduction of Canada and secure the Canadians in our favour.

We have taken in the fort a considerable quantity of military stores; among which are seventeen pieces of excellent brass artillery, two of them twenty-four pounders, the rest of them field-pieces, two royal howitzers, several mortars, cohorns, and a considerable number of iron cannon. There were in the garrison about five hundred regular troops; the rest were composed of Canadian volunteers, among whom are many of their noblesse; who, I believe, are (from appearance) on the stool of repentance. And as you may be fond of knowing how we have proceeded in carrying on the siege of this place . . . , I will give you a detail of the particular operations. . . .

On Saturday, the 28th ultimo, the main body of the army decamped from the south, and marched to the north side of the fort, under the command of General Wooster. We were joined in the evening by General Montgomery, and the same night we began to throw up a breastwork (on an eminence which entirely commanded the enemy's works) in order to erect a battery of cannon and mortars; this battery they kept continually pelting at with grapeshot and shells, but without doing us the least injury, until Wednesday morning, when we opened our battery, consisting of three twelve and one nine-pounders, three mortars, and as many cohorns, with which we kept an almost incessant blaze on them [the] great part of the day, and likewise from our battery on the east side of the river, which the enemy returned with the greatest spirit.

Late in the afternoon I received a message from General Montgomery, ordering me to cease firing till further orders; these orders were extremely disagreeable to me, when I saw some of my men bleeding before my eyes, and dying with the wounds which they had received. On our ceasing to fire, the General ordered a parley to be beat, and sent in an officer to demand a surrender of the fort. Two officers soon after returned with him, and were led blindfold through the camp to the General's tent, where a pretty long conference was held, and they promised the General an answer from the commanding officer next morning, which promise was complied with. The answer imported that if they should receive no relief within four days, he would then send in some proposals. The General replied that he must have an explicit answer next morning, and the garrison must remain prisoners of war, at all events; and that if they had any intention to renew hostilities, they need only signify it by firing a gun as a signal. This, though very unpalatable, they were at length obliged to digest, as you see by the capitulation.

5. MONTREAL IS CAPTURED: "THE TROOPS CAME AS FRIENDS"

Journal of Benjamin Trumbull, chaplain with the First Connecticut Regiment.

Saturday November 11th 1775. This morning is cold and sower; the ground is white with snow, and it rains and snows, bids fair for a tempestuous season. . . .

Seing that the regiment were not like to march and looking upon it important that the General should know our situation, at a quarter after 11 o'clock I determined to march forward for Le Prairie [La Prairie] and began my march with two soldiers for my pilots. I arrived at Le Prairie 18 miles from St. John's just as it began to be dark. I marched the whole of the day in mud and water sometimes midleg high and in general over shoe, carried a small pack, a case of pistols by my side, with my gun, cartouch box, etc. The whole day was stormy; it rained and snowed till about sunset, when the snow and rain ceased and the wind blew up raw and cold at north west. Under our feet was snow and ice and water, over our heads clouds, snow and rain; before us the mountains appeared all white with snow and ice. It was remarkable to see the Americans after almost infinite fatigues and hardships marching on at this advanced season, badly clothed and badly provided for, to Montreal, pressing on to new sieges and new conquests. This day the entrenching tools came on and in the afternoon Colonel Ward with that part of General Woosters regiment which had been left behind began his march for Le Prairie. I was very wet and weary, got into a small warm room, dried my feet and clothes and had a comfortable night.

This day the generals who arrived at Lepaire on Wednesday the 8th instant passed the River St. Lawrence about nine miles from Montreal and landed on St. Pauls Island. The field pieces and light artillery came up the night before, the evening of the 10th instant. A considerable part of the army passed the river with them and landed without opposition. Of the Connecticut troops, part of General Woosters regiment and Colonel Waterbury's went over on this first embarkation: there were not boats for the other troops.

Lords Day November 12 was a cold blustering day, wind at northwest, cloudy and sower, difficult passing the river on account of the wind and current which is rapid and strong. Colonel Ward comes in to day with his part, and the troops which had crossed the river, with the generals. Marched into the suburbs of Montreal and encamped just without the city.

Monday November 13. The generals marched into the city just at evening. The citizens before their entrance proposed terms of capitulation, but the generals observed that they had no right to any capitulation; that they had no men to defend them, no artillery or any means of defence; that the troops came not as enemies but as friends to protect them, and as they pretended to be affraid that the troops would plunder them, they assured them that they should not be plundered but should be safe in their persons and estates. . . .

Tuesday November 14th 1775. . . . Governor Carlton on Saturday evening, when our men were marching into the confines of the city, left it with his regulars amounting to about 80 in number, with some Canadians who had entered into the measures of the Ministry, fell down the river with eleven ships and vessels. . . . Before his departure he destroyed most of the bataux belonging to the King distributed among the nobless, and one way or other conveyed away almost the whole of the Kings stores, and spiked all the canon they left and filled them with balls, etc. Some houses which had been built for the Kings service they damaged, braking out the windows and sashes, taring up the floors, etc. Orders were given by General Prescott to burn them, but on the application of some gentlemen of the town representing that it would expose the whole town to be consumed in one general conflagration, he declared that such a thing as burning said houses had never entered into his heart, and enquired who had given such orders; they told him General Prescott. He however countermanded the orders. General Carlton is said to have some humanity; disavows his having ever set the savages on the Americans. The harsh and inhumane things which have been done this way are rather ascribed to General Prescott, St. Luke La-Corn, Capt. Frasier and others of their character and the nobless.

II. ARNOLD LEADS AN EXPEDITION TO QUEBEC

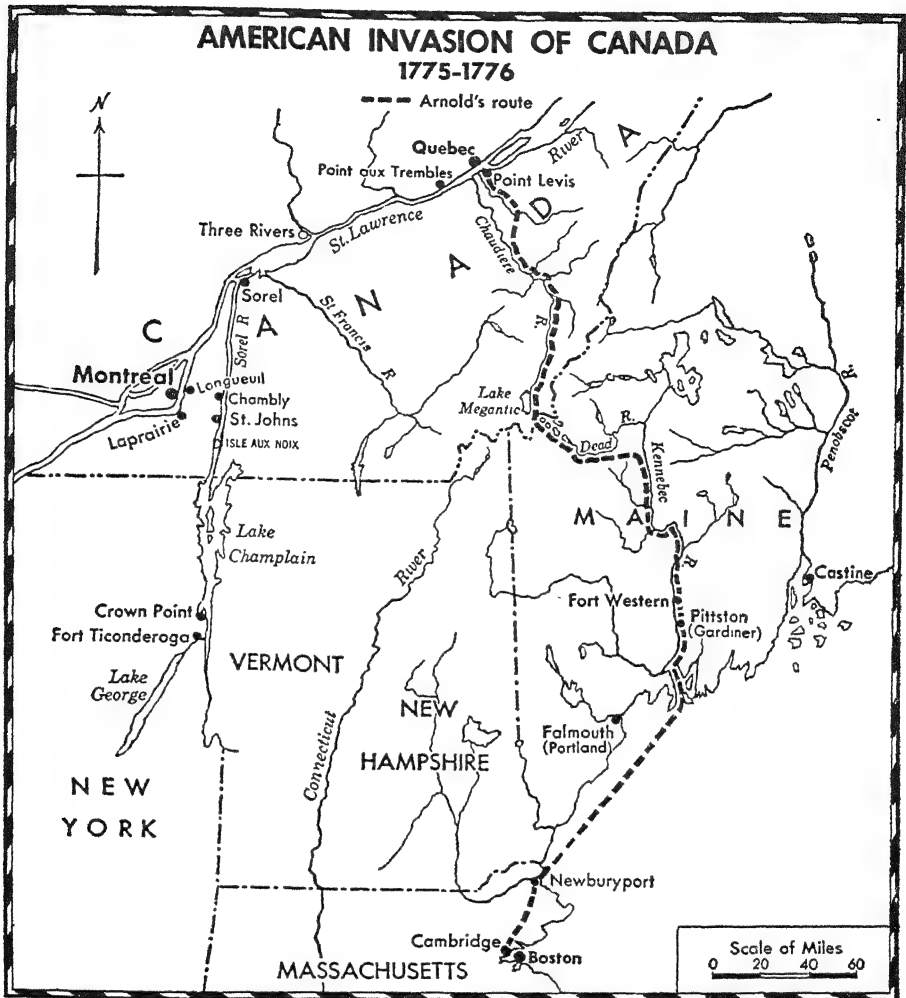

The attack on Canada was to be a two-pronged affair or, as we might say now, a pincer operation. As the left wing of the American forces swung on to Montreal, an east wing was to drive through Maine to the St. Lawrence; the two were to converge on the fortress of Quebec. Benedict Arnold had already proved himself a man of action, and Washington made him a colonel and authorized him to lead an expedition to Quebec. The new colonel raised a force of about a thousand men, most of them woodsmen and frontiersmen, from the armies around Cambridge; among them were young Aaron Burr and the famous Daniel Morgan who had fought under Washington in the French and Indian War. According to tradition young Burr was accompanied by an Indian maiden named Jacataqua, one of the female camp followers of the campaign, an "Abenaki Queen with golden thighs." Whether authentic or not, the story is in keeping with Burr's later career. The high-spirited little army went by boat to the mouth of the Kennebec, and by September 24 had reached the rapids above what is now Augusta. The going along the Kennebec was not too hard; the real hardship came with the long portage along the Dead River and to Lake Megantic, and on along the Chaudière.

The hardship, the misery, the valor of that march is sufficiently described in our accounts so that it need not be celebrated here: those who want the full story of this wonderful expedition will turn to Kenneth Roberts' March to Quebec. One of the most wonderful things about it is that so many simple, hungry, sick, miserable men had time to keep journals. We quote from two of them. Abner Stocking was a twenty-two-year-old private in Captain Hanchet's Connecticut company; his own journal was evidently copied, in part, from the journals of his friends, but is no less authentic for that. Dr. Isaac Senter, another twenty-two-year-old, was a physician from Rhode Island. He had joined up with the army before Cambridge, where he served as surgeon, and volunteered for this expedition; his is probably the best of the journals. He lived through not only the Canadian but other campaigns, and after the war achieved some fame as a physician in Newport.

1. "OUR FATIGUES SEEMED DAILY TO INCREASE"

Journal of Abner Stocking, a private in Arnold's army.

Sept. 13. 1775. All things being in readiness for our departure, we set out from Cambridge, near Boston, on the 13th Sept. at sunset, and encamped at Mistick at eight o'clock at night. We were all in high spirits, intending to endure with fortitude all the fatigues and hardships that we might meet with in our march to Quebec.

September 14th. This morning we began our march at 5 o'clock and at sunset encamped at Danvers, a place twenty miles distant from Mistick.

The weather through the day was very sultry and hot for the season of the year. The country through which we passed appeared barren and but thinly inhabited.

September 15th. This morning we marched very early, and encamped at night within five miles of Newbury Port. The inhabitants who visited us in our encampment expressed many good wishes for our success in our intended enterprise.

September 16th. Zealous in the cause, and not knowing the hardships and distresses we were to encounter, we as usual began our march very early. At eight o'clock we arrived at Newbury Port where we were to tarry several days and make preparations for our voyage. We were here to go on board vessels which we found lying ready to receive us and carry us to the mouth of the Kennebeck. The mouth of the Kennebeck River is about thirty leagues to the eastward of Newbury Port.

September 17th. We are still in Newbury Port and are ordered to appear at a general review.

We passed the review with much honor to ourselves. We manifested great zeal and animation in the cause of liberty and went through the manual exercise with much alacrity.

The spectators, who were very numerous, appeared much affected. They probably thought we had many hardships to encounter and many of us should never return to our parents and families.

September 18th. We this day embarked at six o'clock in the afternoon. Our fleet consisted of eleven sail, sloops and schooners. Our whole number of troops was 1100—11 companies of musketmen and three companies of riflemen. We hauled off into the road and got ready to weigh anchor in the morning if the wind should be favorable.

September 19th. This morning we got under way with a pleasant breeze, our drums beating, fifes playing and colours flying.

Many pretty girls stood upon the shore, I suppose weeping for the departure of their sweethearts.

At eleven o'clock this day we left the entrance of the harbor and bore away for Kennebeck River. In the latter part of the night, there came on a thick fog and our fleet was separated. At break of day we found ourselves in a most dangerous situation, very near a reef of rocks. The rocks indeed appeared on all sides of us, so that we feared we should have been dashed to pieces on some of them. We were brought into this deplorable situation by means of liquor being dealt out too freely to our pilots. Their intemperance much endangered their own lives and the lives of all the officers and soldiers on board; but through the blessing of God we all arrived safe in Kennebeck River.

September 20. This day was very pleasant, and with a gentle breeze we sailed and rowed 30 miles up the Kennebeck River. By the evening tide we floated within six miles of Fort Western, where we were obliged to leave our sloops and take to our bateaus.

September 21. This day we arrived at Fort Western, where we tarried until the 25th in order to make farther preparation for our voyage up the river, and our march through the wilderness. . . .

September 25th. Early this morning, we embarked on board our batteaus and proceeded on our way. We labored hard through the day and found ourselves at night but about 7 miles from the place of our departure. The current began to be swift. We encamped at night by the edge of a cornfield and fared very sumptuously.

September 26th. This day we started very early and made our encampment at evening 4 miles below Fort Halifax. We began to experience great difficulty from the increasing rapidity of the current, and the water becoming shoal.

September 27th. This day we carried our batteaus and baggage round Ticonnick Falls. The land carriage was only about 40 rods. After launching in again and getting our provisions and baggage on board, we pushed against the stream on our way about three miles.

September 28th. This day we proceeded 8 miles but with great difficulty. The stream was in some places very rapid and shoal, and in others so deep that those who dragged the boats were obliged to nearly swim. We encountered these hardships and fatigues with great courage and perseverance from the zeal we felt in the cause. When night came on, wet and fatigued as we were, we had to encamp on the cold ground. It was at this time that we inclined to think of the comfortable accommodations we had left at home.

September 29th. This day we arrived to the second carrying place, called Skowhegan Falls. Though this was only 60 rods over, it occasioned much delay and great fatigue. We had to ascend a ragged rock, near on 100 feet in height and almost perpendicular. Though it seemed as though we could hardly ascend it without any burden, we succeeded in dragging our batteaus and baggage up it.

September 30th. After getting over the carrying place, we found the water more still. We proceeded 5 miles and at sundown encamped in a most delightful wood, where I thought I could have spent some time agreeably in solitude, in contemplating the works of nature. The forest was stripped of its verdure, but still appeared to me beautiful. I thought that though we were in a thick wilderness, uninhabited by human beings, yet we were as much in the immediate presence of our divine protector as when in the crowded city.

October 1st. This day we proceeded with unusual perseverance, but as the water was exceedingly rapid, we could advance but slowly. It was but a small part of the way that any thing could be done by rowing or setting. While one took the batteau by the bow, another kept hold of the stern to keep her from upsetting or filling with water. Thus our fatigues seemed daily to encrease. But what we most dreaded was the frost and cold from which we began to suffer considerably.

October 2d. This day we carried over Norridgewock Falls, one mile and a quarter. At night we encamped at a place formerly inhabited by the natives and afterwards by the French and Indians; the former had erected a mass house for their devotions, but had deserted it at the time the New England forces made great slaughter among them in the French war. A few inhabitants were now living here, who rendered us some assistance. The temple of worship contained some curiosities, such as crosses, etc. We took up our lodgings here for the night and were much pleased with our accommodations. The place had the appearance of once having been the residence of a considerable number of inhabitants.

October 3d. Having had some better refreshment than usual, we pushed on our way with increased resolution. We had now taken leave of the last inhabitants. The remainder of our route was to be through a trackless wilderness. We now entered a doleful barren woods; the timber mostly pine and hemlock—some thick patches of spruce and fir, and some groves of sugar-maple.

2. DR. ISAAC SENTER DESCRIBES THE MISERIES AND STARVATION OF THE MARCH

Tuesday, October 24th, [1775]. Approaching necessity now obliged us to double our diligence. Three miles only had we proceeded ere we came to a troublesome water-fall in the river, distant half a mile. Not more than the last mentioned distance before we were brought up by another, distance the same. As the number of falls increased, the water became consequently more rapid. The heights of land upon each side of the river, which had hitherto been inconsiderable, now became prodigiously mountainous, closing as it were up the river with an aspect of an immense height. The river was now become very narrow, and such a horrid current as rendered it impossible to proceed in any other method than by hauling the batteaux up by the bushes, painters, etc.

Here we met several boats returning loaded with invalids, and lamentable stories of the inaccessibleness of the river, and the impracticability of any further progress into the country; among which was Mr. Jackson . . . , complaining of the gout most severely, joined to all the terrors of approaching famine. I was now exhorted in the most pathetic terms to return, on pain of famishing upon contrary conduct, and the army were all returning except a few who were many miles forward with Col. Arnold. However his elocution did not prevail; I therefore bid him adieu and proceeded.

Not far had I proceeded before I discovered several wrecks of batteaux belonging to the front division of riflemen, etc., with an increased velocity of the water. A direful howling wilderness, not describable. With much labour and difficulty I arrived with the principal part of my baggage (leaving the batteaux made fast) to the encampment. Two miles from thence I met the informants last mentioned, where were Col. Greene's division, etc., waiting for the remainder of the army to come up, that they might get some provisions, ere they advanced any further. Upon enquiry I found them almost destitute of any eatable whatever, except a few candles, which were used for supper, and breakfast the next morning, by boiling them in water gruel, etc.

Wednesday, 25. Every prospect of distress now came thundering on with a twofold rapidity. A storm of snow had covered the ground of nigh six inches deep, attended with very severe weather. We now waited in anxious expectation for Col. Enos' division to come up, in order that we might have a recruit of provisions ere we could start off the ground. An express was ordered both up and down the river, the one up the river in quest of Col. Arnold, that he might be informed of the state of the army, many of whom were now entirely destitute of any sustenance. The colonel had left previous orders for the two divisions, viz.: Greene's and Enos', to come to an adjustment of the provisions, send back any who were indisposed, either in body or mind, and pursue him with the others immediately. The other express went down the river to desire Col. Enos and officers to attend in consultation. They accordingly came up before noon, when a council of war was ordered. Here sat a number of grimacers—melancholy aspects who had been preaching to their men the doctrine of impenetrability and non-perseverance. Col. Enos in the chair. The matter was debated upon the expediency of proceeding on for Quebec. The party against going urging the impossibility, averring the whole provisions, when averaged, would not support the army five days.

The arrangements of men and provisions being made at Fort Western, in such a manner as to proceed with the greater expedition. For this end it was thought necessary that Capt. Morgan's company with a few pioneers should advance in the first division, Col. Greene's in the second, and Enos, with Capt. Colbourn's company of artificers, to bring up the rear. The advantage of the arrangement was very conspicuous, as the rear division would not only have the roads cut, rivers cleared passible for boats, etc., but stages of encampments formed and the bough huts remaining for the rear. The men being thus arranged, the provisions were distributed according to the supposed difficulty or facility attending the different dispositions. Many of the first companies took only two or three barrels of flour with several of bread, most in a small proportion, while the companies in the last division had not less than fourteen of flour and ten of bread. The bread, as mentioned before, was condemned in consequence of the leaky casks, therefore the proportion of bread being much greater in the first division, their loss was consequently the greater.

These hints being premised, I now proceed to the determination of the council of war. After debating upon the state of the army with respect to provisions, there was found very little in the division then encamped at the falls (which I shall name Hydrophobus). The other companies not being come up, either through fear that they should be obliged to come to a divider, or to shew their disapprobation of proceeding any further. The question being put whether all to return, or only part, the majority were for part only returning. . . .

According to Col. Arnold's recommendation the invalids were allowed to return, as also the timorous. One batteau only for each company to proceed, in order to carry the military stores, medicines, etc., . . . The officers who were for going forward requested the division of the provisions, and that it was necessary they should have the far greater quantity in proportion to the number of men, as the supposed distance that they had to go ere they arrived into the inhabitants was greater than what they had come, after leaving the Cenebec inhabitants. To this the returning party (being predetermined) would not consent. . . . To compel them to a just division we were not in a situation, as being the weakest party. Expostulations and entreaties had hitherto been fruitless. Col. Enos, who more immediately commanded the division of returners, was called upon to give positive orders for a small quantity, if no more. He replied that his men were out of his power, and that they had determined to keep their possessed quantity whether they went back or forward. They finally concluded to spare $2\frac{1}{2}$ barrels of flour, if determined to pursue our destination. . . .

Thus circumstanced, we were left the alternative of accepting their small pittance, and proceed or return. The former was adopted, with a determined resolution to go through or die. Received it, put it on board of our boats, quit the few tents we were in possession of, with all other camp equipage, took each man to his duds on his back, bid them adieu, and away—passed the river, passed over falls and encamped.

Thursday, 26th. We were now within 154 computed miles of the Canadian inhabitants; every man made the best of his way to the Chaudière pond, the place of rendezvous for all the forward party except Col. Arnold. Passed three carrying places on the river. Passed over several rocky mountains and monstrous precipices, to appearance inaccessible; fired with more than Hannibalian enthusiasm, American Alps nor Pyrenees were obstacles. Passed a pond which the river ran through, lodged on a promontory of another. Only Jack Wright was in company. Came to us in the night Maj. Ogden, volunteer, who being lost spied our fire, and came on shore in his boat in which were military stores, etc.

Friday, 27th. Our bill of fare for last night and this morning consisted of the jawbone of a swine destitute of any covering. This we boiled in a quantity of water, that with a little thickening constituted our sumptuous eating. For covering, the atmosphere only, except a blanket. . . .

Saturday, 28th. A letter per express from General Arnold, at 4 o'clock, P. M., requesting as speedy a procedure as possible. That one of his expresses (Jackquith) had returned from the Canadian inhabitants, informing of their amicable disposition towards us, that he had received their pledge of friendship in a loaf of bread, etc. By this time our men were all arrived, embodied, and the glad tidings promulgated among them, to the unspeakable joy of the whole camp. In consequence of this news we were ordered to be in motion immediately. The provisions were ordered into one fund, in order that every man might be acquainted with what he had to depend upon to carry him into the inhabitants, computed at about a hundred miles. Upon a division of the provisions there [were] five pints per man. Pork, though the only meat, was not properly divisible, as the whole amount would not have been an ounce per man. The officers in general were generous enough to dispense with [it] for the better satisfaction and encouragement of the soldiers. Decamped this evening and marched a mile and a half.

Sunday, 29th. Not less than 14 days had our detachment been upon half allowance ere yesterday's division took place. That several of the men devoured the whole of their flour the last evening, determined (as they expressed it) to have a full meal, letting the morrow look out for itself. The ground being overflowed with water before the little stream emptied into the Chaudière, it was thought best by the majority to go to the southeast of the stream upon the higher land and so pass round the lake; however, there were three or four companies proceeded down the stream as far as they could, then leaving it to the southward, and taking the north-westerly shore round the lake. While Col. Greene and most of his officers including myself took our course N. E. and by E. for the Chaudière. Deluded by a pretended pilot, we found our error ere night closed upon us.

From the first appearance of daylight this morn we picked up our small affairs and beat a march. Not long had we marched this course before we came into a spruce and cedar swamp and arrived at a small pond at 11 o'clock, through the most execrable bogmire, impenetrable Pluxus of shrubs, imaginable. This pond we pursued till coming to an outlet rivulet, [which] we followed to a lake much larger than the first, and notwithstanding the most confident assertions of our pilot, we pursued this pond the most of the day, but no Chaudière. . . . This day's march was computed at eighteen miles. Capt. Morgan's company, with seven batteaux, followed the 7 mile stream, with a purpose of passing the south lake, which they effected. These old woodsmen had resolutely persevered in carrying that number of boats over the mountains, with an intent to still preserve a certain quantity of the military stores, which by no other means could be conveyed any further than the Chaudière.

Monday, 30th. . . . This was the third day we had been in search of the Chaudière, who were only seven computed miles distant the 28th inst. Nor were we possessed of any certainty that our course would bring us either to the lake or river, not knowing the point it lay from where we started. However we came to a resolution to continue it. In this state of uncertainty we wandered through hideous swamps and mountainous precipices, with the conjoint addition of cold, wet and hunger, not to mention our fatigue—with the terrible apprehension of famishing in this desert. The pretended pilot was not less frightened than many of the rest; added to that the severe execrations he received, from the front of the army to the rear, made his office not a little disagreeable.

Several of the men towards evening were ready to give up any thoughts of ever arriving at the desired haven. Hunger and fatigue had so much the ascendancy over many of the poor fellows, added to their despair of arrival, that some of them were left in the river, nor were heard of afterwards. In turn with Col. Greene, I carried the compass the greater part of this day. In this condition we proceeded with as little knowledge of where we were or where we should get to, as if we had been in the unknown interior of Africa, or the deserts of Arabia.

Just as the sun was departing, we brought a pond or lake, which finally proved to be Chaudière, and soon the small footpath made by the other division of the army, whose choice turned to their account. Our arrival here was succeeded with three huzzas, and then came to our encampment.

Tuesday, 31. The appearance of daylight roused us as usual, and we had advanced with all possible speed till about 11 o'clock, ere we saw the Chaudière River, which we last night imagined within a mile. Animated afresh with the sight of a stream, which we very well knew would conduct us into the inhabitants if our strength continued, we proceeded with renewed vigour. The emptying of the Chaudière is beautiful, and formed a very agreeable ascent, though the stream is somewhat rapid. The land was now much descending, yet very difficult travelling. The spruce, cedar and hemlock were the chief growth of the earth, and these were in tolerable plenty, almost impenetrably so in many places.

We now began to discover the wrecked batteaux of those who conducted the ammunition, etc. These were seven in number, who followed the seven mile stream into the Chaudière lake, river, etc., and soon came to an encampment, where I found Capt. Morgan and most of the boatmen who were wrecked upon a fall in the river, losing every thing except their lives, which they all saved by swimming, except one of Morgan's riflemen. This was the first man drowned in all the dangers we were exposed to, and the third [lost] by casualties, except some lost in the wilderness, the number unknown. At this encampment was Lieut. McClelland, of Morgan's company, almost expiring with a violent peripneumonia. Necessaries were distributed as much as possible, with two lads of the company in charge of him. Nor was this poor fellow the only one left sick upon this river. Life depending upon a vigorous push for the inhabitants, and that did not admit of any stay for any person; nor could the two lads have been prevailed upon had not provisions been dealt out sufficient to conduct them to the inhabitants, with the promising to send them relief as soon as possible from the settlements.

In this general wreck my medicine box suffered the fate of the rest, with a set of capital instruments, etc. Though little was to be feared from either my chirurgical apparatus or physical portions, I had, however, a few necessities in that way in my knapsack, etc., with a lancet in my pocket, which enabled me at least to comply with the Sangradoine method.

Wednesday, Nov. 1st. Our greatest luxuries now consisted in a little water, stiffened with flour, in imitation of shoemakers' paste, which was christened with the name of Lillipu. Instead of the diarrhea, which tried our men most shockingly in the former part of our march, the reverse was now the complaint, which continued for many days. We had now arrived, as we thought, to almost the zenith of distress. Several had been entirely destitute of either meat or bread for many days. These chiefly consisted of those who devoured their provision immediately, and a number who were in the boats. The voracious disposition many of us had now arrived at rendered almost any thing admissible. Clean and unclean were forms now little in use. In company was a poor dog [who had] hitherto lived through all the tribulations, became a prey for the sustenance of the assassins. This poor animal was instantly devoured, without leaving any vestige of the sacrifice. Nor did the shaving soap, pomatum, and even the lip salve, leather of their shoes, cartridge boxes, etc., share any better fate. Passed several poor fellows, truly commiserating [them].

Thursday, 2d. Long ere this necessity had obliged us to dismiss all our encamping equipage, excepting a small light tin kettle among a number; but nothing to cut our wood, etc. According to our strength and spirits, we were scattered up and down the river at the distance of perhaps twenty miles. Not more than eight miles had we marched when a vision of horned cattle, four-footed beasts, etc., rode and drove by animals resembling Plato's two footed featherless ones. Upon a nigher approach our vision proved real! Exclamations of joy, echoes of gladness resounded from front to rear with a [Te Deum]. Three horned cattle, two horses, eighteen Canadians and one American. A heifer was chosen as victim to our wants, slain and divided accordingly. Each man was restricted to one pound of beef. Soon arrived two more Canadians in b[irch] canoes, laden with a coarse kind of meal, mutton, tobacco, etc. Each man drew likewise a pint of this provender. The mutton was destined for the sick. They proceeded up the river in order to the rear's partaking of the same benediction. We sat down, eat our rations, blessed our stars, and thought it luxury. Upon a general computation we marched from 20 to 30 miles per day. Twenty miles only from this to the settlements. Lodged at the great falls this night.

3. COLONEL ARNOLD CELEBRATES THE HEROISM OF HIS MARCH TO QUEBEC

Pointe Aux Trembles, November 27, 1775

. . . Thus in about eight weeks we completed a march of near six hundred miles, not to be paralleled in history; the men having with the greatest fortitude and perseverance hauled their batteaux up rapid streams, being obliged to wade almost the whole way, near 180 miles, carried them on their shoulders near forty miles, over hills, swamps and bogs almost impenetrable, and to their knees in mire; being often obliged to cross three or four times with their baggage. Short of provisions, part of the detachment disheartened and gone back; famine staring us in the face; an enemy's country and uncertainty ahead. Notwithstanding all these obstacles, the officers and men, inspired and fired with the love of liberty and their country, pushed on with a fortitude superior to every obstacle, and most of them had not one day's provision for a week.

I have thus given you a short but imperfect sketch of our march. The night we crossed the St. Lawrence, found it impossible to get our ladders over, and the enemy being apprised of our coming, we found it impracticable to attack them without too great a risk; we therefore invested the town and cut off their communication with the country. We continued in this situation until the 20th, having often attempted to draw out the garrison in vain. On a strict scrutiny into our ammunition, found many of our cartridges (which to appearance were good) inserviceable and not ten rounds each for the men, who were almost naked, bare footed and much fatigued; and as the garrison was daily increasing and nearly double our numbers, we thought it prudent to retire to this place and wait the arrival of Gen. Montgomery, with artillery, clothing, etc., who to our great joy has this morning joined us with about 300 men. We propose immediately investing the town and make no doubt in a few days to bring Gov. Carlton to terms. You will excuse the incorrectness of my letter and believe me with the greatest esteem.

III. THE FATEFUL ASSAULT ON QUEBEC

Not until November 9 did Arnold's emaciated and ragged band reach the banks of the St. Lawrence, and as yet Montgomery had not come up from Montreal. The delay was fatal. Quebec had been defended by only a handful of men, but its leaders were indomitable. Colonel Allan Maclean brought in his regiment of Royal Highland Emigrants; the governor of the city, Hector Cramahé, raised 500 soldiers; another 300 were drawn from the ships in the harbor; eventually Maclean—and after him Carleton—commanded a force of over 1,700. Arnold had only 700 or so, and Montgomery brought another 300. More to the point, he brought warm clothing for the freezing veterans of the Maine woods, and cannon and ammunition. Arnold tried to bluff the fortress into surrender, but without effect. He tried to hammer it into submission, but his cannon could not batter down the fortifications. If Quebec was to fall it would have to fall to assault. The plans were carefully laid. The assault would have to be a surprise, which meant nighttime and, preferably, a snowstorm—a gamble as risky for the Americans as for the French and British defenders. Arnold and Montgomery divided their forces, Arnold tried to attack from the north, or Charles River side, Montgomery from the west and south, the St. Lawrence side. The desperate assault was launched in a blinding blizzard early in the morning of the first day of the year. Almost from the beginning everything went wrong. Montgomery was killed; Arnold was wounded; the attack disintegrated. The Americans lost perhaps 60 men killed but over 400 prisoners; the defenders lost only 18 killed and wounded. Arnold drew off to lick his wounds; he breathed defiance; he vowed to renew the attack.

Among those who contribute to our account of the disaster, nothing is known of Major Henry Caldwell, or of Thomas Ainslie except that he was a literary collector of customs for the port of Quebec. John Henry was a seventeen-year-old member of Arnold's army; his journal was dictated many years later.

1. MONTGOMERY JOINS ARNOLD BEFORE QUEBEC

General Richard Montgomery to General Schuyler.

Heights of Abraham, Dec. 5, 1775

I have been this evening favoured with yours of the 19th ult., and return to you many thanks for your warm congratulations. Nothing shall be wanting on my part to reap the advantage of our good fortune. The season has proved so favourable as to enable me to join Colonel Arnold at Point-aux-Trembles, where I arrived with the vessels Mr. Prescott made us a present of. They carried the few troops, about three hundred, which were equipped for a winter campaign, with the artillery, etc. Colonel Livingston is on his way, with some part of his regiment of Canadians.

Mr. Carleton, who is I suppose ashamed to show himself in England, is now in town, and puts on the show of defence. The works of Quebec are extremely extensive, and very incapable of being defended.

His garrison consists of Maclean's banditti, the sailors from the frigates and other vessels laid up, together with the citizens obliged to take up arms, most of whom are impatient of the fatigues of a siege, and wish to see matters accommodated amicably. I propose amusing Mr. Carleton with a formal attack, erecting batteries, etc., but mean to assault the works, I believe, towards the lower town, which is the weakest part. I have this day written to Mr. Carleton, and also to the inhabitants, which I hope will have some effect. I shall be very sorry to be reduced to this mode of attack, because I know the melancholy consequences, but the approaching severe season, and the weakness of the garrison, together with the nature of the works, point it out too strong to be passed by.

I find Colonel Arnold's corps an exceeding fine one, inured to fatigue, and well accustomed to cannon shot (at Cambridge). There is a style of discipline among them much superior to what I have been used to see this campaign. He himself is active, intelligent and enterprising. Fortune often baffles the sanguine expectations of poor mortals. I am not intoxicated with the favours I have received at her hands, but I do think there is a fair prospect of success.

The Governour has been so kind as to send out of town many of our friends who refused to do military duty; among them several very intelligent men, capable of doing me considerable service. One of them, a Mr. Antill, I have appointed chief engineer, Mr. Mott and all his suite having returned home. Be so good as to show Congress the necessity I was under of clothing the troops, to induce them to stay and undertake this service at such an inclement season. . . .

With a year's clothing of the 7th and 26th, I have relieved the distresses of Arnold's corps, and forwarded the clothing of some other corps. The greatest part of that clothing is a fair prize, except such as immediately belonged to the prisoners taken on board; they must be paid for theirs, as it was their own property. We shall have more time hereafter to settle this affair. Should there be any reason to apprehend an effort next spring to regain Canada, I would not wish to see less than ten thousand men ordered here. The Canadians will be our friends as long as we are able to maintain our ground, but they must not be depended upon, especially for defensive operations. The great distance from any support or relief renders it in my opinion absolutely necessary to make the most formidable preparations for the security of this important Province. What advantages the country below Quebeck affords for defence I cannot yet assert, but the rapids of Richlieu, some miles above, may be defended against all the navy and all the military force of Great Britain, by such a body of troops as I have mentioned, provided with sufficient artillery, row-gallies, and proper vessels fitted for fire-ships.

2. THE DEATH OF MONTGOMERY

Journal of Abner Stocking.

Between four and five in the morning [of Jan. 1] the signal was given; and the several divisions moved to the assault, under a violent storm of snow.

The plan was so well concerted that from the side of the River St. Lawrence along the fortified front round to the bason, every part seemed equally threatened. Montgomery, at the head of the New York troops, advanced along the St. Lawrence by the way of Aunce de Mère, under Cape Diamond. The first barrier to be surmounted on this side was at the Pot-Ash. It was defended by a battery in which were mounted a few pieces of artillery, about two hundred paces in front of which was a block-house and picket. The guard placed at the block-house, being chiefly Canadians, having given a random and harmless fire, threw away their arms and fled in confusion to the barrier.

Unfortunately, the difficulties of the route rendered it impossible for Montgomery instantly to avail himself of this first impression. Cape Diamond, around which he was to make his way, presents a precipice, the foot of which is washed by the river, where enormous and rugged masses of ice had been piled on each other, so as to render the way almost impassible. Along the scanty path leading under the projecting rocks of the precipice, the Americans pressed forward in a narrow file, until they reached the block-house and picket. Montgomery, who was himself in front, assisted with his own hands to cut down or pull up the pickets, and open a passage for his troops; but the excessive roughness and difficulty of the way had so lengthened his line of march that he found it absolutely necessary to halt a few minutes in order to collect a force with which he might venture to proceed. Having reassembled about two hundred men, whom he encouraged alike by his voice and his example, he advanced boldly and rapidly at their head to force the barrier. One or two persons had now ventured to return to the battery, and, seizing a slow-match standing by one of the guns, discharged the piece, when the American front was within forty paces of it. This single accidental fire was a fatal one. The general with Captains M'Pherson and Cheeseman, two valuable young officers near his person, the first of whom was his aid, together with his orderly sergeant and a private, were killed on the spot. The loss of their general, in whom their confidence had been so justly placed, discouraged the troops; and Colonel Campbell, on whom the command devolved but who did not partake of that spirit of heroism which had animated their departed chief, made no attempt to prosecute the enterprise. This whole division retired precipitately from the action and left the garrison at leisure, after recovering from the consternation into which they had been thrown, to direct their undivided force against Arnold.

3. MAJOR CALDWELL TELLS HOW ARNOLD'S ATTACK WAS FRUSTRATED

Letter probably written by Major Henry Caldwell of the British Army to General James Murray.

Sloop-of-War Hunter, June 15, 1776

The 31st of December about five o'clock in the morning we were alarmed at our picket by Capt. Fraser, who was captain of the main guard and, returning from his rounds, told us that there was a brisk firing kept up at Cape

Diamond. The morning was dark, and at that time a drizzling kind of snow falling. McLean (who was second in command in the garrison, and who really, to do him justice, was indefatigable in the pains he took) begged that I would take part of my corps to Cape Diamond, and if I found it a false attack (as we both supposed it to be), after leaving the necessary reinforcements there, I might return with the rest. I accordingly went there, found the enemy firing at a distance, saw there was nothing serious intended, and after ordering a proper disposition to be made, proceeded to Port Louis. . . .

I hastened, with what expedition I could, by the back of the Hotel Dieu, in the Lower Town, and on my way passed by the picket drawn up under the field officer of the day, who was Major Cox, formerly of the 47th and now Lieut.-Governor of Gaspé. I got him to allow me to take your friend Nairne, with a subaltern and thirty men, and then proceeded to the Lower Town, where I found things, though not in a good way, yet not desperate. The enemy had got in at the Sault-au-Matelot, but, neglecting to push on, as they should have done, were stopped at the second barrier which our people got shut just as I arrived. It was so placed as to shut up the street of the Sault-au-Matelot from any communications with the rest of the Lower Town. As I was coming up, I found our people, the Canadians especially, shy of advancing towards the barrier, and was obliged to exert myself a good deal. To do old Voyer, their colonel, justice, though he is no great officer, yet he did not show any want of spirit. However, my coming up with Nairne and a lieutenant, with fifty seamen, gave our people new spirits.

I posted people in the different houses that commanded the street of Sault-au-Matelot; some in the house where Levy, the Jew, formerly lived, others at Lymeburner's. The officers of the Fusileers I posted in the street with fixed bayonets, ready to receive the enemy in case they got on our side of the barrier. They had, on their side of it, fixed some ladders, and then another to our side as it were to come down by, that was useful to us. I ordered it to be pulled away and fixed it to the window in the gable end of a house towards us, the front of which commanded the street of the Sault-au-Matelot and their side of the barrier.

Then I sent Captain Nairne and Dambourges, an officer also of McLean's corps, with a party of their people. Nairne and Dambourges entered the window with a great deal of spirit and got into the house on that side, just as the enemy was entering it by the front door. But Nairne soon dislodged them with his bayonets, driving them into the street; nor did they approach the barrier afterwards. They however kept up a brisk fire from back windows of the houses they had occupied in Sault-au-Matelot Street on our people in Lymeburner's house, on his wharf, and the street adjacent, from one of their houses.

I had a narrow escape, for going at day-break to reconnoitre on the wharf under them, just as they took post there, they asked, "Who is there?"

At first I thought they might have been some of Nairne's people, who I knew were next door to them, and answered, "A friend—who are you?"

They answered, "Captain Morgan's company."

I told them to have good heart for they would soon be in the town, and immediately got behind a pile of boards beside me, not above ten or twelve yards from them, and escaped.

Their fire, however, a good deal slackened towards nine o'clock, especially after I brought a 9-pounder on Lymeburner's wharf to bear upon them, the first shot of which killed one of their men and wounded another. I then called out to Nairne in their hearing, so that he should let me know when he heard firing on the other side; our General had sent 500 men to hem the enemy in on that side; they soon after began to give themselves up and surrender to Nairne, who sent them through the window to us. They then began to crowd in in such numbers that we opened the barrier, and they all gave themselves up on that side, while the party that made the sortie were busy in the same manner on the other side of the post, and which had delayed so long from coming up in taking and sending in by Palace Gate some straggling prisoners; but they had not a shot fired at them, and just arrived on that end of the post, the enemy surprised at the time [by] the officer I sent to take possession of our old post, [who] arrived with a small party, supported by Nairne with 100 men.

Thus ended our attack on that side, in which the enemy had about 20 men killed, upwards of 40 men wounded, and about 400 made prisoners. Had they acted with more spirit, they might have pushed in at first and possessed themselves of the whole of Lower Town, and let their friends in at the other side, before our people had time to have recovered from a certain degree of panic, which seized them on the first news of the post being surprised.

4. "IT WAS APPARENT THAT WE MUST SURRENDER"

Account of John Henry, Pennsylvania private in Arnold's army.

It was not until the night of the thirty-first of December, 1775, that such kind of weather ensued as was considered favorable for the assault. The forepart of the night was admirably enlightened by a luminous moon. Many of us, officers as well as privates, had dispersed in various directions among the farm and tippling houses of the vicinity. We well knew the signal for rallying. This was no other than a snow-storm. About twelve o'clock P.M., the heaven was overcast. We repaired to quarters. By two o'clock we were accoutred and began our march. The storm was outrageous, and the cold wind extremely biting. In this northern country the snow is blown horizontally into the faces of travelers on most occasions—this was our case.

January 1st. When we came to Craig's house, near Palace Gate, a horrible roar of cannon took place, and a ringing of all the bells of the city, which are very numerous and of all sizes. Arnold, heading the forlorn hope, advanced perhaps one hundred yards before the main body. After these followed Lamb's artilleryists. Morgan's company led in the secondary part of the column of infantry. [Captain] Smith's followed, headed by Steele, the captain, from particular causes, being absent. Hendrick's company succeeded, and the eastern men, so far as known to me, followed in due order. The snow was deeper than in the fields, because of the nature of the ground. The path made by Arnold, Lamb and Morgan was almost imperceptible because of the falling snow; covering the locks of our guns with the lappets of our coats, holding down our heads (for it was impossible to bear up our faces against the imperious storm of wind and snow), we ran along the foot of the hill in single file. Along the first of our run, from Palace Gate, for several hundred paces, there stood a range of insulated buildings which seemed to be store-houses; we passed these quickly in single file, pretty wide apart. The interstices were from thirty to fifty yards. In these intervals we received a tremendous fire of musketry from the ramparts above us. Here we lost some brave men, when powerless to return the salutes we received, as the enemy was covered by his impregnable defences. They were even sightless to us; we could see nothing but the blaze from the muzzles of their muskets.

A number of vessels of various sizes lay along the beach, moored by their hawsers or cables to the houses. Pacing after my leader, Lieutenant Steele, at a great rate, one of these ropes took me under the chin and cast me headlong down a declivity of at least fifteen feet. The place appeared to be either a dry dock or a sawpit. My descent was terrible; gun and all was involved in a great depth of snow. Most unluckily, however, one of my knees received a violent contusion on a piece of scraggy ice, which was covered by the snow. On like occasions we can scarce expect, in the hurry of attack, that our intimates should attend to any other than their own concerns. Mine went from me, regardless of my fate. Scrabbling out of the cavity, without assistance, divesting my person and gun of the snow, and limping into the line, it was attempted to assume a station and preserve it. These were none of my friends—they knew me not. We had not gone twenty yards in my hobbling gait before I was thrown out and compelled to await the arrival of a chasm in the line, where a new place might be obtained. Men in affairs such as this seem in the main to lose the compassionate feeling and are averse from being dislodged from their original stations.

We proceeded rapidly, exposed to a long line of fire from the garrison, for now we were unprotected by any buildings. The fire had slackened in a small degree. The enemy had been partly called off to resist the general and strengthen the party opposed to Arnold in our front.

Now we saw Colonel Arnold returning, wounded in the leg and supported by two gentlemen. . . . Arnold called to the troops in a cheering voice as we passed, urging us forward, yet it was observable among the soldiery, with whom it was my misfortune to be now placed, that the colonel's retiring damped their spirits. A cant term, "We are sold," was repeatedly heard in many parts throughout the line.

Thus proceeding enfiladed by an animated but lessened fire, we came to the first barrier, where Arnold had been wounded in the onset. This contest had lasted but a few minutes and was somewhat severe, but the energy of our men prevailed. The embrasures were entered when the enemy were discharging their guns. The guard, consisting of thirty persons, were either taken or fled, leaving their arms behind them.

At this time it was discovered that our guns were useless, because of the dampness. The snow, which lodged in our fleecy coats, was melted by the warmth of our bodies. Thence came that disaster. Many of the party, knowing the circumstance, threw aside their own and seized the British arms. These were not only elegant, but were such as befitted the hand of a real soldier. It was said that ten thousand stand of such arms had been received from England in the previous summer for arming the Canadian militia. Those people were loath to bear them in opposition to our rights.

From the first barrier to the second, there was a circular course along the sides of houses, and partly through a street, probably of three hundred yards or more. This second barrier was erected across and near the mouth of a narrow street, adjacent to the foot of the hill, which opened into a larger, leading soon into the main body of the lower town. Here it was that the most serious contention took place; this became the bone of strife.

The admirable Montgomery by this time (though it was unknown to us) was no more; yet we expected momentarily to join him. The firing on that side of the fortress ceased, his division fell under the command of a Colonel Campbell of the New York line, a worthless chief who retreated without making an effort in pursuance of the general's original plans. The inevitable consequence was that the whole of the forces on that side of the city, and those who were opposed to the dastardly persons employed to make the false attacks, embodied and came down to oppose our division.

Here was sharp shooting. We were on the disadvantageous side of the barrier for such a purpose. Confined in a narrow street hardly more than twenty feet wide, and on the lower ground, scarcely a ball, well aimed or otherwise, but must take effect upon us. Morgan, Hendricks, Steele, Humphreys and a crowd of every class of the army had gathered into the narrow pass, attempting to surmount the barrier, which was about twelve or more feet high and so strongly constructed that nothing but artillery could effectuate its destruction.

There was a construction fifteen or twenty yards within the barrier, upon a rising ground, the cannon of which much overtopped the height of the barrier; hence we were assailed by grape shot in abundance. This erection we called the platform. Again, within the barrier, and close in to it, were two ranges of musketeers, armed with musket and bayonet, ready to receive those who might venture the dangerous leap. Add to all this that the enemy occupied the upper chambers of the houses, in the interior of the barrier, on both sides of the street, from the windows of which we became fair marks. The enemy having the advantage of the ground in front, a vast superiority of numbers [and] dry and better arms gave them an irresistible power in so narrow a space.

Humphreys, upon a mound which was speedily erected, attended by many brave men, attempted to scale the barrier, but was compelled to retreat by the formidable phalanx of bayonets within and the weight of fire from the platform and the buildings. Morgan, brave to temerity, stormed and raged; Hendricks, Steele, Nichols, Humphreys, equally brave, were sedate, though under a tremendous fire. The platform, which was within our view, was evacuated by the accuracy of our fire, and few persons dared venture there again.

Now it was that the necessity of the occupancy of the houses, on our side of the barrier, became apparent. Orders were given by Morgan to that effect. We entered—this was near daylight. The houses were a shelter from which we could fire with much accuracy. Yet even here some valuable lives were lost. Hendricks, when aiming his rifle at some prominent person, died by a straggling ball through his heart. He staggered a few feet backwards and fell upon a bed, where he instantly expired. He was an ornament of our little society. The amiable Humphreys died by a like kind of wound, but it was in the street, before we entered the buildings. Many other brave men fell at this place; among these were Lieutenant Cooper, of Connecticut, and perhaps fifty or sixty non-commissioned officers and privates. The wounded were numerous, and many of them dangerously so. Captain Lamb, of the York artillerists, had nearly one half of his face carried away by a grape or canister shot. My friend Steele lost three of his fingers as he was presenting his gun to fire; Captain Hubbard and Lieutenant Fisdle were also among the wounded. When we reflect upon the whole of the dangers at this barricade, and the formidable force that came to annoy us, it is a matter of surprise that so many should escape death and wounding as did.

All hope of success having vanished, a retreat was contemplated, but hesitation, uncertainty and a lassitude of mind, which generally takes place in the affairs of men when we fail in a project upon which we have attached much expectation, now followed. That moment was foolishly lost when such a movement might have been made with tolerable success. Captain Laws, at the head of two hundred men, issuing from Palace Gate, most fairly and handsomely cooped us up. Many of the men, aware of the consequences, and all our Indians and Canadians (except Natanis and another) escaped across the ice which covered the bay of St. Charles, before the arrival of Captain Laws. This was a dangerous and desperate adventure, but worth while the undertaking, in avoidance of our subsequent sufferings. Its desperateness consisted in running two miles across shoal ice, thrown up by the high tides of this latitude—and its danger in the meeting with air holes, deceptively covered by the bed of snow.

. . . About nine o'clock, A.M., it was apparent to all of us that we must surrender. It was done.

5. BENEDICT ARNOLD BOASTS THAT HE WILL NOT LEAVE QUEBEC

Colonel Benedict Arnold to Hannah Arnold.

Camp before Quebec, January 6, 1776

Before this reaches you I make no doubt you will have heard of our misfortune of the 31st ultimo and will be anxious for my safety. I should have wrote you before, but a continual hurry of business has prevented me. The command of the army, by the death of my truly great and good friend, General Montgomery, devolved on me; a task, I find, too heavy under my present circumstances.

I received a wound by a ball through my left leg, at the time I had gained the first battery at the lower town, which, by the loss of blood, rendered me very weak. As soon as the main body came up, with some assistance I returned to the hospital, near a mile, on foot, being obliged to draw one leg after me, and a great part of the way under the continual fire of the enemy from the walls, at no greater distance than fifty yards. I providentially escaped, though several were shot down at my side.

I soon learned the death of our general, who attacked the town at the side opposite to me; he behaved heroically; marched up in the face of their cannon and, when he had nearly gained the pass, received the fatal shot, or the town would have been ours. This occasioned the disaster that afterwards happened to my detachment, which, after the general's defeat, had the whole garrison to encounter, under every disadvantage of ground, etc., etc. To return was impossible, as the route was within fifty yards and exposed to the fire of the whole garrison, who had brought several pieces out of one of the gates, which our people would have been obliged to pass. In this situation, they maintained their ground near three hours, but, being overpowered with numbers, were obliged to lay down their arms; about three hundred, including Captain Lamb, of New-York, and part of the train, were taken prisoners and, as near as I can judge, about sixty killed and wounded. Captain Oswald is among the prisoners; he was with me in a selected party of about twenty-five, who attacked the first battery, behaved gallantly and gained much honour. The prisoners are treated politely and supplied with every thing the garrison affords. Governour Carleton sent to let me know that the soldiers' baggage, if I pleased, might be sent to them, which I shall immediately send.

Though the enemy are now double our number, they have made no attempt to come out. We are as well prepared to receive them as we can possibly be in our present situation, divided at a distance of two miles. I expect General Wooster from Montreal in a few days with a reinforcement. I hope we shall be properly supported with troops by the Congress. I have no thoughts of leaving this proud town until I first enter it in triumph.

My wound has been exceeding painful, but is now easy, and the surgeons assure me will be well in eight weeks. I know you will be anxious for me. That Providence which has carried me through so many dangers is still my protection. I am in the way of my duty and know no fear.

6. "THUS WAS QUEBEC FREED FROM A SWARM OF MISGUIDED PEOPLE"

Journal of Thomas Ainslie.

May 6th, [1776]. There was frost last night with a gentle breeze at N. E. About 4 o'clock this morning guns were heard at a distance—we heard repeated reports nearer and nearer.

A woman came early to Palace Gate and informed the sentry that Mr. Thomas with his reinforcement was arrived and that Mr. Wooster was gone off, that they all appear in confusion, loading all the carts they can find with baggage, arms, etc.

About 6 o'clock a vessel appeared turning Point Levy to the inconceivable joy of all who saw her. The news soon reached every pillow in town; people half dressed ran down to the Grand Battery to feast their eyes with the sight of a ship of war displaying the Union flag.

She made signals of friendship and proved to be the Surprise frigate commanded by Capt. Lindsay; part of the 29th Regiment with the marines belonging to that ship were immediately landed. The Isis and Sloop Martin arrived the same tide; their marines were also landed. The whole made about 200.

The drums beat to arms; the different corps assembled on the Parade.

It was there proposed that the volunteers of the British and Canadian militia should join the troops and sailors to engage the Rebels on the plains; to their credit be it said that almost to a man both corps were anxious to be led to action.

The general at the head of about 800 men marched out at 12 o'clock; the little army extended itself quite across the plains, making a fine appearance. The Rebels saw us very formidable.

A few shots were exchanged by our advanced party and the rear guard of the enemy; their balls whistled over us without hurting a man. They fled most precipitately as soon as our field pieces began to play on their guard houses and advanced posts. They left cannon, mortars, field pieces, muskets and even their cloaths behind them. As we pursued them we found the road strewn with arms, cartridges, cloaths, bread, pork, etc.

Their confusion was so great, their panic so violent, that they left orderly books and papers, which for their own credit should not have been left. Look whatsoever way one would, he saw men flying and laden carts driving full speed.

We took possession of their General Hospital and of a guard house two miles beyond it; of Holland house, Mr. Dupres', etc. There and at Sillerie we found provisions and artillery stores.

We returned to town about 4 o'clock. The Surprise and Martin sailed up the river to destroy the enemy craft. A guard was posted at the General Hospital in the evening. . . .

May 7. Party's are detached all around. The Rebels abandoned the Gaspey on the approach of our ships; she was half prepared as a fire ship. We found two other vessels without any body on board.

The frigates fired on bateaus full of runaways; the turning of the tide unfortunately forced them to come to an anchor, and the bateaus rowed close to shore and got off.

To lighten their boats they inhumanly threw out many of their sick men upon the beach. Some of them expired before our parties could get to their relief; those objects of compassion whom we found alive were sent to the General Hospital.

Thus was the country round Quebec freed from a swarm of misguided people, led by designing men, enemies to the liberties of their country, under the specious title of the Assertors of American Rights.

IV. THE ARMY IN RETREAT

Notwithstanding his disastrous defeat, Arnold refused to retreat, but hung grimly on in the hope that reinforcements might enable him to renew the attack. Sure enough the reinforcements began to trickle in, and by May there were probably 7,000 Americans in Canada—and, in addition, the three commissioners, Benjamin Franklin, Charles Carroll of Carrollton and Samuel Chase, whose mission to win the affections of the habitants, hopefully authorized by a deluded Congress, was as desperate as had been Arnold's attack. But as fast as the American army was built up, it seemed to melt away—partly due to desertion, but chiefly to smallpox. And at the same time the British, too, were pouring in reinforcements. When in May the British fleet sailed down the St. Lawrence and up to Quebec, it was clear that the game was up. Arnold had already been supplanted by the feeble General David Wooster, and had withdrawn to Montreal. The morale of the Americans went to pieces, and a substantial force surrendered at "The Cedars," a small post some forty miles above Montreal, almost without firing a shot. All through May and June they retreated, along the St. Lawrence, down the Richelieu, back to their own country. As they fled, their situation got increasingly desperate. The ravages of smallpox spread, and so, too, other diseases. Even Crown Point was abandoned, and eventually the pitiful remnants of the army found refuge at Fort Ticonderoga.

Of our chroniclers we have met Dr. Senter before. John Lacey was a Pennsylvania captain. All we know of young Charles Cushing is that he was from Massachusetts. General John Sullivan was a New Hampshireman who had won some small reputation for courage and enterprise during the fighting around Boston. A member of the Second Continental Congress, he was commissioned brigadier general; took charge of the army on its retreat from Canada; fought with Washington in New York and in the Pennsylvania campaign; and later took command of an expedition into the Indian country. After the war he was three times governor of his state. His military career was far stormier than his political.

1. THE COWARDLY SURRENDER AT THE CEDARS

Report of Committee of Congress to consider General Arnold's Cartel after The Cedars.

In Congress, July 10, 1776

The Committee find that a party of three hundred and ninety Continental troops, under the command of Colonel Bedel, was posted at the Cedars, about forty-three miles above Montreal; that they had there formed some works of defence, the greater part of them picketed lines, the rest a breast-work, with two field-pieces mounted.

That on Wednesday the 15th of May, Colonel Bedel received intelligence that a party of the enemy, consisting of about six hundred regulars, Canadians and Indians, were on the way to attack his post, and were within nine miles of it; that Colonel Bedel thereon set out himself for Montreal, to procure a reinforcement, whereupon the command at the Cedars devolved on Major Butterfield.

That on Thursday, a reinforcement, under the command of Major Sherburne, marched from Montreal for the Cedars, while a larger detachment should be getting ready to proceed thither with Brigadier-General Arnold.

That on Friday the 19th, the enemy, under the command of Captain Forster, invested the post at the Cedars, and for two days kept up a loose, scattering fire; that Major Butterfield, from the very first, proposed to surrender the post, and refused repeated solicitations from his officers and men to permit them to sally out on the enemy.

That on Sunday afternoon, a flag being sent in by the enemy, Major Butterfield agreed to surrender the fort and garrison to Captain Forster, capitulating with him (whether verbally or in writing, does not appear) that the garrison should not be put into the hands of the savages, and that their baggage should not be plundered.

That, at the time of the surrender, the enemy consisted of about forty regulars, one hundred Canadians and five hundred Indians, and had no cannon. The garrison had sustained no injury from the fire, but the having one man wounded; they had twenty rounds of cartridges a man, thirty rounds for one field-piece, and five for another, half a barrel of gunpowder, fifteen pounds of musket ball, and provisions sufficient to have lasted them twenty or thirty days. Major Butterfield knew that a reinforcement was on its way, and, moreover, was so near the main body of the army that he could not doubt of being supported by that.

That immediately on the surrender, the garrison was put into the custody of the savages, who plundered them of their baggage and even stripped them of their clothes.

That Major Sherburne having landed on Monday the 20th, at Quinze Chiens, about nine miles from the Cedars, and marched on with his party, consisting then of one hundred men, to within four miles thereof, was there attacked by about five hundred of the enemy; that he maintained his ground about one hour, and then, being constrained to retreat, performed the same in good order, receiving and returning a constant fire for about forty minutes; when the enemy finding means to post advanced parties in such a manner as to intercept their further retreat, they also were made prisoners of war.

That they were immediately put into the custody of the savages, carried to where Major Butterfield and his party were, and stripped of their baggage and wearing apparel. That two of them were put to death that evening; four or five others at different times afterwards—one of whom was of those who surrendered on capitulation at the Cedars, and was killed on the eighth day after that surrender. That one was first shot and, while retaining life and sensation, was roasted, as was related by one of his companions now in possession of the savages, who himself saw the fact; and that several others, being worn down by famine and cruelty, were exposed on an island, naked and perishing with cold and hunger. . . .

That, on Sunday the 26th, the prisoners were carried to Quinze Chiens, when it was discovered that General Arnold was approaching, and making dispositions to attack them.

That Captain Forster, having desired Major Sherburne to attend a flag which he was about to send to General Arnold for confirmation of the Cartel, carried him into the council of the Indians, then sitting, who told him that it was a mercy never before shown in their wars, that they had put to death so few of the prisoners; but that he must expect, and so inform General Arnold, that they should certainly kill every man who should thereafter fall into their hands. That Captain Forster joined in desiring that this bloody message should be delivered to General Arnold, and moreover, that he should be notified that if he rejected cartel and attacked him, every man of the prisoners should be put to instant death.

That General Arnold was extremely averse from entering into any agreement, and was at length induced to do it by no other motive than that of saving the prisoners from cruel and inhuman death, threatened in such terms as left no doubt it was to be perpetrated, and that he did in the end conclude it, after several flags received from Captain Forster, and a relinquishment by him of the unequal article, restraining our soldiers from again bearing arms. . . .

2. GENERAL SULLIVAN FINDS THAT NO ONE THING IS RIGHT

St. Johns, June 1, 1776

I must beg leave to inform Congress that I arrived here last evening with my brigade except Col. Draytons and part of Col. Waines regiment, the former of which was by order of General Schuyler sent to Tryon County. The latter I hear are detained at New York I know not for what length of time. Upon my arrival I was informed that General Thomas was down with the small pox without the least prospect of a recovery. General Worster [Wooster] is here with his baggage, returning to Connecticut, by means of which the command devolves upon me.

I have done every thing I possibly could in the time to get information of the true state of affairs—and can in a word inform you that no one thing is right. Every thing is in the utmost confusion and almost every one frightened at they know not what. The report is that General Carlton has advanced to Three Rivers and the ships are coming up the River St. Lawrence. Other persons who have come from eighty miles below Quebeck declare that there is no appearance of men or ships on this side that city, and for my own part I am fully convinced that the latter report is true. However that may be, I am surprized that an army should live in continual fear of and even retreat before an enemy which no person among them has seen. I think they might at least have ventured some persons in whom they could confide to view them from the neighbouring heighths and give some account of their numbers and movements, but nothing of this kind is done.

I shall set out early tomorrow for Montreal and will proceed till I can find with certainty where the enemy is and what they are about. I find the lower and some of the higher class of French people in our favour and fear much that we are about to leave them. . . .

I am extremely sorry to inform you that from the officers whose business it was to give Congress the true state of matters, Congress has not, as I believe, received any thing like it. This I conclude from the repeated letters sent to Gen. Washington giving the most favourable accounts and promising a speedy reduction of Quebec, when there was not even a probability of it and the army with which this was to be done had dwindled into a mobb without even the form of order or regularity. The consequence of which we have experienced by the infamous retreat from Quebec and the still more scandalous surrender of the post at the Cedars. . . .

I find no proper commissary appointed and the publick stores left to the mercies of searjeants and other persons who are guilty of every kind of fraud. The regiments sent here are torn and divided into numerous parts scattered from one end of the country to another. This method, besides its being highly impolitick, will ever prevent the officers from making proper returns of their men and naturally destroys that subordination which ever ought to be kept up in an army.

3. DR. SENTER DESCRIBES THE ABANDONMENT OF MONTREAL

The first stand we endeavoured to make was at Point de Shambo [Deschambault], 45 miles from Quebec, but not being able to collect provisions sufficient, were obliged to abandon it and proceed up along. The poor inhabitants, seeing we were abandoning their country, were in the utmost dilemma, expecting as many as had been aiding us every way to be sacrificed to the barbarity of those whose severity they had long felt, though under the specious pretence of civil government, which, in fact, had been in essence nothing but an arrogant military one. No provisions could be obtained but by force of arms. No conveniences for ferrying our troops over the rivers emptying in upon either side of the St. Lawrence, except a canoe or two, and these were rare. By reason of the spring flood which in this country is amazing in many low places, the army were obliged to travel a great distance round them, as the river had overflowed its banks in many places to the distance of several miles. In this perplexed situation we however arrived at Sorel, about forty miles below Montreal, where we made a stand and collected our whole force, which was not very formidable, notwithstanding several new recruits had by this time arrived.

The small-pox still very rife in the army—new troops few of them who had had it—I was ordered by Gen. Thomas, who commanded, to repair to Montreal and erect an hospital for their reception, as well by the natural way as inoculation. I accordingly made application to General Arnold, then commanding in the city, and obtained a fine capacious house belonging to the East India Company. It was convenient for nigh six hundred. I generally inoculated a regiment at a class, who had it so favourable as to be able to do garrison duty during the whole time.

About this time an action happened up above Montreal at the Cedars, nine miles from hence, between Major Shereburne and party, and a number of savages, with one company of regular troops. Shereburne and the chief of his party were taken, some few killed, etc.

We were now betwixt the two armies of the foe, under every embarrassment possible, no quantity of ammunition, no provisions but obtained by force of arms. Sorel, a low, unhealthy place at the entrance of the River Chamblee into the St. Lawrence, flat and almost upon a water level. Land the highest some distance back of our fortifications. Works might easily be raised entirely overlooking ours. A number of men about this time detached to attack the advanced guard at the "Three Rivers." These proved unsuccessful, and Gen. Thompson with the chief of the division were killed and captured. Fortune and the country seemed jointly against us. Our principal fortifications [were] not tenable against an equal number if attacked by land. Our prospect was still gloomy. A committee from Congress had been in Montreal for some time with a view of giving the money currency, but it answered no purpose. Gen. Thomas caught the natural small-pox, sickened at Sorel, was carried to Chamblee and died. Soon after this General Sullivan arrived and took the command. Wooster went to Montreal, and Arnold to Chamblee. Enemy drawing upon us from every quarter, assimilating the savages.

Our army, weakened by the small-pox, and in fine every movement against the enemy unsuccessful, a retreat was ordered to St. John's. The troops accordingly evacuated Montreal the 9th of June.

4. DEFEAT AT TROIS RIVIÈRES AND THE FLIGHT FROM CANADA

Memoirs of John Lacey of Pennsylvania, a captain in the Continental Army.

June 8th. Last night Gen. Sullivan received a letter from Gen. Thompson advising him that he proposed to attack the enemy at the Three Rivers by surprise, with his whole body this morning. The river at this place was very wide, called Lake Sent Peters. The army was to cross over in batteaus, land above the Three Rivers and attack the enemy at daylight. Early in the morning we heard firing down the river, which we supposed to be the attack on the enemy according to Gen. Thompson's letter. It was, however, broken and at intervals, not like a general charge. We waited all this day in suspense without a word of intelligence from the army.

On the morning of the 9th we again heard the report of cannon, tho singly, and soon discontinued. About 10 o'clock A.M. the batteaus of the army came in sight. In great anxiety we all hastened to the edge of the river to meet the batteaus, but was sadly mortified to find our army had been defeated; that the batteaus which transported over the army being cut off by the enemy from the troops who lost their way, [the troops] came up by detachment to the enemies batteries, were driven back, [and] finding the enemy in possession of the place where the batteaus were left, took to the woods and swamps. Major Woods, who was left in command of the bat-teaus and baggage, found himself cut off from the American army and discovering two of the enemies frigates under way ordered the batteaus to push up the river. Having proceeded some distance and night coming on, he halted with an expectation to meet with our army on their retreat, where he remained till morning. The ships of war Major Wood discovered under way the day before had entered Lake St. Peters, nearly abreast of the batteaus. Finding himself in this precarious situation he ordered those in the batteaus to proceed directly with them to the mouth of the Sorrell—about 45 miles—with all possible dispatch, thus, abandoning the army to make the best of their way through horrid swamps up the north side of the river.

On the 10th by order of Gen. Sullivan crossed the River St. Lawrence to the north side with a scout of ten rifler men and Lieut. Read, to proceed down the St. Lawrence until we met the retreating army. Proceeded through most horrid swamps, were almost devoured by muskeetoos of a monstrous seize and innumerable numbers; came into a very indifferent and swampy road, not meeting with a single habitation, which we followed until after dark, when we luckily fell in with the leading detachment under Capt. Smith of the 6th Pennsylvania Regiment, with whom we returned, leaving two of our men to direct those in the rear the route to the mouth of the Sorrell. The troops being so scattered, they did not arrive until the latter part or evening of the next day.

On the 12th of June, threw up a breast work of sand in front of our encampment, keeping a lookout for the enemy, who were duly waiting for a fair wind to their heavy vessels up the rapids into Lake St. Peters, the only obstruction in their way here, and even up to Montreall.

On the 15th a flag arrived from Gen. Carlton with letters from Gen. Thompson and Col. Ervine of the 6th Pennsylvania Regiment, who were taken prisoners, advising they were used well by Gen. Carlton. According to report our loss was upward of three hundred missing; as very few were either killed or wounded at the Three Rivers, it was presumed they were generally taken prisoners. It appeared 17 were missing from my company who, according to Lieut. Smiths account, must all be prisoners as the company never came in reach of the enemies muskets, and that the vallient Capt. Moore ran at the first fire of the enemies cannon without returning a shot, being at too great a distance for the fire of muskets to do any execution.

On the night of the 13th a council of war was held at Gen. Sullivans head quarters, at which it was decided that it was advisable for the whole of the American army to evacuate Canada, and to . . . make a stand at Ticonderoga.

On the morning of the fourteenth orders were given to retreat. . . .

About 4 o'clock on the afternoon of the 17th left St. Johns in a batteau for the Isle Aux Noix with Ensigne Varnum and Doctor Mouse, with about 25 soldiers to row the batteau, being very heavy laden with cannon ball and other baggage; did not reach that island until next morning almost wearied to death—the men began to sicken very fast.

On the 19th the remainder of the army came in batteaus and landed on the island. As the rear of the army left Saint Johns the enemies van appeared.

On the 20th the greater part of our batteaus, with two thousand sick and invaleeds, left this island for Crown Point. . . . I chose to remain, still having good health. . . .

5. THE ARMY RETREATS IN DISORDER TO CROWN POINT

Charles Cushing to his brother.

Camp at Crown-Point, June 13, 1776

Dear Friend and Brother: . . . We set off for Sorel with heavy hearts, none of us expecting to come back again, for General Burgoyne and all his troops were come in, our army but small in comparison to his, and if we were defeated, there would be no retreat. We got to Chambly the first day, and the next morning set off for Sorel, and before night met Colonel Greacon about twenty-three miles from the mouth of the river, who came directly from there. He informed us the army were retreating as fast as possible, that the enemy's fleet was just below them, and he ordered us to go on shore and cook some victuals, and then return back to Chambly as fast as possible. After refreshing ourselves a little, we set off about dark, and rowed all night very hard, the current running rapidly. In the morning, about seven o'clock, we got up to Chambly, when, after refreshing ourselves with a little breakfast, we were obliged to assist in getting the batteaus, cannon and other stores above the lower rapids; and then it is as much as twenty men can do to tow a loaded batteau up the river in many places.

After our party had drawn over two batteaus, two pieces of cannon and all their tents and baggage, and put them on board, we set off with three or four boats up the river. In some places the men were obliged to wade up to their middle. At dark, having got about half-way up to St. John's, we pitched our tents and lay down to rest. In the morning we proceeded to St. John's. During this fatigue, the men had but little to eat but pork and flour, and lake water to drink.

The army at Sorel brought off all their artillery and other stores and arrived safe at Chambly; and in eight hours after their departure, the enemy had come up with their fleet and taken possession of Sorel. At Chambly, General Sullivan made all the despatch possible in getting over the artillery, stores and boats, there being a large quantity of them, and not less than a hundred batteaus. We lost one or two pieces of cannon by staving the boats, and one or two more were left. The row galleys were burnt, and I think we left but little else, except four schooners that we burnt in the river.

Our army, consisting of about six thousand men, were now all retreated safely to St. John's, and the enemy at Montreal and Chambly. We then sent the sick and some of the stores to the Isle-aux-Noix, the Isle-au-Motte and Point-au-Fer, not having boats to carry the whole army and stores at once; and as soon as the boats came back, the whole army embarked and went to the Isle-aux-Noix. Here, what boats could be spared were sent to Crown-Point with sick and stores, as a great part of the army were sick, many with the small-pox, and many of those who had had it were sick with the flux. Here we were obliged to wait for boats eight days, where we could get nothing but pork and flour. The island being small, not more than one mile in length and a quarter of a mile in width, the land low, the days hot, and at night great dews, and such a number of men on so small a spot, and many of them sick—the place stunk enough to breed an infection.

At length the boats returned from Crown-Point. We were ordered to strike our tents and put all our baggage on board, and the invalids who were not able to march by land. Those of our regiment who were well, and about a thousand or more, were set over to the west side, to go by land to Point-au-Fer, about twenty-six miles. During our stay at the Isle-aux-Noix, there went a number of officers about a mile below to a house to drink spruce beer; but unfortunately were beset by a party of Indians, who killed and scalped one ensign, one captain and two privates, and took several prisoners. We heard the guns and saw the fire. A party was immediately sent to their assistance; but the enemy were gone and had left the dead stripped all to their shirts. They were brought to the Isle-aux-Noix and decently buried. They all belonged to the rifle regiment. The Indians attacked several boats on the lake that went above after some flour, killed two or three men and wounded six more; the others escaped.

About noon we marched for Point-au-Fer, and soon came where there was only an Indian path and a wet swamp, which was for a great distance almost up to our knees in mud and water. Besides this, it rained very hard all the afternoon. At dark we came out against a bay in the lake, within about six miles of Point-au-Fer. We had now nothing but the ground to lie on and the heavens to cover us; and what with the rain, sweat and mud, we had but little about us that was dry. We soon built fires and dried ourselves as well as we could, and then lay down to rest with our feet to the fire. I slept very well and got up in the morning refreshed. The weather cleared off pleasant; we got some breakfast; and about nine o'clock there came boats enough to take us all off. The remainder of the army came in batteaus from the Isle-aux-Noix, and all arrived at the Isle-au-Motte that night. We soon had boats enough to carry the whole army to Crown-Point, and, I think, nothing remarkable happened till we arrived there.

6. BENEDICT ARNOLD AT ST. JOHNS: "LET US NOT FALL ALL TOGETHER"

Chamble [Chambly], June 13, 1776

I went to St Johns yesterday where I found every thing in the greatest confusion, not one stroke done to fortify the camp, the engineer a perfect sott, at that and this place near three thousand sick. I have given orders that the sick draw only half rations in future. I have ordered Colonel Antell to St Johns, and an abette and lines to be immediately begun to inclose the two old forts and an encampment sufficient to hold six thousand men.

I am fully of opinion not one minute ought to be lost in securing our retreat and saving our heavy cannon and baggage and provisions. The enemy will neaver attack you at Sorell; their force is doubtless much superior to ours, and we have no advice of any reinforcement. Shall we sacrafice the few men we have by endeavoring to keep possession of a small part of the country which can be of little or no service to us? The junction of the Canadians with the Colonies, an object which brought us into this country, is now at an end. Let us quit them and secure our own country before it is too late. There will be more honour in making a safe retreat than hazarding a battle against such superiority which will doubtless be attended with the loss of men, artillery, etc., and the only pass to our country.

These arguments are not urged by fear for my personal safety. I am content to be the last man who quits this country and fall so that my country rise—but let us not fall all together. . . .

V. ARNOLD SAVES THE AMERICAN ARMY: THE BATTLES ON LAKE CHAMPLAIN

With the collapse of the Canadian campaign, the American flank was wide open to counterattack. Had Carleton been ready, and had he moved with characteristic speed, he might have destroyed the American army in the north, and struck down the Hudson to join forces with Howe in New York. But he was taken by surprise; and it took time to bring his forces together, to provide supplies and food for them for a fall campaign. While he was organizing his offensive, the American army, decimated by disease and dissension, was getting restored to health and strength; morale was improved. By August it was 5,000 strong; there was a new commander—Horatio Gates—but then Schuyler wouldn't yield his place. By September Carleton, with a large and well-equipped army, had reached St. Johns. Unable to run the rapids there, he took his boats apart and rebuilt them below the rapids, but all this took time.

Meantime Benedict Arnold had been put in charge of naval operations on Lake Champlain. In a whirlwind of energy and a miracle of resourcefulness, he called in ships' carpenters from the coast, blacksmiths from near-by towns, and recruited sailors and marines who could man boats. He repaired some old batteaux, built a small squadron of gondolas and galleys, and prepared to do battle with Carleton's substitute for the Royal Navy. That battle came on October 11-13. Carleton's superior force swept Arnold's squadron off the lake, but Arnold inflicted heavy damage on it. And what is more to the point his challenge to Carleton required that general to lose over a month in building a navy able to overwhelm the American. That month was decisive. Carleton was not prepared for a winter campaign, and withdrew to Canada, leaving the Americans in possession of Ticonderoga.

Of Arnold's makeshift squadron Captain Mahan writes: "Never had any force, big or small, lived to better purpose, or died more gloriously. . . . That the Americans were strong enough to impose the capitulation of Saratoga was due to the invaluable year of delay secured to them by their little navy on Lake Champlain."

We need introduce only two of our four participants. John Trumbull, a son of Governor Trumbull, had served briefly as aide-de-camp to Washington, and then been assigned as adjutant to General Gates with the rank of Colonel. Shortly after the Lake Champlain campaign he resigned his commission and went to London to paint; to his familiarity with the war and his skill as a painter we owe much of our picture of the war and of its heroes. Lieutenant James Hadden was one of the soldiers who had come over in the reinforcements of May 1776; he commanded a gunboat in the battle of Valcour Island. He was later to have a long and distinguished career in the Peninsular war.

1. CROWN POINT: "I FOUND NOT AN ARMY BUT A MOB"

Ticonderoga, July 12, 1776

Honored Sir: Since I left Albany I have not wrote you nor have I received any of yours. I arrived at this place the fourth day—and from hence went on to Crown Point soon after. At that place I found not an army, but a mob, the shattered remains of twelve or fifteen very fine battalions, ruined by sickness, fatigue and desertions and void of every idea of discipline or subordination. . . .

Last spring . . . the army was upwards of ten thousand strong. . . . We have now three thousand sick and about the same number well. This leaves near five thousand men to be accounted for. Of them the enemy have cost us perhaps one, sickness another thousand, and the others God alone knows in what manner they are disposed of!

Among the few we have remaining, there is neither order, subordination, nor harmony, the officers, as well as men, of one colony insulting and quarreling with those of another. This wretched situation of our troops induced the General Officers, in a Council of War, to determine on a retreat to this place. The post we are to occupy here is very advantageous. It is a height opposite to the old works which commands the entrance of Lakes Champlain and George. 'Tis almost inaccessible except in two places where we propose roads. The rest is surrounded by rocks and precipices. We shall easily be possessed with provisions from Skeensborough, at the head of Lake Champlain, and can easily retire that way into the country. This, without a naval superiority on the lakes, I fear we shall be obliged to do, notwithstanding the strength of our camp, unless we are very soon joined by six or eight thousand men.

How we shall maintain our naval superiority I must confess myself much at a loss. 'Tis true we build a thing called a gondola, perhaps as much as one in a week, but where is our rigging for them, where our guns? We have, to be sure, a great train of artillery, but they are very few of them mounted on carriages, and our materials and conveniences for mounting them are very slender.

We have carpenters, shipbuilders and mechanichs in plenty, but neither places for them to work in nor materials in that plenty we ought to have.

To oppose the enemy on the lake, we have a schooner of twelve carriage guns, a sloop of eight, two small schooners to carry four or six each and three gondolas. . . .

The enemy we find are at St. John's repairing the works at that place and building three schooners and two sloops. They have, no doubt, everything ready to their hands, the rigging made, the guns mounted, and only the wooden work to perform, in which I fear they will have advantage of us. . . .

General Sullivan has set off for New York in disgust at being superseded by General Gates, and General Gates himself is superseded by General Schuyler, on this supposition, that, as the army which he (General Gates) was ordered to command in Canada is now within the limits of New York, the command devolves on him, that is Schuyler. In this manner we now rest. . . .

I must beg you, Sir, to forward the militia as fast as possible; without them we are ruined. They need not fear the small pox, as the sick and infected are removed to Fort George, and they will come up by Skeensborough. Every precaution possible will be continued to prevent a further spread of this fatal disorder. . . .

2. GENERAL ARNOLD DESCRIBES THE BATTLE OF VALCOUR BAY

To General Schuyler.

Schuyler's Island, Oct. 12, 1776

Dear General: Yesterday morning at eight o'clock, the enemy's fleet, consisting of one ship mounting sixteen guns, one snow mounting the same number, one schooner of fourteen guns, two of twelve, two sloops, a bomb-ketch and a large vessel (that did not come up), with fifteen or twenty flat-bottomed boats or gondolas, carrying one twelve or eighteen-pounder in their bows, appeared off Cumberland Head. We immediately prepared to receive them. The galleys and Royal Savage were ordered under way; the rest of our fleet lay at an anchor. At eleven o'clock they ran under the lee of Valcour and began the attack. The schooner, by some bad management, fell to leeward and was first attacked; one of her masts was wounded, and her rigging shot away. The captain thought prudent to run her on the point of Valcour, where all the men were saved. They boarded her, and at night set fire to her. At half-past twelve the engagement became general and very warm. Some of the enemy's ships and all her gondolas beat and rowed up within musket-shot of us. They continued a very hot fire with round and grape-shot until five o'clock, when they thought proper to retire to about six or seven hundred yards distance, and continued the fire until dark. The Congress and Washington have suffered greatly; the latter lost her first lieutenant killed, captain and master wounded. The New-York lost all her officers, except her captain. The Philadelphia was hulled in so many places that she sunk in about one hour after the engagement was over. The whole killed and wounded amounts to about sixty. The enemy landed a large number of Indians on the island and each shore, who kept an incessant fire on us, but did little damage. The enemy had, to appearance, upwards of one thousand in batteaus, prepared for boarding. We suffered much for want of seamen and gunners. I was obliged myself to point most of the guns on board the Congress, which I believe did good execution. The Congress received seven shot between wind and water, was hulled a dozen times, had her mainmast wounded in two places and her yard in one. The Washington was hulled a number of times, her mainmast shot through, and must have a new one. Both vessels are very leaky and want repairing.

On consulting with General Waterbury and Colonel Wigglesworth, it was thought prudent to return to Crown Point, every vessel's ammunition being nearly three-fourths spent. At seven o'clock, Colonel Wigglesworth, in the Trumbull, got under way, the gondolas and small vessels followed, and the Congress and Washington brought up the rear. The enemy did not attempt to molest us. Most of the fleet is this minute come to anchor. The wind is small to the southward. The enemy's fleet is under way to leeward and beating up. As soon as our leaks are stopped, the whole fleet will make the utmost despatch to Crown Point, where I beg you will send ammunition and your further orders for us. On the whole, I think we have had a very fortunate escape and have great reason to return our humble and hearty thanks to Almighty God for preserving and delivering so many of us from our more than savage enemies.

3. THE BRITISH DESTROY ARNOLD'S FLEET AT VALCOUR BAY

Journal of Lieutenant James Hadden of the Royal Artillery.

About the 5th of October [1776] everything being ready, a fleet, consisting of one ship, two schooners, one radeau, one gondolas and 22 gun boats, proceeded from St. Johns up the Sorel River to the entrance of Lake Champlain at the Isle aux Noix, 15 miles from St. Johns. . . .

The 10th October the fleet proceeded to the southern end of Isle au Mot on the eastern side of Lake Champlain, which afterwards widens very considerably, to about 12 or 15 miles in many places. The 11th October the army arrived at Point au Fer under Gen. Burgoyne, and early in the morning the fleet proceeded under Gen. Carleton and Captain Pringle of the Navy.

A large detachment of savages under Major Carlton also moved with the fleet in their canoes, which were very regularly ranged. These canoes are made of the birch bark, and some of them brought 1500 miles down the country, several of which would contain 30 people. The savages paddle them across the lakes and down the rivers with great dexterity, and being very light they are carried across any breaks in the water communication; they land every night, most of which they dance and sing. In wet weather they prop up one side and lay under the canoe.

About 11 o'clock this morning one of the enemies vessels was discovered and immediately pursued into a bay on the eastern shore of the lake, where the rest of their fleet was found at an anchor in the form of a crescent between Valcour Island and the continent. Their fleet consisted of 3 row gallies, 2 schooners, 2 sloops and 8 gondolas, carrying in all 90 guns. That of the British carried only 87 pieces of ordnance, including 8 howitzers. The pursuit of this vessel was without order or regularity; the wind being fair to go down the lake enables us to overtake the vessel before she could (by tacks) get in to the rest of their fleet, but lost to us the opportunity of going in at the upper end of the island and attacking the whole at once. The vessel, which proved to be the Royal Savage taken by them from St. John's last year, carrying 14 guns, was run on shore and most of the men escaped on to Valcour Island, in effecting which they were fired upon by the gun boats. This firing at one object drew us all in a cluster, and four of the enemies vessels getting under weigh to support the Royal Savage fired upon the boats with success. An order was therefore given by the commanding officer for the boats to form across the bay: this was soon effected, tho' under the enemies whole fire and unsupported, all the King's vessels having dropped too far to leeward. This unequal combat was maintained for two hours without any aid, when the Carlton schooner of 14 guns 6 pairs got into the bay and immediately received the enemies whole fire which was continued without intermission for about an hour, when the boats of the fleet towed her off, and left the gun boats to maintain the conflict. This was done till the boats had expended their ammunition, when they were withdrawn. . . .

The boats were now formed between the vessels of the British fleet, just without the enemies shot, being withdrawn a little before sunset and the Royal Savage blown up: this last was an unnecessary measure as she might at a more leisure moment have been got off, or at all events her stores saved, and in her present position no use could be made of her by the enemy, night coming on and a determination to make a general attack early next morning.

The Rebels having no land force, the savages took post on the main and Valcour Island; thus being upon both flanks they were able to annoy them in the working of their guns; this had the effect of now and then obliging the Rebels to turn a gun that way, which danger the savages avoided by getting behind trees.

The boats having received a small supply of ammunition were unaccountably ordered to anchor under cover of a small island without the opening of the bay.

The enemy, finding their force diminished and the rest so severely handled by little more than $\frac{1}{3}$ the British fleet, determined to withdraw towards Crown Point, and passing through our fleet about 10 o'clock at night effected it undiscovered; this the former position of the gun boats would probably have prevented. All the enemies vessels used oars and on this occasion they were muffled. This retreat did great honor to Gen. Arnold, who acted as admiral to the Rebel fleet on this occasion. The wind changing prevented the success of his attempt and, making but little way in the night, they were scarcely out of sight when their retreat was discovered at day break. The British fleet stood after them, and gained ground considerably till the violence of the wind and a great swell obliged both fleets to anchor. Towards evening the weather was more moderate and the fleet proceeded, the boats using their oars to make head against the wind. The Rebel vessels, gaining little way when under sail from the violence of a contrary wind and thinking we were at an anchor, remained so all night, and though the British fleet gained but little by a contrary conduct, that little enabled them to overtake the enemy next day when the wind proved fair. Our ship and schooners being better sailers first came up with the Rebel fleet and retarding their movements till in one of which was Brig. Gen. Waterbury, their second in command. Arnold ran his own vessel and 5 others on shore and set fire to them. The three foremost only escaped to Tyconderoga; as did Gen. Arnold with most of the crew's of the burnt vessels. . . .

4. BURGOYNE MARCHES UP TO TICONDEROGA AND MARCHES BACK AGAIN

Memoirs of John Lacey of Pennsylvania, a captain in the Continental Army in 1776.

On the morning of the 28th of October, word was brought by our scouts and look out boats on the lakes that the enemy were approaching both by land and water. A general alarm was fired, and every one hurried to his post. All was bustle; the whole camp presented a terrific blaze of fire arms issuing from every quarter to prepare for battle, which was momentarily expected to commence. Collem after collem presented their fronts along the lines, with fixed bayonet, whose glissing fire arms reflecting the bright raise of the sun presented a luster from their tablits more radiant than the sun itself. What mind could resist a flash like this! The sounds of the drums to arms, the reports of the alarm cannon, and the crye of the seargents to the men in hurrying them from their tents of "Turn out! Turn out!" would make even a coward brave. These were, however, the times that tryed mens souls, and here only the sunshine and summer soldier srunk [sic] from the expected conflict.

I will throw a vail over some names, who but the evening before bosted over a glass of grog what feats they intended to do on the approach of the enemy, now srunk with sickning apathy within the cover of their tents and markees, never appeared to head their men, leaving that task to their subalterns to perform. On finding at last the enemy had made a halt, and that this movement was only to cover a reconitering from them, they came out as boald soldiers as ever, complaining only of a little sick headache.

On the day after the before mentioned reincounter, Gen. Gates, the Commander in Chief, issued the following General Orders:

Head Quarters Oct. 29th '76.

The General returns his thanks to the Officers and Soldiers of the whole Army for the alert and spirited manner with which they proposed to face the Enemy yesterday. And particularly to the Regiments of Reed, Poor and Greateon, for the dispatch they made in crossing the Lake immediately on their being ordered to Reinforce the French lines and Redoubts.

This order is a proof of the activity and ready willingness of the troops; they were indeed in high spirits, and seme to vie with each other who should first arive at their respective alarm posts. I viewed the men and observed their countenances with pleasure to be animated and not a ray of fear depicted in the face of any of them, and am confident had the enemy made an attack at that time, they would not have dishonoured either themselves or their country. Their view, however, was otherwise, perhaps to trye us, and, to make a view of our camp, situation and strength, no doubt Gen. Burgoin, who commanded at Crown Point, was with his suit on the point of some of the mountains with glasses overlooking our encampment, fortifications and troops, and not very well liking our position and appearance, towards the close of the day the British army retired, not having come nearer to us than what we call Half Way Point, three miles from Ticonderoga, but from which we and they had a fair view of each other. As the enemy approached, our scouts and pickets retired without firing. Within supporting distance of our lines, they halted for their reception.

Nothing worth noticing after this affair took place between the enemy and our army, and on the 13th of November we received information they had evacuated Crown Point and gone over the lake toward St. Johns, giving up the further contest for the present. . . .

Here ended the Northern Campaign for the year 1776.

CHAPTER SEVEN

"A Great Empire and Little Minds"

IT IS A commonplace that in America the Revolution was a Civil War. It is customary to add that in Britain, too, the Revolution was a civil war. The use of the same term for the two countries is, however, confusing and misleading. In the American states the Civil War was an actual war, one which employed the rifle, the bayonet, the torch and the gallows; in Britain it was a war of words and of political maneuvers. The difference in weapons and in tactics was fundamental. In America Loyalists gave aid to the enemy; in Britain the Whigs gave comfort, but no aid, to America. In America the Loyalists delayed Patriot victory; in Britain the friends of America had no perceptible influence on the course of events, and were unable even to mitigate the follies of the King and his ministers.

British politics in the reign of George III is still very much of a battleground for historians. The old Whig picture of a power-mad King seeking to impose his rule on Britain and America alike, has pretty much gone by the board, and so, too, has the naïve interpretation of the King's opponents as single-minded champions of liberty. We know, now, that by his own lights George III was very much a patriot king, and if those lights were dim, it was the dimness of stupidity rather than of wickedness. We know, too, that Burke, Chatham and Shelburne were by no means ready to embrace the American view of the empire, or even of the rights of man, and that Fox, Wilkes and Grafton had another side to them than that which the Americans chose to see.

Yet there was more truth in the Whig view of the Revolution than some modern historians are prepared to concede. The folly of George III in his attitude not only toward his American subjects, but toward such men as Chatham (whom he called "a trumpet of sedition"), approached the criminal. And the devotion of a Camden, a Barré or a Fox to constitutional liberty compared favorably with that of a Jefferson, a William Livingston or an Adams. George III was not trying to establish the divine right of kings, but his policies were designed to destroy the cabinet system which had been created under Walpole, and to sponge out party lines; his methods were those of influence, intimidation and corruption, and his tools were for the most part beneath contempt. Horace Walpole was not a disinterested observer, but there is no reason to quarrel too sharply with his evaluation of the North ministry:

Lord North was a pliant tool, without system or principle; Lord George Germaine of desperate ambition and character; Wedderburn a thorough knave; Lord Sandwich a more profligate knave; Lord Gower a villain capable of any crime; Elliott, Jenkinson, Cornwall, mutes that would have fixed the bowstring round the throat of the constitution. (Last Journals, II, 5)

And for all his earlier cordiality to the American colonies, George III was wholly incapable of understanding their point of view or of presiding over the evolution of a federal empire such as Franklin and Jefferson envisioned. On the other hand Chatham and Burke, Fox and Shelburne, though they were not prepared to concede Parliamentary supremacy, were prepared to waive it, and had caught a glimpse of the possibility of transforming the old empire into a commonwealth of nations.

Opposition to the royal policies followed a curve that was closely related to the fortunes of the war itself. It appeared at once, and powerfully, with the proposal of the Intolerable Acts, mounted to a crescendo during '75 and '76, died down after the Declaration of Independence, reappeared briefly after Saratoga, all but disappeared at the time of the French alliance, and became vocal once more with the military fiascoes of 1781. This is easy to understand. While it was clear to Chatham and Burke that North's policies, if he persisted in them, would disrupt the empire, they were by no means ready to concede the inevitability of those policies. But as the royal program made its inexorable progress through Parliament, the worst forebodings of the opposition were realized, one by one. The Americans were treated as unruly children; they were punished; they were excluded from trade and from the fisheries; they were finally pronounced rebels and ousted from the empire even before they had ousted themselves! By these steps Lord North and his royal master proved that the quarrel was not subject to rational solution.

Yet while each of these steps vindicated the prophecies of the opposition, this vindication merely added to their embarrassment. It was graceful to champion the Americans while they were still, technically, loyal subjects of the King; it was difficult to do so after they had taken up arms against the King; it was desperate to do so after independence, and impossible after the French alliance. War, as always, played into the hands of government, and by winning ever larger Parliamentary majorities George III could feel that he had vindicated the constitution and his own policies even though he had lost the empire in the process.

Had the issue in Parliament been decided by eloquence, there is no doubt who would have won, for the Whigs—if we may use that loose term—had almost a monopoly on eloquence, and on logic as well. Unhappily the Ministry had the votes. Rarely in English history has so good a cause been espoused by so glorious a phalanx of Parliamentary orators: Edmund Burke, the most profound political philosopher of his day; Chatham, splendid even in decline, who had saved the empire once and was prepared to save it again; the brilliant Charles James Fox; the learned and eloquent Camden; Shelburne, farsighted and shrewd; Wilkes, a sort of Parliamentary Tom Paine; the repentant Grafton; the plain but upright Rockingham; General Conway as courageous in debate as on the field of battle—these and a dozen others.

Yet notwithstanding their eloquence and their logic they were never able to influence, much less to control, the course of events. From the vote on the Intolerable Acts until the vote on Dunning's resolution of 1780, through one fatal measure after another, they were overwhelmed by the ministerial majority. Why?

The answer is twofold. First the Parliament chosen in the general election of the fall of 1774 was singularly corrupt, even by the genial standards of the eighteenth century. The King, after all, had almost a million pounds to dispose of in his civil list, and through his lieutenants, Secretary of the Treasury Robinson and Richard Rigby, Paymaster of the Forces (who drew the interest on over a million pounds of public money as his reward), he fought elections, bought seats, bailed out insolvent members, dispensed patronage and pensions, sold military offices, and in countless other ways assured himself a loyal following. He could therefore count on a substantial number of those who bothered to attend Parliament to vote the way they were bought. But at the same time there is no reason to suppose that they would have voted differently had they not been bought. By instinct and conviction as well as by interest the majority of the noble lords, the members from rotten boroughs and the country squires who made up so large a part of Parliament were thoroughly conservative and thoroughly out of sympathy with the American rebels—or with any rebels. Indeed the wonder is that members displayed as much independence as they did, and as much liberalism.

The debate over the American war raged not only in Parliament but in the nation at large. The churches took sides (dissenters tended to sympathize with the Americans) and so did the universities, with Oxford more ostentatiously loyal than Cambridge. Merchants divided, and flooded Parliament with addresses and petitions. There was a veritable war of pamphlets, some spontaneous, some commissioned. Even army and navy officers, in those easy-going days, found it possible to indulge their own private views about the justice of the war, and the highest officers in both services refused to serve in America. If the war did nothing else it stirred the English mind out of its political lethargy, dramatized the issues not only of imperial relations but of Crown and Parliament, re-established the dignity of moral issues, and proved a training ground for political talent.

We can give here only fragmentary illuminations of the English scene. We begin with the early efforts of Chatham and Burke to stave off disaster. Next are provided some samples of the petitions and counterpetitions that rained on King and Parliament, and some samples, too, from the war of pamphlets at the outbreak of the quarrel. When Parliament reconvened in October 1775 the great debate was resumed, and some of the memorable passages from that debate will be found here. The debate was by no means ended in '75 but the issues were, in a sense, decided: merely a few examples of later protests have been appended to indicate that they did continue, and in vain. Finally we relate here something of the unhappy story of the hiring of German mercenaries and the American reaction to that fateful gesture.

I. A GREAT EMPIRE AND LITTLE MINDS GO ILL TOGETHER

Here follow excerpts from four memorable speeches on American affairs on the eve of the conflict with the colonies. The first is from an address—printed but not spoken—by the gifted Jonathan Shipley, Bishop of St. Asaph, in opposition to the Massachusetts Government Act. Not many bishops espoused the American cause, but St. Asaph had early come under the influence of Benjamin Franklin, and made himself the steadfast champion of America. "The cause of liberty and America has been greatly obliged to you," wrote Franklin to him at the end of the war. If his opposition to ministerial policy had no effect on the course of the war, it did help give respectability to the American party. Our second excerpt is from one of the speeches of William Pitt, Earl of Chatham. In January 1775 Chatham emerged from his retirement to rally Parliament against a policy he thought ruinous. On the twentieth of that month he moved to withdraw Gage's troops from Massachusetts, and it was in support of this motion that he delivered this memorable address with oft-quoted tribute to the brilliance and wisdom of the American state papers. The motion was lost 68-18. When ten days later Chatham introduced a plan for peace he rallied more support, but was voted down 61-32.

Our third excerpt is from what is doubtless the most famous speech delivered in Parliament in the course of the American Revolution: Burke's speech On Conciliation with America. Neither Burke nor this speech needs any introduction. It is worth noting that notwithstanding the eloquence, the logic and the wit that have delighted generations of readers, the proposal itself was voted down 271-78.

Finally we include a few paragraphs from the maiden speech of a young peer—he was only 22—who represented Cambridge University: Charles Manners, Marquis of Granby and shortly Duke of Rutland. On March 19 North had moved a bill to restrain the commerce of the Southern colonies as well as that of New England; Granby seized the occasion to declare his sentiments.

1. "BY ENSLAVING YOUR COLONIES YOU EXTINGUISH THE FAIREST HOPES OF MANKIND"

The Bishop of St. Asaph on the Massachusetts Government Act, May 1774.

My Lords, I look upon North America as the only great nursery of freemen now left upon the face of the earth. We have seen the liberties of Poland and Sweden swept away, in the course of one year, by treachery and usurpation. The free towns of Germany are like so many dying sparks that go out one after another, and which must all be soon extinguished under the destructive greatness of their neighbours. Holland is little more than a great trading company, with luxurious manners, and an exhausted revenue. . . . Switzerland alone is free and happy within the narrow enclosure of its rocks and vallies. As for the state of this country, my Lords, I can only refer myself to your own secret thoughts. I am disposed to think and hope the best of Public Liberty. Were I to describe her, according to my own ideas at present, I should say that she has a sickly countenance, but I trust she has a strong constitution.

But whatever may be our future fate, the greatest glory that attends this country, a greater than any other nation ever acquired, is to have formed and nursed up to such a state of happiness those Colonies whom we are now so eager to butcher. We ought to cherish them as the immortal monuments of our public justice and wisdom; as the heirs of our better days, of our old arts and manners, and of our expiring national virtues. What work of art, or power, or public utility, has ever equalled the glory of having peopled a continent without guilt or bloodshed, with a multitude of free and happy commonwealths; to have given them the best arts of life and government, and to have suffered them under the shelter of our authority, to acquire in peace the skill to use them. In comparison of this, the policy of governing by influence, and even the pride of war and victory, are dishonest tricks and poor contemptible pageantry.

We seem not to be sensible of the high and important trust which Providence has committed to our charge. The most precious remains of civil liberty that the world can now boast of are lodged in our hands; and God forbid that we should violate so sacred a deposit. By enslaving your Colonies, you not only ruin the peace, the commerce and the fortunes of both countries, but you extinguish the fairest hopes, shut up the last asylum of mankind. I think, my Lords, without being weakly superstitious, that a good man may hope that heaven will take part against the execution of a plan which seems big not only with mischief but impiety.

—FORCE, American Archives, 4th Series, I, 103-104.

2. CHATHAM: "YOU CANNOT BUT RESPECT THEIR CAUSE"

Debate in the Lords on the motion to withdraw General Gage's troops from Boston, January 20, 1775.

This resistance to your arbitrary system of taxation might have been foreseen: it was obvious from the nature of things and of mankind; and above all from Whiggish spirit flourishing in that country. The spirit which now resists your taxation in America is the same which formerly opposed loans, benevolences and ship-money in England: the same spirit which called all England on its legs, and by the Bill of Rights vindicated the English constitution: the same spirit which established the great fundamental, essential maxim of your liberties—that no subject of England shall be taxed but by his own consent.

This glorious spirit of Whiggism animates three millions in America; who prefer poverty with liberty to gilded chains and sordid affluence; and who will die in defence of their rights as men, as freemen. What shall oppose this spirit, aided by the congenial flame glowing in the breasts of every Whig in England, to the amount, I hope, of double the American numbers? Ireland they have to a man. In that country, joined as it is with the cause of colonies and placed at their head, the distinction I contend for is and must be observed. This country superintends and controuls their trade and navigation; but they tax themselves. And this distinction between external and internal control is sacred and insurmountable; it is involved in the abstract nature of things. Property is private, individual, absolute. Trade is an extended and complicated consideration: it reaches as far as ships can sail or winds can blow: it is a great and various machine. To regulate the numberless movements of its several parts, and combine them into effect for the good of the whole, requires the superintending wisdom and energy of the supreme power in the empire. But this supreme power has no effect towards internal taxation; for it does not exist in that relation; there is no such thing, no such idea in this constitution, as a supreme power operating upon property. Let this distinction then remain for ever ascertained: taxation is theirs, commercial regulation is ours. As an American I would recognize to England her supreme right of regulating commerce and navigation: as an Englishman by birth and principle, I recognize to the Americans their supreme unalienable right in their property; a right which they are justified in the defence of to the last extremity. To maintain this principle is the common cause of the Whigs on the other side of the Atlantic, and on this. " 'Tis liberty to liberty engaged," that they will defend themselves, their families, and their country. In this great cause they are immoveably allied: it is the alliance of God and nature—immutable, eternal—fixed as the firmament of heaven.

To such united force, what force shall be opposed?—What, my lords?—A few regiments in America, and seventeen or eighteen thousand men at home!—The idea is too ridiculous to take up a moment of your lordships' time. Nor can such a national and principled union be resisted by the tricks of office, or ministerial manoeuvre. Laying of papers on your table, or counting numbers on a division, will not avert or postpone the hour of danger: it must arrive, my lords, unless these fatal acts are done away; it must arrive in all its horrors, and then these boastful ministers, spite of all their confidence, and all their manoeuvres, shall be forced to hide their heads. They shall be forced to a disgraceful abandonment of their present measures and principles, which they avow, but cannot defend; measures which they presume to attempt, but cannot hope to effectuate. They cannot, my lords, they cannot stir a step; they have not a move left; they are check-mated.

But it is not repealing this act of parliament, it is not repealing a piece of parchment, that can restore America to our bosom; you must repeal her fears and her resentments; and you may then hope for her love and gratitude. But now, insulted with an armed force, posted at Boston; irritated with an hostile array before her eyes, her concessions, if you could force them, would be suspicious and insecure; they will be irato animo; they will not be the sound honourable passions of freemen, they will be the dictates of fear, and extortions of force. But it is more than evident that you cannot force them, united as they are, to your unworthy terms of submission—it is impossible: and when I hear General Gage censured for inactivity, I must retort with indignation on those whose intemperate measures and improvident councils have betrayed him into his present situation. His situation reminds me, my lords, of the answer of a French general in the civil wars of France—Monsieur Condé opposed to Monsieur Turenne: he was asked how it happened that he did not take his adversary prisoner, as he was often very near him: "J'ai peur qu'il ne me prenne";—I'm afraid he'll take me.

When your lordships look at the papers transmitted us from America; when you consider their decency, firmness and wisdom, you cannot but respect their cause, and wish to make it your own. For myself, I must declare and avow that in all my reading and observation—and it has been my favourite study—I have read Thucydides, and have studied and admired the master-states of the world—that for solidity of reasoning, force of sagacity, and wisdom of conclusion, under such a complication of difficult circumstances, no nation or body of men can stand in preference to the general Congress at Philadelphia.

I trust it is obvious to your lordships that all attempts to impose servitude upon such men, to establish despotism over such a mighty continental nation must be vain, must be fatal. We shall be forced ultimately to retract; let us retract while we can, not when we must. I say we must necessarily undo these violent oppressive acts: they must be repealed—you will repeal them; I pledge myself for it, that you will in the end repeal them; I stake my reputation on it: I will consent to be taken for an idiot if they are not finally repealed. Avoid, then, this humiliating, disgraceful necessity. With a dignity becoming your exalted situation, make the first advances to concord, to peace and happiness: for that is your true dignity, to act with prudence and justice. That you should first concede is obvious, from sound and rational policy. Concession comes with better grace and more salutary effect from superior power; it reconciles superiority of power with the feelings of men; and establishes solid confidence on the foundations of affection and gratitude.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 153-156.

3. BURKE PLEADS FOR CONCILIATION WITH THE COLONIES

Debate in the House, March 22, 1775.

The proposition is peace. Not peace through the medium of war; not peace to be hunted through the labyrinth of intricate and endless negotiations; not peace to arise out of universal discord, fomented from principle, in all parts of the empire; not peace to depend on the juridical determination of perplexing questions, or the precise marking the shadowy boundaries of a complex government. It is simple peace; sought in its natural course, and in its ordinary haunts. It is peace sought in the spirit of peace; and laid in principles purely pacific. I propose, by removing the ground of the difference, and by restoring the former unsuspecting confidence of the colonies in the mother country, to give permanent satisfaction to your people; and (far from a scheme of ruling by discord) to reconcile them to each other in the same act, and by the bond of the very same interest which reconciles them to British government. . . .

I am sensible, Sir, that all which I have asserted in my detail is admitted in the gross; but that quite a different conclusion is drawn from it. America, gentlemen say, is a noble object. It is an object well worth fighting for. Certainly it is, if fighting a people be the best way of gaining them. Gentlemen in this respect will be led to their choice of means by their complexions and their habits. Those who understand the military art will of course have some predilection for it. Those who wield the thunder of the state may have more confidence in the efficacy of arms. But I confess, possibly for want of this knowledge, my opinion is much more in favour of prudent management than of force; considering force not as an odious, but a feeble instrument for preserving a people so numerous, so active, so growing, so spirited as this, in a profitable and subordinate connexion with us.

First, Sir, permit me to observe that the use of force alone is but temporary. It may subdue for a moment; but it does not remove the necessity of subduing again: and a nation is not governed, which is perpetually to be conquered. . . .

Lastly, we have no sort of experience in favour of force as an instrument in the rule of our colonies. Their growth and their utility has been owing to methods altogether different. Our ancient indulgence has been said to be pursued to a fault. It may be so. But we know, if feeling is evidence, that our fault was more tolerable than our attempt to mend it; and our sin far more salutary than our penitence.

These, Sir, are my reasons for not entertaining that high opinion of untried force, by which many gentlemen, for whose sentiments in other particulars I have great respect, seem to be so greatly captivated. But there is still behind a third consideration concerning this object, which serves to determine my opinion on the sort of policy which ought to be pursued in the management of America, even more than its population and its commerce. I mean its temper and character.

In this character of the Americans, a love of freedom is the predominating feature which marks and distinguishes the whole: and as an ardent is always a jealous affection, your colonies become suspicious, restive and untractable whenever they see the least attempt to wrest from them by force, or shuffle from them by chicane, what they think the only advantage worth living for. This fierce spirit of liberty is stronger in the English colonies probably than in any other people of the earth. . . .

Permit me, Sir, to add another circumstance in our colonies, which contributes no mean part towards the growth and effect of this untractable spirit. I mean their education. In no country perhaps in the world is the law so general a study. The profession itself is numerous and powerful; and in most provinces it takes the lead. The greater number of the deputies sent to the congress were lawyers. But all who read, and most do read, endeavor to obtain some smattering in that science. I have been told by an eminent bookseller that in no branch of business, after tracts of popular devotion, were so many books as those on the law exported to the plantations. The colonists have now fallen into the way of printing them for their own use. I hear that they have sold nearly as many of Blackstone's Commentaries in America as in England. General Gage marks out this disposition very particularly in a letter on your table. He states that all the people in his government are lawyers, or smatterers in law; and that in Boston they have been enabled, by successful chicane, wholly to evade many parts of one of your capital penal constitutions. . . .

This study renders men acute, inquisitive, dextrous, prompt in attack, ready in defence, full of resources. In other countries, the people, more simple, and of a less mercurial cast, judge of an ill principle in government only by an actual grievance; here they anticipate the evil, and judge of the pressure of the grievance by the badness of the principle. They augur misgovernment at a distance, and snuff the approach of tyranny in every tainted breeze.

The last cause of this disobedient spirit in the colonies is hardly less powerful than the rest, as it is not merely moral, but laid deep in the natural constitution of things. Three thousand miles of ocean lie between you and them. No contrivance can prevent the effect of this distance in weakening government. Seas roll, and months pass, between the order and the execution; and the want of a speedy explanation of a single point is enough to defeat a whole system. . . .

Then, Sir, from these six capital sources: of descent; of form of government; of religion in the northern provinces; of manners in the southern; of education; of the remoteness of situation from the first mover of government; from all these causes a fierce spirit of liberty has grown up. It has grown with the growth of the people in your colonies, and increased with the increase of their wealth; a spirit that unhappily meeting with an exercise of power in England, which, however lawful, is not reconcilable to any ideas of liberty, much less with theirs, has kindled this flame that is ready to consume us. . . .

Sir, if I were capable of engaging you to an equal attention, I would state, that, as far as I am capable of discerning, there are but three ways of proceeding relative to this stubborn spirit, which prevails in your colonies and disturbs your government. These are—To change that spirit, as inconvenient, by removing the causes. To prosecute it as criminal. Or, to comply with it as necessary. . . .

To impoverish the colonies in general, and in particular to arrest the noble course of their marine enterprises, would be a more easy task. I freely confess it. We have shown a disposition to a system of this kind; a disposition even to continue the restraint after the offence; looking on ourselves as rivals to our colonies, and persuaded that of course we must gain all that they shall lose. Much mischief we may certainly do. The power inadequate to all other things is often more than sufficient for this. I do not look on the direct and immediate power of the colonies to resist our violence as very formidable. In this, however, I may be mistaken. But when I consider that we have colonies for no purpose but to be serviceable to us, it seems to my poor understanding a little preposterous to make them unserviceable, in order to keep them obedient. It is, in truth, nothing more than the old, and as I thought exploded problem of tyranny, which proposes to beggar its subjects into submission. But remember, when you have completed your system of impoverishment, that nature still proceeds in her ordinary course; that discontent will increase with misery; and that there are critical moments in the fortune of all states, when they who are too weak to contribute to your prosperity, may be strong enough to complete your ruin. Spoliatis arma supersunt.

The temper and character which prevail in our colonies are, I am afraid, unalterable by any human art. We cannot, I fear, falsify the pedigree of this fierce people, and persuade them that they are not sprung from a nation in whose veins the blood of freedom circulates. The language in which they would hear you tell them this tale would detect the imposition; your speech would betray you. An Englishman is the unfittest person on earth to argue another Englishman into slavery. . . .

But let us suppose all these moral difficulties got over. The ocean remains. You cannot pump this dry; and as long as it continues in its present bed, so long all the causes which weaken authority by distance will continue. "Ye gods, annihilate but space and time, and make two lovers happy!"—was a pious and passionate prayer;—but just as reasonable as many of the serious wishes of very grave and solemn politicians.

If then, Sir, it seems almost desperate to think of any alternative course for changing the moral causes (and not quite easy to remove the natural) which produce prejudices irreconcilable to the late exercise of our authority; but that the spirit infallibly will continue; and, continuing, will produce such effects as now embarrass us; the second mode under consideration is to prosecute that spirit in its overt acts, as criminal.

At this proposition I must pause a moment. The thing seems a great deal too big for my ideas of jurisprudence. It should seem to my way of conceiving such matters that there is a very wide difference in reason and policy between the mode of proceeding on their regular conduct of scattered individuals, or even of bands of men, who disturb order within the state, and the civil dissensions which may, from time to time, on great questions, agitate the several communities which compose a great empire. It looks to me to be narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to this great public contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people. . . .

In this situation, let us seriously and coolly ponder. What is it we have got by all our menaces, which have been many and ferocious? What advantages have we derived from the penal laws we have passed, and which, for the time, have been severe and numerous? What advances have we made towards our object by the sending of a force, which, by land and sea, is no contemptible strength? Has the disorder abated? Nothing less.—When I see things in this situation, after such confident hopes, bold promises, and active exertions, I cannot, for my life, avoid a suspicion that the plan itself is not correctly right.

If then the removal of the causes of this spirit of American liberty be, for the greater part, or rather entirely, impracticable; if the ideas of criminal process be inapplicable, or if applicable, are in the highest degree inexpedient; what way yet remains? No way is open but the third and last—to comply with the American spirit as necessary; or, if you please, to submit to it as a necessary evil. . . .

The question with me is, not whether you have a right to render your people miserable; but whether it is not your interest to make them happy. It is not what a lawyer tells me I may do; but what humanity, reason and justice tell me I ought to do. Is a politic act the worse for being a generous one? Is no concession proper but that which is made from your want of right to keep what you grant? Or does it lessen the grace or dignity of relaxing in the exercise of an odious claim, because you have your evidence-room full of titles, and your magazines stuffed with arms to enforce them? Of what avail are they, when the reason of the thing tells me that the assertion of my title is the loss of my suit; and that I could do nothing but wound myself by the use of my own weapons? . . .

My idea, therefore, without considering whether we yield as matter of right, or grant as matter of favour, is to admit the people of our colonies into an interest in the constitution; and, by recording that admission in the journals of parliament, to give them as strong an assurance as the nature of the thing will admit, that we mean forever to adhere to that solemn declaration of systematic indulgence. . . .

The question now, on all this accumulated matter, is;—whether you will choose to abide by a profitable experience, or a mischievous theory; whether you choose to build on imagination, or fact; whether you prefer enjoyment, or hope; satisfaction in your subjects, or discontent? . . .

I must be deeply concerned whenever it is my misfortune to continue a difference with the majority of this House. But as the reasons for that difference are my apology for thus troubling you, suffer me to state them in a very few words. . . .

My hold of the colonies is in the close affection which grows from common names, from kindred blood, from similar privileges and equal protection. These are ties, which, though light as air, are as strong as links of iron. Let the colonies always keep the idea of their civil rights associated with your government;—they will cling and grapple with you; and no force under heaven will be of power to tear them from their allegiance. But let it be once understood that your government may be one thing, and their privileges another; that these two things may exist without any mutual relation; the cement is gone; the cohesion is loosened; and everything hastens to decay and dissolution. As long as you have the wisdom to keep the sovereign authority of this country as the sanctuary of liberty, the sacred temple consecrated to our common faith, wherever the chosen race and sons of England worship freedom, they will turn their faces towards you. . . .

Do not entertain so weak an imagination as that your registers and your bonds, your affidavits and your sufferances, your cockets and your clearances, are what form the great securities of your commerce. Do not dream that your letters of office, and your instructions, and your suspending clauses, are the things that hold together the great contexture of the mysterious whole. These things do not make your government. Dead instruments, passive tools as they are, it is the spirit of the English communion that gives all their life and efficacy to them. It is the spirit of the English constitution which, infused through the mighty mass, pervades, feeds, unites, invigorates, vivifies every part of the empire, even down to the minutest member. . . .

All this, I know well enough, will sound wild and chimerical to the profane herd of those vulgar and mechanical politicians who have no place among us; a sort of people who think that nothing exists but what is gross and material; and who therefore, far from being qualified to be directors of the great movement of empire, are not fit to turn a wheel in the machine. But to men truly initiated and rightly taught, these ruling and master principles, which, in the opinion of such men as I have mentioned, have no substantial existence, are in truth everything, and all in all. Magnanimity in politics is not seldom the truest wisdom; and a great empire and little minds go ill together. If we are conscious of our situation and glow with zeal to fill our place as becomes our station and ourselves, we ought to auspicate all our public proceedings on America with the old warning of the church, Sursum corda! We ought to elevate our minds to the greatness of that trust to which the order of Providence has called us. By adverting to the dignity of this high calling, our ancestors have turned a savage wilderness into a glorious empire; and have made the most extensive, and the only honourable conquests, not by destroying but by promoting the wealth, the number, the happiness of the human race. Let us get an American revenue as we have got an American empire. English privileges have made it all that it is; English privileges will make it all it can be.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 478-536 passim.

4. "I DISAVOW THE WHOLE SYSTEM"

The Marquis of Granby [Charles Manners]:

April 5, 1775

. . . As to the bill immediately the object of our consideration [the bill to restrain the trade of the Southern colonies], I think it in every respect so arbitrary, so oppressive, and so totally founded on principles of resentment that I am exceedingly happy at having this public opportunity of bearing my testimony against it, in the strongest manner I am able. In God's name, what language are you now holding out to America! Resign your property, divest yourselves of your privileges and freedom, renounce every thing that can make life comfortable, or we will destroy your commerce, we will involve your country in all the miseries of famine; and if you express the sensations of men at such harsh treatment, we will then declare you in a state of rebellion and put yourselves and your families to fire and sword. . . . You can with no more justice compel the Americans to your obedience, by the operation of the present measures, by making use of their necessities and withholding from them that commerce on which their existence depends, than a ruffian can found an equitable claim to my possessions when he forcibly enters my house and with a dagger at my throat . . . makes me seal deeds which will convey to him my estate and property. . . .

Sir, I shall not trouble this House any longer, as this matter has been so fully discussed, though I must confess that I am not sorry a debate has taken place, because I was rather desirous of making a kind of political creed, some professions of my sentiments on this important, this very serious national question. From the fullest conviction of my soul I disclaim every idea both of policy and right internally to tax America. I disavow the whole system. It is commenced in iniquity, it is pursued with resentment; and it can terminate in nothing but blood. Under whatsoever shape in futurity it may be revived, by whomsoever produced and supported, it shall from me meet the most constant, determined and invariable opposition.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 601-603.

II. THE AMERICAN WAR DIVIDES ENGLISH OPINION

It is sometimes difficult to know whether hostility to the war was inspired more by sympathy with the Americans or hostility to the King and his ministers. The Americans excited sympathy among Englishmen for a variety of reasons—because they were members of the same family; because they were championing the cause of freedom; because, if they stayed happily within the empire, they would strengthen that empire immeasurably. There was in addition a sense that the Americans were fighting the English cause in opposing the wrong-headedness of the King and his ministers; and there was a lively appreciation of the economic value of the colonies and of the cost of war.

Interestingly enough the Americans found friends not only among the opposition politicians, the merchants and the intellectuals, but in the armed services as well. Thus Lord Frederick Cavendish, who had fought bravely in the Seven Years' War and was a lieutenant general at the outbreak of the Revolution, refused to apply for a command, and sat the war out; thus, too, the famous Sir Jeffrey Amherst, commander in chief of the forces, rejected all the overtures of the King offering him active command. And General Henry Conway, scarcely less famous, not only refused to take any part in the war but opposed it at every point. Nor was the situation in the Royal Navy very different. Admiral Keppel confessed that "professional employment was the dearest object of his life [but] he would not accept it in America." When France entered the war he did consent to command the Channel Fleet. It is against this background that we read the letter of the young Earl of Effingham refusing to serve in a cause which he thought pernicious. "When the duties of a soldier and a citizen become inconsistent," he said in the Lords, "I shall always think myself obliged to sink the character of the soldier in that of the citizen." He was thanked for his stand by the Corporations of London and Dublin.

The petitions from merchants and city corporations need little explanation: we include one from the Lord Mayor and Aldermen of London not only because of the importance of the city and the eloquence of the document, but because it may have been written by the only American to serve as Alderman of London, William Lee of the far-flung Lee clan. Actually the Ministry was able to drum up more petitions than the opposition: there is an interesting item in the British budget for 1776 which reads "Commons Addresses, £13,000." The addresses from the two ancient universities did not come within this category, but there is evidence that the Ministry had to bring heavy pressure on the more liberal of the two universities, Cambridge, to wring from them a supporting address.

1. LORD EFFINGHAM REFUSES TO DRAW HIS SWORD AGAINST THE AMERICANS

His resignation of his commission in the Army.

Adelphi Buildings, April 12, 1775

To Lord Barrington, Secretary at War.

My Lord,

I beg the favour of your Lordship to lay before his Majesty the peculiar embarrassment of my present function.

Your Lordship is no stranger to the conduct which I have observed in the unhappy disputes with our American colonies.

The King is too just and too generous not to believe that the votes I have given in Parliament have been given according to the dictates of my conscience. Whether I have erred or not, the course of future events must determine. In the mean time, if I were capable of such duplicity as to be any way concerned in enforcing those measures of which I have so publicly and solemnly expressed my disapprobation, I should ill deserve what I am most ambitious of obtaining, the esteem and favourable opinion of my Sovereign.

My request therefore to your Lordship is this, that after having laid those circumstances before the King, you will assure his Majesty that he has not a subject who is more ready than I am with the utmost cheerfulness to sacrifice his life and fortune in support of the safety, honour, and dignity of his Majesty's crown and person. But the very same principles which have inspired me with these unalterable sentiments of duty and affection to his Majesty, will not suffer me to be instrumental in depriving any part of his people of those liberties which form the best security for their fidelity and obedience to his government. As I cannot, without reproach from my conscience, consent to bear arms against my fellow subjects in America in what, to my weak discernment, is not a clear cause; and as it seems now to be finally resolved that the 22d Regiment is to go upon American service, I desire your Lordship to lay me in the most dutiful manner at his Majesty's feet, and humbly beg that I may be permitted to retire.

Your Lordship will also be so obliging to entreat that as I waive what the custom of the service would entitle me to, the right of selling what I bought, I may be allowed to retain my rank in the Army, that whenever the envy or ambition of foreign powers should require it, I may be enabled to serve his Majesty and my country in that way in which alone I can expect to serve them with any degree of effect.

Your Lordship will easily conceive the regret and mortification I feel at being necessitated to quit the military profession, which has been that of my ancestors for many generations, to which I have been bred almost from my infancy, to which I have devoted the study of my life, and to perfect myself in which I have sought instruction and service in whatever part of the world they were to be found.

I have delayed this to the last moment, lest any wrong construction should be given to a conduct which is influenced only by the purest motives. I complain of nothing; I love my profession and course of life, in which I might be useful to the public, so long as my constitutional principles and my notions of honour permitted me to continue in it.

I have the honour to be, with great respect,

Your Lordship's most obedient,

And most humble servant,

EFFINGHAM

2. THE LORD MAYOR AND ALDERMEN OF LONDON PLEAD THE CAUSE OF AMERICA

June 14, 1775

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty

The humble Address, Remonstrance, and Petition of the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of the City of London, in Common Hall assembled:
Most Gracious Sovereign,

We your Majesty's most faithful subjects, the Lord Mayor, Aldermen, and Livery of the City of London, in Common Hall assembled, are compelled again to disturb your Majesty's repose with our complaints.

We have already expressed to your Majesty our abhorrence of the tyrannical measures pursued against our fellow-subjects in America, as well as of the men who secretly advise, and of the Ministers who execute their measures.

We desire to repeat again, that the power contended for over the Colonies, under the specious name of dignity, is to all intents and purposes, despotism; that the exercise of despotic power in any part of the empire is inconsistent with the character and safety of this country.

As we would not suffer any man, or body of men, to establish arbitrary power over us, we cannot acquiesce in any attempt to force it upon any part of our fellow-subjects; we are persuaded that by the sacred, unalterable rights of human nature, as well as by every principle of the constitution, the Americans ought to enjoy peace, liberty and safety; that whatever power invades these rights ought to be resisted; we hold such resistance, in vindication of their constitutional rights, to be their indispensable duty to God, from whom those rights are derived to themselves, who cannot be safe and happy without them; to their posterity, who have a right to claim this inheritance at their hands unviolated and unimpaired.

We have already remonstrated to your Majesty that these measures were big with all the consequences which could alarm a free and commercial people; a deep and perhaps fatal wound to commerce; the ruin of manufactures;

the diminution of the revenue, and consequent increase of taxes; the alienation of the colonies, and the blood of your Majesty's subjects.

Unhappily, Sire, the worst of these apprehensions is now realized in all its horror: We have seen with equal dread and concern a civil war commenced in America by your Majesty's Commander in Chief: Will your Majesty be pleased to consider what must be the situation of your people here, who have nothing now to expect from America but Gazettes of blood and mutual lists of their slaughtered fellow-subjects.

Every moment's prosecution of this fatal war may loosen irreparably the bonds of that connection on which the glory and safety of the British Empire depend.

If anything could add to the alarm of these events, it is your Majesty's having declared your confidence in the wisdom of men a majority of whom are notoriously bribed to betray their constituents and their country. It is the misfortune of your Majesty, it is the misfortune and grief of your people, to have a Grand Council and a representative under an undue and dangerous influence; an influence, which though procured by your Ministers, is dangerous to your Majesty, by deceiving you, and to your people, by betraying them.

In such a situation, your petitioners are bound to declare to your Majesty, that they cannot and will not sit unconcerned; that they will exert themselves, at every hazard, to bring those who have advised these ruinous measures to the justice of this country, and of the much-injured Colonies.

We have already signified our persuasion that these evils originate in the secret advice of those who are equally enemies of your Majesty's title and to the rights of your people. Your petitioners are now compelled to say that your Throne is surrounded by men avowedly inimical to those principles on which your Majesty possesses the Crown, and this people their liberties: At a time of such difficulty and danger, public confidence is essential to your Majesty's repose, and to the preservation of your people: Such confidence cannot be obtained by Ministers and advisers who want wisdom and hold principles incompatible with freedom; nor can any hope of relief be expected from a Parliament chosen under a national delusion, insidiously raised by misrepresentations touching the true state of America, and artfully embraced by a precipitate dissolution.

Your petitioners therefore again pray and beseech your Majesty to dismiss your present Ministers and advisers from your person and counsels for ever; to dissolve a Parliament who, by various acts of cruelty and injustice, have manifested a spirit of persecution against our brethren in America, and given their sanction to popery and arbitrary power; to put your future confidence in Ministers whose known and unshaken attachment to the constitution, joined to their wisdom and integrity, may enable your Majesty to settle this alarming dispute upon the sure, honourable and lasting foundation of general liberty.

And a motion being made, and question put, to agree to the said Address, Remonstrance and Petition, the same was resolved in the affirmative.

—ALMON, ed., The Remembrancer, I, 76-77.

3. OXFORD AND CAMBRIDGE SUPPORT THE KING

Address of the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Oxford, presented by their Chancellor, Lord North.

October 26, 1775

... We think ourselves obliged, by every principle of conscientious duty to our King, by every motive of love and affection to our country, to declare our utter abhorrence of those base artifices and seditious proceedings by which your Majesty's American subjects have been tempted to violate the laws, to resist the authority, and at length to rebel against the sovereignty of the British legislature.

We have observed with deep concern the pernicious tendency of that profligate licentiousness by which every part of the legislative power has of late been insulted and reviled. . . .

We now deplore the miseries into which our deluded fellow-subjects in America have been by these seducing arts betrayed; plunged, as they are, in all the horrors of a civil war, unnaturally commenced against the State which gave them birth and protection.

The magnanimity and lenity of your Majesty's disposition . . . give us just confidence to hope that when . . . your rebellious subjects shall be reduced under the power they have thus wantonly provoked, the royal mercy will be displayed in the pardon of a people who have forfeited their lives and fortunes to the justice of the State. . . .

—FORCE, American Archives, 4th Series, III, 1187.

Address of the Chancellor, Masters and Scholars of the University of Cambridge, presented to His Majesty.

November, 1775

... We cannot remain silent spectators of the unnatural rebellion into which many of our brethren in your Majesty's American Colonies have been unhappily seduced. We see their delusion with equal indignation and concern; we disclaim the opinions on which they proceed as destructive of the happiest Constitution that hath ever existed in the history of mankind, and subversive of all order and good government; yet we pity their infatuation, and lament the miseries which it is necessarily bringing upon them.

III. DISCONTENT IN BRITAIN

The American cause was not popular among the people generally, but neither was the war itself nor, for that matter, the King. Perhaps the best index of the unpopularity of the war was the inability of the government to raise an army. There were in all probability nearly a million men of fighting age in Britain, in 1776, but the government could neither recruit nor impress enough men to bring the army up to the quota of 55,000, and had to resort to German mercenaries. Recruiting went slowly in England, a bit better in Scotland, and very badly in Ireland. We give here three documents which illuminate this situation: a letter from a gentleman of Cork to an officer in Boston on the difficulties of recruiting; a letter from the famous evangelist John Wesley to the Earl of Dartmouth describing the hatred for the King—a comment which contrasted sharply with Wesley's public avowals; and a report from Pierre Augustin Caron de Beaumarchais—then a French agent in London but better known as the author of The Marriage of Figaro—to his royal master. We include, too, a broadside attack on the Tories.

1. "NEVER DID THE RECRUITING PARTIES MEET SUCH ILL SUCCESS"

Letter to an officer in Boston.

Cork, September 8, 1775

People are much divided in their sentiments about the Americans. Placemen, pensioners, Tories and Jacobites, with some stupid, ignorant mercenary Whigs, are violent against them, but the bulk of the people of England and Ireland are strongly in their interest. . . . How this unnatural combustion will end, the Lord only knows; but one thing I know, that I wish you and my other friends were removed from a service at once so disgraceful and so dangerous. Never did the recruiting parties meet with such ill success in every part of this Kingdom as at present, so invincible is the dislike of all ranks of people to the American service. The inhabitants of Bandon, Youghall, Birr and other towns have entered into a resolution not to suffer any among them to enlist for the purpose of enslaving their American brethren. There have been no less than five parties at once in Charleville, and after stunning the town—God knows how long—with their fifes and drums, they were able to pick up only one recruit, who was under Mr. Robert's influence. Though the principal Romanists in Cork and Limerick have formed associations and offered bounties to such recruits as shall list on this occasion, yet have they very little success; for though the heads of that communion are in the interest of Government, the lower class, who have not sagacity enough to make proper distinctions, are, to a man, attached to the Americans, and say plainly the Irish ought to follow their example. Even Lord Kenmore, who on this occasion took the lead, had his recruiting party severely beat in Tralee, and their drum broke to pieces. . . . Many of the draughts that are come here to fill up the regiments ordered abroad, swear they will never draw a trigger against the Americans, among whom they have all relations; and most of the English and Irish soldiers that left this last April and May expressed so much repugnance to the service they were ordered on that I am fully persuaded, if your army was not shut up in Boston, it must suffer exceedingly by desertion. . . .

2. "THEY DESPISE HIS MAJESTY AND HATE HIM WITH A PERFECT HATRED"

The Reverend John Wesley to the Earl of Dartmouth.

Haverford West, August 23, 1775

A letter which I received . . . yesterday occasions my giving you this trouble. You told him, the administration having been assured from every part of the Kingdom, that trade was as plentiful and flourishing as ever, and the people as well employed and well satisfied.

Sir, I aver from my own personal knowledge, from the testimony of my own eyes and ears, that there cannot be a more notorious falsehood than has been palmed upon them for truth. I aver that in every part of England where I have been (and I have been east, west, north and south within these two years) trade in general is exceedingly decayed, and thousands of people are quite unemployed. Some I know to have perished for want of bread; others, I have seen creeping up and down like walking shadows. I except three or four manufacturing towns, which have suffered less than others.

I aver, 2, that the people in general all over the nation are so far from being well satisfied, that they are far more deeply dissatisfied than they appear to have been even a year or two before the Great Rebellion, and far more dangerously dissatisfied. The bulk of the people in every city, town and village where I've been, do not so much aim at the Ministry, as they usually did in the last century, but at the King himself. He is the object of their anger, contempt and malice. They heartily despise his Majesty and hate him with a perfect hatred. They wish to imbrue their hands in his blood; they are full of the spirit of murder and rebellion, and I am persuaded, should any occasion offer, thousands would be ready to act what they now speak. It is as much as ever I can do, and sometimes more than I can do, to keep this plague from infecting my own friends. And nineteen or twenty to whom I speak in defence of the King seem never to have heard a word spoken for him before. I marvel what wretches they are who abuse the credulity of the Ministry, by these florid accounts. Even where I was last, in the West Riding of Yorkshire, a tenant of Lord Dartmouth was telling me, "Sir, our tradesmen are breaking all around me, so that I know not what the end will be." Even in Leeds I had appointed to dine at a merchant's, but before I came, the bailiffs were in possession of the house. Upon my saying, "I thought Mr.— had been in good circumstances" I was answered, "He was so: but the American war has ruined him."

3. ENGLAND IS ON THE VERGE OF RUIN

Beaumarchais to the King of France.

September 21, 1775

I withdrew from England under the pretext of going to the country, and have come in all haste from London to Paris, in order to confer with Messieurs de Vergennes and Sartines on matters which are too important and too delicate to be intrusted to the fidelity of any courier.

Sire, England is in such a crisis, such a state of disorder within and without, that it would be almost on the point of ruin if her neighbors and rivals were themselves in a state to occupy themselves seriously about her. I will set forth faithfully the position of the English in America; I received the particulars from an inhabitant of Philadelphia, who had lately arrived from the colonies, and had just been present at a conference with the English ministers, who were thrown into the greatest trouble, and struck with terror by his recital. The Americans, determined to suffer everything rather than give way, and full of that enthusiasm for liberty which has so often rendered the little nation of Corsica redoubtable to the Genoese, have thirty-eight thousand effective men, armed and resolute, beneath the walls of Boston; they have reduced the English army to the necessity of dying of hunger in this town, or of seeking for winter quarters elsewhere, which it will do forthwith. About forty thousand men, well armed, and as determined as the former, defend the rest of the country, without these eighty thousand men having taken away a single laborer from the ground, a single workman from the manufactories. All those persons who were engaged in the fisheries, which the English have destroyed, have become soldiers, and feel that they have to avenge the ruin of their families and the liberty of their country; all those persons who took part in maritime commerce, which the English have brought to an end, have joined the fishermen to make war on their common persecutors; all the persons who worked in the harbors have increased the army of furious men, whose actions are all animated by a spirit of vengeance and hatred.

I say, sire, that such a nation must be invincible, above all, when it has at its back as much country as it can possibly require for retreating, even if the English could make themselves masters of all their seaboard, which they are far from having done. All sensible persons, then, are convinced, in England, that the English colonies are lost to the mother country, and that is also my opinion.

The open war which is taking place in America is less fatal to England than the intestine war which must yet break out in London; the bitterness between the parties has been carried to the greatest excess since the proclamation of the King of England which declares the Americans to be rebels. This absurdity, this masterpiece of madness on the part of the government, has renewed the strength of all the men of the opposition, who have united against it. A resolution has been taken to come to an open collision with the court party during the first sittings of the Parliament. It is thought that these sittings will not pass without seven or eight members of the opposition being sent to the Tower of London, and that is just the appointed time for sounding the tocsin. Lord Rochford, who has been my friend for the last fifteen years, in conversing with me, said these words, with a sigh: "I am much afraid, sir, that the winter will not pass without some heads being brought down, either among the king's party or the opposition." On the other side, the Lord-mayor Wilkes, in a moment of joy and liberty, at the end of a splendid dinner, said to me publicly the following words: "The King of England has long done me the honor of hating me. For my part, I have always rendered him the justice of despising him. The time has come for deciding which of us has formed the best opinion of the other, and on which side the wind will cause heads to fall."

Lord North, who is threatened with all this, would willingly give in his resignation if he could do so with honor and safety.

IV. THE WAR OF PAMPHLETS

The American Revolution set off a literary war that enlisted some of the most skillful and fluent pens in England: the pamphlets interest us today more for their indication of literary sentiment than for their logic or their style. Dr. Johnson had long entertained most malign sentiments about the Americans, and his attack on the Americans, Taxation No Tyranny, represented his genuine sentiments rather than a payment of indebtedness to a government which gave him a pension of £300 a year; it is perhaps relevant, however, that in his Dictionary he had defined a pension as "generally understood to mean pay given to a state hireling for treason to his country." Johnson's pamphlet was more widely circulated in John Wesley's popular version: "A Calm Address to our American Colonies." Boswell's friendliness to the Americans is as familiar as Johnson's hostility; we give here a few samples from the ever-famous biography. Catherine Macaulay, whose "Address" we quote here, was in her day one of the most famous of English literary figures. Author of an eight-volume History of England, and of dozens of smaller books and pamphlets, friend to Hume, Franklin, Turgot and others, she managed to incur at once the contempt of Dr. Johnson and John Wilkes, and was perhaps better known in her own day for her marriage—at the age of almost fifty—to a beardless youth of twenty-one. Mrs. Macaulay had many American friends, and after the war made a triumphal visit to America. Dr. Richard Price, the last of our pamphleteers, was a far more substantial figure than Mrs. Macaulay. A nonconformist clergyman, intimate of Franklin, Turgot and Sheldrake, he wrote widely on questions of religion, morals, finance and politics. His "Observations" won him the freedom of the city of London, and his friendship to America an LL.D. from Yale University.

1. DOCTOR JOHNSON HAS NO PATIENCE WITH AMERICAN ARGUMENTS

They have tried to infect the people of England with the contagion of disloyalty. Their credit is happily not such as gives them influence proportionate to their malice. When they talk of their pretended immunities guaranteed by the plighted faith of Government, and the most solemn compacts with English Sovereigns, we think ourselves at liberty to inquire when the faith was plighted and the compact made; and when we can only find that King James and King Charles the First promised the settlers in Massachusetts Bay, now famous by the appellation of Bostonians, exemption from taxes for seven years, we infer with Mr. Mauduit that by this solemn compact they were, after the expiration of the stipulated term, liable to taxation.

When they apply to our compassion by telling us that they are to be carried from their own country to be tried for certain offences, we are not so ready to pity them as to advise them not to offend. While they are innocent they are safe.

When they tell of laws made expressly for their punishment, we answer that tumults and seditions were always punishable, and that the new law prescribes only the mode of execution.

When it is said that the whole town of Boston is distressed for a misdemeanor of a few, we wonder at their shamelessness; for we know that the town of Boston, and all the associated provinces, are now in rebellion to defend or justify the criminals.

If frauds in the imposts of Boston are tried by commission without a jury, they are tried here in the same mode; and why should the Bostonians expect from us more tenderness for them than for ourselves?

If they are condemned unheard, it is because there is no need of a trial. The crime is manifest and notorious. All trial is the investigation of something doubtful. An Italian philosopher observes that no man desires to hear what he has already seen.

If their assemblies have been suddenly dissolved, what was the reason? Their deliberations were indecent, and their intentions seditious. The power of dissolution is granted and reserved for such times of turbulence. Their best friends have been lately soliciting the King to dissolve his Parliament, to do what they so loudly complain of suffering.

That the same vengeance involves the innocent and guilty is an evil to be lamented, but human caution cannot prevent it, nor human power always redress it. To bring misery on those who have not deserved it is part of the aggregated guilt of rebellion. . . .

To what is urged of new powers granted to the Courts of Admiralty, or the extension of authority conferred on the judges, it may be answered in a few words that they have themselves made such regulations necessary; that they are established for the prevention of greater evils; at the same time, it must be observed that these powers have not been extended since the rebellion in America. . . .

When subordinate communities oppose the decrees of the general legislature with defiance thus audacious, and malignity thus acrimonious, nothing remains but to conquer or to yield; to allow their claim of independence, or to reduce them by force to submission and allegiance. . . .

On the original contrivers of mischief let an insulted nation pour out its vengeance. With whatever design they have inflamed this pernicious contest, they are themselves equally detestable. If they wish success to the Colonies, they are traitors to this country; if they wish defeat, they are traitors at once to America and England. To them and them only must be imputed the interruption of commerce, and the miseries of war, the sorrow of these that shall be ruined, and the blood of those that shall fall.

—JOHNSON, Taxation No Tyranny, pp. 55-87 passim.

2. BOSWELL AND JOHNSON DIFFER ON THE AMERICAN WAR

March 21, 1775

The doubts which, in my correspondence with him [Samuel Johnson], I had ventured to state as to the justice and wisdom of the conduct of Great Britain towards the American colonies, while I at the same time requested that he would enable me to inform myself upon that momentous subject, he had altogether disregarded; and had recently published a pamphlet, entitled

"Taxation no Tyranny; an Answer to the Resolutions and Address of the American Congress."

He had long before indulged most unfavourable sentiments of our fellow-subjects in America. For, as early as 1769, I was told by Dr. John Campbell that he had said of them, "Sir, they are a race of convicts, and ought to be thankful for anything we allow them short of hanging."

Of this performance I avoided to talk with him; for I had now formed a clear and settled opinion that the people of America were well warranted to resist a claim that their fellow-subjects in the mother-country should have the entire command of their fortunes, by taxing them without their own consent; and the extreme violence which it breathed appeared to me so unsuitable to the mildness of a Christian philosopher, and so directly opposite to the principles of peace which he had so beautifully recommended in his pamphlet respecting Falkland's Islands, that I was sorry to see him appear in so unfavourable a light. Besides, I could not perceive in it that ability of argument, or that felicity of expression, for which he was, upon other occasions, so eminent. Positive assertion, sarcastical severity, and extravagant ridicule, which he himself reprobated as a test of truth, were united in this rhapsody. . . .

. . . I unluckily entered upon the controversy concerning the right of Great Britain to tax America, and attempted to argue in favour of our fellow-subjects on the other side of the Atlantick. I insisted that America might be very well governed, and made to yield sufficient revenue by the means of influence, as exemplified in Ireland, while the people might be pleased with the imagination of their participating of the British constitution, by having a body of representatives, without whose consent money could not be exacted from them. Johnson could not bear my thus opposing his avowed opinion, which he had exerted himself with an extreme degree of heat to enforce; and the violent agitation into which he was thrown, while answering, or rather reprimanding me, alarmed me so that I heartily repented of my having unthinkingly introduced the subject. I myself, however, grew warm, and the change was great from the calm state of philosophical discussion in which we had a little before been pleasingly employed.

I talked of the corruption of the British Parliament, in which I alledged that any question, however unreasonable or unjust, might be carried by a venal majority; and I spoke with high admiration of the Roman Senate; and he maintained that the British Parliament was not corrupt, and that there was no occasion to corrupt its members, asserting that there was hardly ever any question in which a man might not very well vote either upon one side or the other. He said there had been none in his time except that respecting America.

Sir Philip [Jennings Clerk] defended the Opposition to the American war ably and with temper, and I joined him. He said the majority of the nation was against the ministry. JOHNSON: "I, Sir, am against the ministry; but it is for having too little of that, of which Opposition thinks they have too much.

Were I minister, if any man wagged his finger against me, he should be turned out; for that which it is in the power of government to give at pleasure to one or to another should be given to the supporters of government. If you will not oppose at the expence of losing your place, your opposition will not be honest, you will feel no serious grievance; and the present opposition is only a contest to get what others have. Sir Robert Walpole acted as I would do. As to the American war, the sense of the nation is with the ministry. The majority of those who can understand is with it; the majority of those who can only bear is against it; and as those who can only hear are more numerous than those who can understand, and Opposition is always loudest, a majority of the rabble will be for Opposition."

This boisterous vivacity entertained us; but the truth in my opinion was that those who could understand the best were against the American war, as almost every man now is, when the question has been coolly considered.

—BOSWELL, Life of Johnson, pp. 237, 353, 455.

3. MRS. MACAULAY PROPHESES THE RUIN OF BRITAIN

An "Address to the People of England, Scotland and Ireland on the Present Important Crisis of Affairs," by Catherine Macaulay, 1775.

It is not impossible, my fellow citizens, that after having tamely suffered the government, by a yearly increase of taxes, to beggar yourselves and your posterity, you may be led away with the wicked but delusive hope that the Ministry, when they have the power to pick the pockets of your American brethren, will have the moderation to save those of their countrymen.

If these are your thoughts, my fellow citizens, little have you studied your own natures, and the experience of all ages, which must have convinced you that the want of power is the only limitation to the exertion of human selfishness; but should you be contented to bid defiance to the warnings of common policy, should you be contented to be slaves in the hope that the Americans will bear the greater part of the burden of your enormous taxes, be assured that such an alternative will never be in your power. No. If a civil war commences between Great Britain and her Colonies, either the Mother Country, by one great exertion, may ruin both herself and America, or the Americans, by a lingering contest, will gain an independency; and in this case, all those advantages which you for some time have enjoyed by your Colonies, and advantages which have hitherto preserved you from a national bankruptcy, must for ever have an end; and whilst a new, a flourishing, and an extensive empire of freemen is established on the other side the Atlantic, you, with the loss of all those blessings you have received by the unrivalled state of your commerce, will be left to the bare possession of your foggy islands, and this under the sway of a domestic despot, or you will become the provinces of some powerful European state.

If a long succession of abused prosperity should, my friends and fellow citizens, have entirely deprived you of that virtue, the renown of which makes you even at this day respectable among all the nations of the civilized world; if neither the principles of justice or generosity have any weight with you, let me conjure you to take into consideration the interests of your safety and preservation. Suffer me again to remind you of the imminent danger of your situation: Your Ministers, by attacking the rights of all America, have effected that which the malicious policy of more judicious minds would have avoided. Your colonists, convinced that their safety depends on their harmony, are now united in one strong bond of union; nor will it be in the power of a Machiavel to take any advantage of those feuds and jealousies which formerly subsisted among them, and which exposed their liberties to more real danger than all the fleets and armies we are able to send against them. Your Ministers also, deceived by present appearances, vainly imagine, because our rivals in Europe are encouraging us to engage beyond the possibility of a retreat, that they will reject the opportunity when it offers of putting a final end to the greatness and the glory of our empire; but if, by the imprudent measures of the government the public expences increase, or the public income decrease to such a degree that the public revenue fail, and you be rendered unable to pay the interest of your debt, then will no longer be delayed the day and the hour of your destruction; then will you become an easy prey to the courts of France and Spain, who, you may depend upon it, will fall upon you as soon as they see you fairly engaged in a war with your Colonists; and, according to what is foretold you in a late publication, that conjecture will prove the latest and the uttermost of your prosperity, your peace, and in all probability of your existence as an independent state and nation.

Rouse, my countrymen! rouse from that state of guilty dissipation in which you have too long remained, and, in which, if you longer continue, you are lost for ever. Rouse! and unite in one general effort till, by your unanimous and repeated Addresses to the Throne, and to both Houses of Parliament, you draw the attention of every part of the government to their own interests, and to the dangerous state of the British empire.

—MACAULAY, "Address," Magazine of History,
Extra No. 114, XXIX, No. 2, 16-18.

There are the following reasons which seem to make it too probable that the present conflict with America is a contest for power only, abstracted from all the advantages connected with it.

There is a love of power for its own sake inherent in human nature; and it cannot be uncharitable to suppose that the nation in general, and the cabinet in particular, are too likely to be influenced by it. What can be more flattering than to look across the Atlantic and to see in the boundless continent of America increasing MILLIONS whom we have a right to order as we please, who hold their property at our disposal, and who have no other law than our will. With what complacency have we been used to talk of them as our subjects? Is it not the interruption they now give to this pleasure, is it not the opposition they make to our pride, and not any injury they have done us, that is the secret spring of our present animosity against them?

I wish all in this kingdom would examine themselves carefully on this point. Perhaps they might find that they have not known what spirit they are of. Perhaps they would become sensible that it was a spirit of domination, more than a regard to the true interest of this country, that lately led so many of them, with such savage folly, to address the throne for the slaughter of their brethren in America, if they will not submit to them; and make offers of their lives and fortunes for that purpose. Indeed, I am persuaded that, were pride and the lust of dominion exterminated from every heart among us, and the humility of Christians infused in their room, this quarrel would be soon ended.

2dly. Another reason for believing that this is a contest for power only is that our ministers have frequently declared that their object is not to draw a revenue from America; and that many of those who are warmest for continuing it, represent the American trade as of no great consequence.

But what deserves particular consideration here is that this is a contest from which no advantage can possibly be derived. Not a revenue: for the provinces of America, when desolated, will afford no revenue; or if they should, the expence of subduing them and keeping them in subjection will much exceed that revenue. Not any of the advantages of trade: for it is a folly, next to insanity, to think trade can be promoted by impoverishing our customers, and fixing in their minds an everlasting abhorrence of us. It remains, therefore, that this war can have no other object than the extension of power. Miserable reflection! To sheath our swords in the bowels of our brethren, and spread misery and ruin among a happy people, for no other end than to oblige them to acknowledge our supremacy. How horrid! This is the cursed ambition that led a Caesar and an Alexander, and many other mad conquerors, to attack peaceful communities and to lay waste the earth.

But a worse principle than even this influences some among us. Pride and the love of dominion are principles hateful enough; but blind resentment and the desire of revenge are infernal principles; and these, I am afraid, have no small share at present in guiding our public conduct. One cannot help indeed being astonished at the virulence with which some speak on the present occasion against the Colonies. For what have they done? Have they crossed the ocean and invaded us? Have they attempted to take from us the fruits of our labour, and to overturn that form of government which we hold so sacred? This cannot be pretended. On the contrary. This is what we have done to them. We have transported ourselves to their peaceful retreats, and employed our fleets and armies to stop up their ports, to destroy their commerce, to seize their effects and to burn their towns. Would we but let them alone, and suffer them to enjoy in security their property and governments, instead of disturbing us, they would thank and bless us. And yet it is WE who imagine ourselves ill-used.

The truth is, we expected to find them a cowardly rabble who would lie quietly at our feet, and they have disappointed us. They have risen in their own defence and repelled force by force. They deny the plenitude of our power over them and insist on being treated as free communities. It is THIS that has provoked us; and kindled our governors into rage.

—PRICE, Observations on the Nature of Civil Liberty, pp. 31-33.

V. THE GREAT DEBATE OF OCTOBER 1775

On October 26, 1775, the King opened the second session of the Fourteenth Parliament with a speech from the throne that was as implacable as it was unenlightened. In both Houses supporters of the government moved the customary address of thanks; these motions set off one of the most heated debates in modern Parliamentary history—debates which fill several hundred pages of the Parliamentary History. Most of the speakers here are familiar enough, and need no introduction. Rockingham, Grafton and Shelburne were, of course, among the most distinguished of noble lords who championed the American cause. Thirty-three lords voted against the address of thanks, but only 19 signed the notable protest entered on the Journal. Of the debaters in the House only "Governor" Johnstone and Serjeant Adair may be unfamiliar. Johnstone had been Governor of Florida; trading on his American connections, he was later made a member of the Carlisle Commission but destroyed his usefulness by trying to bribe members of the Congress; on his return he switched over to the government side and was duly rewarded with command of a naval squadron. Serjeant Adair, a graduate of Peterhouse, Cambridge, was a follower of Wilkes and recorder of the City of London. It is appropriate to recall that Wedderburn was the man who as solicitor general poured billingsgate upon Franklin in 1774 when the latter was called before a committee of the Privy Council which investigated the release of letters written by Thomas Hutchinson criticizing affairs in Massachusetts; he was later elevated to the position of Lord Chancellor.

1. GEORGE III: THE SPIRIT OF THE BRITISH NATION IS TOO HIGH TO GIVE UP THE AMERICAN COLONIES

The King's Speech on Opening the Session of Parliament, October 26, 1775.
My Lords and Gentlemen:

... Those who have long too successfully laboured to inflame my people in America by gross misrepresentations, and to infuse into their minds a system of opinions repugnant to the true constitution of the colonies, and to their subordinate relation to Great Britain, now openly avow their revolt, hostility, and rebellion. They have raised troops, and are collecting a naval force; they have seized the public revenue, and assumed to themselves legislative, executive, and judicial powers, which they already exercise in the most arbitrary manner over the persons and properties of their fellow subjects. And although many of these unhappy people still retain their loyalty, and may be too wise not to see the fatal consequence of this usurpation, and wish to resist it, yet the torrent of violence has been strong enough to compel their acquiescence till a sufficient force shall appear to support them.

The authors and promoters of this desperate conspiracy have, in the conduct of it, derived great advantage from the difference of our intention and theirs. They meant only to amuse, by vague expressions of attachment to the parent state, and the strongest protestations of loyalty to me, whilst they were preparing for a general revolt. On our part, though it was declared in your last session that a rebellion existed within the province of the Massachusetts Bay, yet even that province we wished rather to reclaim than to subdue. The resolutions of parliament breathed a spirit of moderation and forbearance; conciliatory propositions accompanied the measures taken to enforce authority, and the coercive acts were adapted to cases of criminal combinations amongst subjects not then in arms. I have acted with the same temper, anxious to prevent, if it had been possible, the effusion of the blood of my subjects, and the calamities which are inseparable from a state of war; still hoping that my people in America would have discerned the traitorous views of their leaders, and have been convinced that to be a subject of Great Britain, with all its consequences, is to be the freest member of any civil society in the known world.

The rebellious war now levied is become more general, and is manifestly carried on for the purpose of establishing an independent empire. I need not dwell upon the fatal effects of the success of such a plan. The object is too important, the spirit of the British nation too high, the resources with which God hath blessed her too numerous, to give up so many colonies which she has planted with great industry, nursed with great tenderness, encouraged with many commercial advantages, and protected and defended at much expence of blood and treasure.

It is now become the part of wisdom and (in its effects) of clemency to put a speedy end to these disorders by the most decisive exertions. For this purpose I have increased my naval establishment and greatly augmented my land forces; but in such a manner as may be the least burthensome to my kingdom.

I have also the satisfaction to inform you that I have received the most friendly offers of foreign assistance; and if I shall make any treaties in consequence thereof, they shall be laid before you. . . .

When the unhappy and deluded multitude, against whom this force will be directed, shall become sensible of their error, I shall be ready to receive the misled with tenderness and mercy. . . .

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 695-697.

2. THE DEBATE IN THE LORDS

A. TWO NOBLE LORDS SUPPORT HIS MAJESTY

October 26, 1775

Viscount Dudley: . . . Having asserted the sovereign authority of the British legislature over every part of the British dominions, his Lordship contended that the present rebellion in America was fomented and supported by a desperate faction in this country; that none but the men of the worst dispositions and most pernicious designs would encourage the claims of America; and that, as they had been wrong in almost everything else, he was glad to find that they had been mistaken in their predictions relative to the distresses which the dispute with America would bring upon this nation. He had the pleasure of acquainting their lordships that he lived in the midst of a manufacturing country, in the neighbourhood of Birmingham, Wolverhampton, etc., and he could affirm, from the most authentick information collected upon the spot, that none of the direful effects, so often echoed through that House, and which it had been said would flow from the measures pursued by administration and supported by Parliament, had been yet, nor were likely to be felt.

Earl Grosvenor: said he was not used to speaking. Politicks were not in his way; but he thought the King's speech was a good speech, and as such ought to be answered in the terms moved by the noble Lord.

B. THE MARQUIS OF ROCKINGHAM: "THE DREADFUL CALAMITY OF SHEDDING BRITISH BLOOD"

October 26, 1775

The Marquis of Rockingham, after enumerating the conduct of the several administrations for some years past respecting America, condemned the speech, which he called the speech of the minister, in very pointed terms; and contended that the measures recommended from the throne were big with the most portentous and ruinous consequences. His lordship moved an amendment, by inserting after the word "throne" in the first paragraph, these words:

"That we behold with the utmost concern the disorders and discontents in the British colonies rather increased than diminished by the means which have been used to suppress and allay them; a circumstance alone sufficient to give this House just reason to fear, that those means were not originally well considered, or properly adapted to answer the ends to which they were directed. . . .

"Deeply impressed with a sense of this melancholy state of the public concerns, we shall, on the fullest information we can obtain, and with the most mature deliberation we can employ, review the whole of the late proceedings, that we may be enabled to discover, as we shall be most willing to apply, the most effectual means for restoring order to the distracted affairs of the British empire, confidence to his Majesty's government, obedience, by a prudent and temperate use of its powers, to the authority of parliament, and satisfaction and happiness to all his people.

"By these means, we trust, we shall avoid any occasion for having recourse to the alarming and dangerous expedient of calling in foreign forces to the support of his Majesty's authority within his own dominions, and the still more dreadful calamity of shedding British blood by British hands."

C. THE DUKE OF GRAFTON: "REPEAL EVERY ACT SINCE 1763 RELATIVE TO AMERICA!"

October 26, 1775

The Duke of Grafton: . . . His general sentiments respecting America were well known; he should not therefore take up their Lordships' time in explaining them. It was true, he had supported Administration, but it was upon a general idea that means of conciliation might be devised and adopted. He expressed his ignorance of the true state of America, and asserted that he had been misled and deceived; for that reason chiefly he could not think of concurring any longer in measures of which he never really approved, but to which he lent his countenance, in expectation that, the stronger Government was, the more likely matters were to be amicably adjusted. He had a proposition which, with their Lordships' leave, he would submit to the House. He knew it could not originate with their Lordships, as it must come through the other House, because it would affect the revenue. Perhaps, said his Grace, it will not gain your approbation entirely this night; but, believe me, you will like it better to-morrow, and still better in three days hence. It will daily grow in your esteem. In a fortnight, I promise you, it will have more friends, until at length it will gain universal assent and approbation. The proposition is only this: to bring in a bill for repealing every act (I think there are thirteen) which has been passed in this country since the year 1763 relative to America. This, I will venture to assert, will answer every end; and nothing less will accomplish any effectual purpose, without scenes of ruin and destruction which I cannot think on without the utmost grief and horror. . . .

D. THE EARL OF SHELBURNE PROPHESES RUIN

. . . It is with equal astonishment and concern, my Lords, that I perceive not the least mention made in the speech which has been this day delivered to us, of a paper the most important of any that could possibly come under the consideration of this House: I mean the last petition from the General Congress in America. How comes it that the Colonies are charged with planning independency, in the face of their explicit declaration to the contrary, contained in that petition? Who is it that presumes to put an assertion (what shall I call it, my Lords?) contrary to fact, contrary to evidence, notorious to the whole world, in that mouth from which truth alone, if unprompted, would issue? Is it their intention, by thus perpetually sounding independence in the ears of the Americans, to lead them to it, or, by treating them, upon suspicion, with every possible violence, to compel them into that which must be our ruin? For let visionary writers say what they will, it is a plain and incontestable fact that the commerce of America is the vital stream of this great empire.

A noble and reverend Lord has insinuated the petition seems to him to be conceived in terms of great art and ambiguity. I have examined it with great care; but this morning I read it repeatedly, and, to my apprehension, except a certain degree of address necessary to meet the prejudices which have been wickedly and industriously excited here, there cannot be a fairer opportunity of extricating this country from the ruinous situation in which the folly of Administration has involved us. It furnishes the fairest foundation for an honourable and advantageous accommodation. I have been long and intimately known to some gentlemen of that country, one of whom now takes a considerable share in their proceedings; and I have ever found them and their correspondents constant and earnest in the wish for conciliation, upon the terms of ancient connection. . . .

But is it possible that your Lordships should not have marked, and marked with indignation, the levity, and even ridicule, with which the noble Lord at the head of the Admiralty [The Earl of Sandwich] has treated this most solemn subject? No man who did not feel himself secure in the promise of impunity from some quarter would proclaim his mistakes in triumph and sport with the calamities of his country. It is astonishing that any one should have dared to promise impunity to such fatal errors, and a conduct so criminal: it is your Lordships' business to look to this. Should such men not only be at large unaccused, but highly trusted, adding fresh insults, misleading by fresh misinformation, and manifesting a total contempt of the publick, both here and in America? The noble Lord laughs at all propositions of conciliation; repeats his imputation of cowardice against the Americans; says the idea of rights is to be driven out of their heads by blows; and ridicules the objections to employing foreigners and papists. Is this a language, my Lords, becoming so great an officer of state? Is it decent thus to stigmatise so great a part of the empire with so base a calumny? It is impossible that noble Lord can have less intolercancy in his disposition than I have; but it does not therefore follow that I should think it a measure of no moment, or of inconsiderable danger, to arm the hands of those who are strangers to toleration, and who pant for the extirpation of the Protestant religion. By what authority is it, that the Crown has put the string of fortresses of this empire into the possession of foreign troops? I do not inquire whether it is with or against the letter of any particular law. I see it fundamentally infringing the first principles of our Government; and do not hesitate to pronounce it high treason against the Constitution. I foretell it is a measure which the indignation of the country will pursue till it is utterly condemned. . . .

My Lords, the Ministers lament that it is their task, in this American business, to support the measure of another Administration. This is some acknowledgment, at least, that the measure was wrong. Why, then, did they support it? What secret influence has compelled them to heap errors on errors, grievance upon grievance till they have shaken the Constitution to its foundation, and brought the whole empire into danger and confusion? The Americans judge from facts. They have seen a uniform lurking spirit of despotism pervade every Administration. It has prevailed over the wisest and most constitutional counsels; it has precipitated us into the most pernicious of all wars—a war with our brothers, our friends, and our fellow-subjects. It was this lurking spirit of despotism that produced the Stamp Act in 1765; that fettered the repeal of that act in 1766; that revived the principles of it in 1767; that has accumulated oppression upon oppression since, till at length it has openly established, by the Quebec Bill, Popery and arbitrary power over half America.

E. PROTEST OF THE DISSENTING LORDS

October 26, 1775

The following Protest was entered:

Dissentient,

1st. Because we cannot, as Englishmen, as Christians, or as men of common humanity, consent to the prosecution of a cruel civil war, so little supported by justice, and so very fatal in its necessary consequences, as that which is now waging against our brethren and fellow-subjects in America. We have beheld, with sorrow and indignation, session after session, and notwithstanding repeated warnings of the danger, attempts made to deprive some millions of British subjects of their trade, their laws, their constitution, their mutual intercourse, and of the very food which God has given them for their subsistence. We have beheld endeavours used to enforce these impolitick severities at the point of the bayonet. . . . When we consider these things, we cannot look upon our fellow-subjects in America in any other light than that of freemen driven to resistance by acts of oppression and violence.

2dly. Because this unnatural war, thus commenced in oppression, and in the most erroneous policy, must, if persevered in, be finally ruinous in its effects. The commerce of Great Britain with America was great and increasing; the profits immense; the advantages, as a nursery of seamen, and as an inexhaustible magazine of naval stores, infinite; and the continuance of that commerce, particularly in times of war, when most wanted to support our fleets and revenues, not precarious as all foreign trade must be, but depending solely on ourselves. These valuable resources, which enable us to face the united efforts of the House of Bourbon, are actually lost to Great Britain, and irretrievably lost, unless redeemed by immediate and effectual pacification.

3dly. Because Great Britain, deprived of so valuable a part of its resources, and not animated either with motives of self-defence or with those prospects of advantage and glory which have hitherto supported this nation in all its foreign wars, may possibly find itself unable to supply the means of carrying on a civil war, at such a vast distance, in a country so peculiarly circumstanced, and under the complicated difficulties which necessarily attend it. Still less should we be able to preserve by mere force that vast continent, and that growing multitude of resolute freemen who inhabit it, even if that or any other country was worth governing against the inclination of all its inhabitants. . . .

5thly. Because the Ministers who are to be entrusted with the management of this war have proved themselves unequal to the task, and in every degree unworthy of publick trust. Parliament has given them every assistance they asked; no unforeseen accidents have stood in their way; no storms have disabled or delayed their operations; no foreign power hath, as yet, interfered; but notwithstanding these advantages, by their ignorance, negligence, and want of conduct, our arms have been disgraced; . . . Whether we consider its extent or its commerce, England has lost half its empire in one campaign. . . . We cannot, therefore, consent to an Address, which may deceive his Majesty and the publick into a belief of the confidence of this House in the present Ministers, who have deceived Parliament, disgraced the nation, lost the Colonies, and involved us in a civil war, against our clearest interests, and upon the most unjustifiable grounds, wantonly spilling the blood of thousands of our fellow-subjects.

3. THE DEBATE IN THE COMMONS

A. MR. WEDDERBURN: "AMERICA MUST BE CONQUERED!"

Thursday, October 26, 1775

Mr. Wedderburn said: . . . Why, then, do we hesitate? Because an inconsiderable party, inconsistent in their own politicks, and always hostile to all government but their own, endeavour to obstruct our measures, and clog the wheels of Government? Let us rather second the indignant voice of the nation, which presses in from all quarters upon the Sovereign, calling loudly for vigorous measures, and for the suppression of faction. Shall we be deaf to its call? Sir, we have been too long deaf; we have too long shown our forbearance and long-suffering; faction must now be curbed, must be subdued and crushed; our thunders must go forth; America must be conquered.

Had my advice been taken (and gentlemen insinuate it is taken too much), the House must do me the justice to own that a much more powerful force than General Gage had would have been sent to America. But it is not yet, I apprehend, too late; for I am not one of those ill-boding prophets who, from every disaster, augur destructive consequences, and whose prophecies, like those of antiquity, contribute more than any other circumstance to their own completion. I hold it dastardly in the counsellor of a great and mighty empire to encourage despondence, and to be the croaking raven of future mischiefs and calamities. . . . Exert your courage in proportion to the difficulties to be surmounted; and, like your own oaks in the ocean, rise superior to the storm. Such is the language of the genuine friend of England; such, I am persuaded, is the language expected from us by a gallant nation, whose spirit, instead of being depressed, is only roused by adverse accidents. Shall we stand as a mound in the way of this torrent, which has hitherto borne down all opposition? Sir, I do not approve of that policy that would repress plebeian haughtiness, as it is called, and check that pride of empire with the idea of which the souls of our common people swell, feeling their own importance.

"Our lowest mechanicks," it has been urged, "now talk familiarly of our subjects." And why should they not? Feeling their own consequence, why should they not, like freemen, give free course to their thoughts? However:

lightly this spirit may be now prized, it is what has raised England to the great and glorious state which she now occupies. Do you imagine that the allurements of six pence a day fills our armies, mounts a breach, or takes a battery of cannon? No, sir; we owe all this to the ferment of youthful blood, to the high spirit of the people, to a love of glory, and a sense of national honour. Let us cherish so noble a principle, and we shall soon feel the good effects of its operation. This principle it was that frequently humbled the pride of France, that formerly ruined the Spanish armada, and lately baffled the Bourbon confederacy; the principle, in short, that lately crushed every power that ever had the temerity to encounter your collected rage. View the state of England in Elizabeth's reign, and learn fortitude from her example. . . .

—FORCE, American Archives, 4th Series, VI, 41-42.

B. MR. JOHNSTONE: "INSTITUTIONS THAT HAVE REARED SUCH ELEVATED SPIRITS!"

October 26, 1775

Mr. Johnstone: . . . I maintain that the sense of the best and wisest men in this country are on the side of the Americans; that three to one in Ireland are on their side; that the soldiers and sailors feel an unwillingness to the service; that you never will find the same exertions of spirit in this as in other wars. I speak it to the credit of the fleet and army: they do not like to butcher men whom the greatest characters in this country consider as contending in the glorious cause of preserving those institutions which are necessary to the happiness, security and elevation of the human mind. I am well informed that four field officers in the four regiments now going from Ireland have desired leave to retire or sell out. I do not mean to say that the soldiers or sailors in America have shown any signs of cowardice; this is below their spirit: I only assert that they in general proclaim it a disagreeable service; most of the army feel it as such. That numbers have not deserted is owing to their situation.

There is a wide difference between the English officer or soldier who barely does his duty, and the general exertions of the New England army, where every man is thinking of what further service he can perform; where every soldier is a Scaevola. To a mind who loves to contemplate the glorious spirit of freedom, no spectacle can be more affecting than the action at Bunkers Hill. To see an irregular peasantry commanded by a physician, inferior in number, opposed by every circumstance of cannon and bombs that could terrify timid minds, calmly waiting the attack of the gallant Howe leading on the best troops in the world, with an excellent train of artillery, and twice repulsing those very troops who had often chased the chosen battalions of France, and at last retiring for want of ammunition, but in so respectable a manner that they were not even pursued—who can reflect on such scenes, and not adore the Constitution of Government which could breed such men! Who will not pause and examine, before he destroys institutions that have reared such elevated spirits! Who is there that can dismiss all doubts on the justice of the cause which can inspire such conscious rectitude?

The conduct of the people of New England for wisdom, courage, temperance, fortitude, and all those qualities that can command the admiration of noble minds, is not surpassed in the history of any nation under the sun. Instead of wreaking our vengeance against that Colony their heroism alone should plead their forgiveness.

C. JOHN WILKES: "NO PART OF THE SUBJECTS OF THIS EMPIRE WILL EVER SUBMIT TO BE SLAVES"

October 26, 1775

The Lord Mayor, Mr. Wilkes: . . . I think this war, Sir, fatal and ruinous to our country. It absolutely annihilates the only great source of our wealth, which we enjoyed unrivalled by other nations, and deprives us of the fruits of the laborious industry of near three million of subjects, which centered here. That commerce has already taken its flight, and our American merchants are now deploring the consequences of a wretched policy, which has been pursued to their destruction. It is, Sir, no less ruinous with regard to the enormous expence of the fleets and armies necessary for this nefarious undertaking, and of consequence the enormous supplies to be raised, so that we are wasting our present wealth, while we are destroying the sources of all we might have in future. An humane mind must contemplate with agony the dreadful calamities and convulsions which are the consequence of every civil war, and especially a civil war of this magnitude and extent.

I speak, Sir, as a firm friend to England and America, but still more to universal liberty and the rights of all mankind. I trust no part of the subjects of this vast empire will ever submit to be slaves. I am sure the Americans are too high-spirited to brook the idea. Your whole power, and that of your allies, if you add any, even of all the German troops, of all the ruffians from the north, whom you can hire, cannot effect so wicked a purpose. The conduct of the present administration has already wrested the sceptre of America out of the hands of our sovereign, and he has now scarcely even a postmaster left in that whole northern continent. More than half the empire is already lost, and almost all the rest in confusion and anarchy. The ministry have brought our sovereign into a more disgraceful situation than any crowned head now living. He alone has already lost, by their fatal counsels, more territory than the three great united powers of Russia, Austria and Prussia have together by a wicked confederacy robbed Poland of, and by equal acts of violence and injustice from administration.

England was never engaged in a contest of such importance to our most valuable concerns and possessions. We are fighting for the subjection, the unconditional submission, of a country infinitely more extended than our own, of which every day increases the wealth, the natural strength, the population. Should we not succeed, it will be a loss never enough to be deplored, a bosom friendship soured to hate and resentment. We shall be considered as their most implacable enemies, an eternal separation will follow, and the grandeur of the British empire pass away. Success, final success, seems to me not equivocal, not uncertain, but impossible. However we may differ among ourselves, they are perfectly united. On this side the Atlantic party-rage unhappily divides us, but one soul animates the vast northern continent of America, the general congress, and each provincial assembly. An appeal has been made to the sword; and at the close of the last campaign what have we conquered? Bunker's-hill only, and with the loss of 1,200 men. Are we to pay as dearly for the rest of America? The idea of the conquest of that immense continent is as romantic as unjust.

The Hon. gentleman who moved the Address says, "The Americans have been treated with lenity." Will facts justify this assertion? Was your Boston Port Bill a measure of lenity? Was your Fishery Bill a measure of lenity? Was your Bill for taking away the charter of the Massachusetts Bay a measure of lenity, or even justice? I omit your many other gross provocations and insults, by which the brave Americans have been driven into their present state.

He asserts that they avow a disposition to be independent. On the contrary, Sir, all the declarations, both of the late and the present congress, uniformly tend to this one object, of being put on the same footing the Americans were in the year 1763. This has been their only demand, from which they have never varied. Their daily prayers and petitions are for liberty, peace and safety. I use the words of the congress the last year. They justly expect to be put on an equal footing with the other subjects of the empire, and are willing to come into any fair agreement with you in commercial concerns. If you confine all our trade to yourselves, say they; if you make a monopoly of our commerce; if you shut all the other ports of the world against us, do not tax us likewise. If you tax us, then give us a free trade, such as you enjoy yourselves. Let us have equal advantages of commerce, all other ports open to us; then we can, and will, cheerfully, voluntarily pay taxes. You will have a free-will offering given with pleasure, not grudgingly.

It must give, Sir, every man who loves this country the deepest concern at the naming in the Address foreign troops, Hanoverians and Hessians, who are now called to interfere in our domestic quarrels, not to dwell this day on the illegality of the measure, the danger and disgrace attending foreign mercenaries. The militia, indeed, are, we are told, to be now employed, and that noble institution is at present complimented by ministers, but we know they hate the very name of a militia, and that measure is adopted only because the embodying of these forces enables administration to butcher more of our fellow subjects in America.

Sir, I disapprove not only the evil spirit of the whole Address, but likewise the wretched adulation of almost every part of it. My wish and hope therefore is that it will be rejected by the House, and that another dutiful, yet decent, manly Address will be presented to the King, praying his Majesty that he would sheath the sword, prevent the farther effusion of the blood of our fellow subjects, adopt some mode of negotiation with the general congress, in compliance with their repeated petition, and thereby restore peace and harmony to this distracted empire.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 734-737.

D. CHARLES JAMES FOX: "ALEXANDER NEVER GAINED MORE IN ONE CAMPAIGN THAN THE NOBLE LORD HAS LOST"

October 26, 1775

Mr. Fox described Lord North as the blundering pilot who had brought the nation into its present difficulties. Administration, he said, exult at having brought us into this dilemma. They have reason to triumph. Lord Chatham, the king of Prussia, nay, Alexander the Great, never gained more in one campaign than the noble lord has lost—he has lost a whole continent. Although he thought the Americans had gone too far, and were not justifiable in what they had done, yet they were more justifiable for resisting than they would have been had they submitted to the tyrannical acts of a British parliament—that when the question was whether a people ought to submit to slavery or aim at freedom by a spirited resistance, the alternative which must strike every Englishman was the choice of the latter. . . .

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 769.

E. MR. SERJEANT ADAIR: "WE CANNOT CONQUER AMERICA"

October 27, 1775

Mr. Serjeant Adair: . . . The war in which we are engaged is, of all others, in its nature the most ruinous and destructive. Whatever may be the event, we must be the sufferers; for such is the unhappy nature of the contest that the losses and mischiefs of both sides must ultimately fall upon us. Whose treasures will be exhausted by the expence? Whose commerce will be ruined and destroyed? The blood of whose subjects will be spilt but those of the British empire?

If such are the present effects of this war, the event must be still more fatal to this kingdom. Let us consider it, Sir, upon either supposition of success or disappointment, of conquest or defeat. The present situation of the colonies, their union, their conduct, their enthusiastic spirit of liberty, and the fatal experience of the last campaign, has fully convinced every man, even the most sanguine, that we cannot expect bloodless laurels or an easy conquest. We must lay our accounts for the most alarming and dangerous resistance; and if a full exertion of all the powers and resources of this kingdom, which I am far from thinking the most probable event, should at length, after a long and obstinate contest, in which both sides will be almost equally exhausted, prevail over every effort of liberty, reduce the colonies to a forced submission, and complete the conquest of America—in what respect shall we be gainers by such a conquest? What shall we acquire at such an expence but the empty assertion of an unprofitable sovereignty over desolated provinces, or a few miserable slaves? Instead of those flourishing dominions, the wealth and commerce of which has rendered us the greatest nation in the world, we shall find ourselves possessed of a vast territory, which, drained of the sources from whence that greatness flowed, that communicated itself so plentifully to us, will be not only useless and unprofitable, but burthensome and destructive; acquired by violence and force, it cannot be preserved but by the same means; and our acknowledged revenues must be still further drained by the constant expence of fleets and armies to support our unjust authority and to defend from foreign invasion those provinces which we shall have deprived of the means of defending themselves. These, Sir, are the happy consequences that we may expect from the most prosperous success.

But suppose for a moment the event should be different; suppose the extent and natural advantages of their country, their distance from us, that union which our measures have produced, and above all that ardour of liberty, that enthusiastic and desperate spirit, which our injustice and oppression have excited, should carry the Americans through the dreadful struggle with success and enable them in the end to baffle and defeat the utmost exertions of their infatuated and deluded country. In the course and event of such a struggle, is it possible to suppose that America will not follow the dangerous example which we are going to set her of having recourse to foreign assistance; that in the future establishment of her commerce, she will not give the preference to any nation in Europe over that which has attempted to enslave and destroy her and has not desisted from the unnatural attempt till after the utmost, though ineffectual, exertion of all her power and resources? In what situation will Great Britain then find herself? Her colonies will not only be totally lost to her, but, at least as to the benefits of their commerce, thrown into the hands of other powers, most probably her natural enemies. Reduced to her insular dominions; curtailed in her commerce; the principal source of her wealth and naval power transferred into the hands of her enemies; her blood and treasures exhausted; her revenues lessened, oppressed with an enormous debt, and debilitated with unsuccessful exertions; she will lose her power and consequence in the system of Europe, and be exposed almost a defenceless prey to the first neighbour who shall chuse to invade her.

These, Sir, are the consequences which must ensue from the measures we are now called upon to approve and support. Whether they are followed by defeat or success, they will, almost with equal certainty, destroy the power, the glory, the happiness of this once great and flourishing empire. It is my opinion that we cannot conquer America; I have not a doubt that we cannot acquire or maintain a beneficial sovereignty over her by violence and force.

Sir, I could not be easy in my own mind without entering the strongest and most public protestations against measures which appear to me to be fraught with the destruction of this mighty empire. I wash my hands of the blood of my fellow subjects; and shall at least have this satisfaction, amidst the impending calamities of the public, not only to think that I have not contributed to, but that I have done all in my power to oppose and avert the ruin of my country.

—COBBETT, Parliamentary History of England, XVIII, 787-791.

VI. GEORGE III HIRES MERCENARIES

In the Seven Years' War, said the Earl of Shelburne, Britain was able to raise an army of 300,000 men; now she cannot find 50,000 soldiers. The explanation he found in the war itself, for "in a worthy cause we can get soldiers enough." King George tried to prove the cause worthy by raising soldiers in Hanover: he sent 4000 of his own troops to Gibraltar and Minorca and replaced them with loyal Hanoverians. He took another 4000 soldiers out of Ireland, and replaced them, too, with mercenaries. But this was of little help. He tried to hire soldiers from Empress Catherine of Russia, but his overtures were rejected and, he wrote, "not in so genteel a manner as I should have thought might have been expected from Her; She has not had the Civility to answer in her own hand." Then the King tried to hire the so-called Scotch Brigade from the Dutch, but again without success. Finally he turned to the German principalities, long an arsenal for other people's armies. Frederick the Great of Prussia would have none of it, but the other princes—in Burke's wonderful phrase—"snuffed the cadaverous taint of lucrative war." The Prince of Brunswick-Lüneburg, brother-in-law to George III, was ready to sell 4300 men for £160,000. The Prince of Hanau, who had 74 children to support, wanted to get in on a good thing, and so did the Landgrave of Hesse-Cassel with reputedly 100 children to maintain. Out of a population of some 300,000 this ruler managed to provide almost 20,000 mercenaries—for some £3,000,000. Altogether Britain obtained some 30,000 German mercenaries, at a total cost of £4,700,000; of these 30,000 some 12,000 were killed, or stayed in America.

The hiring of German mercenaries seemed even to some of the British a dirty business. To make the matter worse, however, the Ministry had struck a thoroughly bad bargain with the German princes. The treaties—to preserve appearances they took the form of treaties of reciprocity—excited heated criticism when they were introduced into Parliament, but were nevertheless voted by 252-88 in the Commons and 100-32 in the Lords.

We give here a small group of miscellaneous documents on the Hessians: the rejection of British overtures by the Dutch; the King's treaty with the Prince of Hesse-Cassel with some criticism and some defense; a handbill—probably written by Thomas Jefferson—designed to induce the Hessians to desert; and a typically Franklinesque satire on the sale of the Hessians.

1. THE DUTCH REFUSE TO LEND TROOPS TO BRITAIN

Opinion of Johan Derk van der Capellen on request of the King of Great Britain for the loan of the Scotch Brigade.

December 16, 1775

Honourable and Mighty Gentlemen: . . . This brings me to my last observation. Though not as principals, yet as auxiliaries, our troops would be employed towards suppressing (what some please to call) a rebellion in the American colonies; for which purpose I would rather see janizaries hired than troops of a free State. In what an odious light must this unnatural civil war appear to all Europe, a war in which even savages . . . refuse to engage; more odious, still, would it appear for a people to take a part therein who were themselves once slaves, bore that hateful name, but at last had spirit to fight themselves free. But, above all, it must appear superlatively detestable to me, who think the Americans worthy of every man's esteem and look upon them as a brave people, defending in a becoming, manly and religious manner those rights which, as men, they derive from God, not from the legislature of Great Britain. Their mode of proceeding will, I hope, serve as an example to every nation deprived, by any means, of its privileges, yet fortunate enough in being able to make suitable efforts towards retaining or regaining them. . . .

2. KING GEORGE HIRES HESSIAN MERCENARIES

A. TREATY WITH THE PRINCE OF HESSE-CASSEL

Be it known to all whom it may concern that his Majesty the King of Great Britain, having judged proper to accept a body of infantry of the troops of his Most Serene Highness the Hereditary Prince of Hesse Cassel, reigning Count of Hanau, etc., to be employed in the service of Great Britain, the high contracting parties . . . have agreed upon the following articles:

Art. I. The said Most Serene Prince yields to his Britannick Majesty a body of infantry of six hundred and sixty men, which shall be at the entire disposition of the King of Great Britain.

Art. II. The Most Serene Prince engages to equip completely this corps; and that it shall be ready to march the 20th of the month of March next, at farthest. The said corps shall pass in review before his Majesty's Commissary at Hanau, if that can be done, or at some other place as opportunity shall offer.

Art. III. The Most Serene Prince engages to furnish the recruits annually necessary. These recruits shall be delivered to his Britannick Majesty's Commissary, disciplined and completely equipped. . . .

Art. VIII. There shall be paid to his Most Serene Highness, under the title of levy money, for each foot soldier thirty crowns Banco—the crown reckoned at fifty-three sols of Holland. . . .

Art. IX. According to custom, three wounded men shall be reckoned as one killed. A man killed shall be paid for at the rate of the levy money. If it shall happen that any company of the corps should be entirely ruined or destroyed, the King will pay the expense of the necessary recruits to re-establish this corps. . . .

Art. XII. His Britannick Majesty will grant to the Most Serene Prince, during all the time that this body of troops shall be in the pay of his Majesty, an annual subsidy of twenty-five thousand and fifty crowns Banco. . . .

B. LORD NORTH JUSTIFIES THE HIRING OF MERCENARIES

February 29, 1776

Lord North [Introducing a Treaty with the Landgrave of Hesse] urged the necessity of the measure, and the great effects he expected from it. He said, no questions could arise upon it but three, all of which were too plain to require much elucidation: Whether the troops proposed to be hired were wanted? whether the terms on which they were procured were advantageous? and whether the force was such as might be deemed fully adequate to effect the operations for which it was intended?

As to the first point, he said that reducing America to a proper constitutional state of obedience being the great object of Parliament, the best and most speedy means of effecting so desirable a purpose was the motive which induced Administration to adopt the measure, because men could be readier had, and upon much cheaper terms in this way, than we could possibly recruit them at home. On the second, he observed, that not only in the view of comparative cheapness with home levies, but as referring to former times, the present troops would cost us less than (taking all the circumstances together) we could have expected. And, lastly, that the force which this measure would enable us to send to America would be such as, in all human probability, would compel that country to agree to terms of submission, perhaps without any further effusion of blood.

C. "A COMPOUND OF THE MOST SOLEMN MOCKERY, FALLACY AND GROSS IMPOSITION"

March 5, 1776

Lord Camden: . . . As for the treaties now on your Lordships' table, and the proposed effect of the present motion, I shall beg your Lordships' indulgence for a few words. If I understand them right, they contain an agreement with the Landgrave of Hesse, Duke of Brunswick, and Prince of Hanau, for a certain number of troops for specifick sums of money, accompanied by subsequent conditions of a double subsidy to be paid, in case the war should be terminated in a shorter time than that usually fixed for the existence of subsidiary treaties. To give this bargain the appearance of what it really is not, the whole is stuffed up with pompous expressions of alliance, founded in reciprocal support and common interest; as if these petty States were really concerned in the event of the present contest between this country and America.

Now, my Lords, I would appeal to any of your Lordships if the whole of this transaction be not a compound of the most solemn mockery, fallacy and gross imposition that was ever attempted to be put on a House of Parliament. Is there one of your Lordships who does not perceive most clearly that the whole is a mere mercenary bargain for the hire of troops on one side, and the sale of human blood on the other; and that the devoted wretches thus purchased for slaughter are mere mercenaries, in the worst sense of the word? . . . The history of all ages and nations prove the fatal effects of calling in foreign auxiliaries, but more particularly mere mercenaries, to fight their battles; and my memory hardly furnishes me with a single instance of conquest over any great state or empire, in which the conquerors were not first introduced into the country as friends and allies. This general truth, my Lords, I allow, does not directly apply to the present treaties; but the principle, were the national imbecility such as your Lordships heard it described to be this day really just, ought to create cause of great and serious alarm to every one of your Lordships. I cannot better express my disapprobation of employing foreigners, particularly to fight our domestick quarrels, than by quoting the opinion of that great man, Sir Walter Raleigh. In his History of the World, he says "that they are seditious, unfaithful, disobedient, devourers and destroyers of all places and countries whither they are drawn, as being held by no other bond but their own commodity. Yea, that which is most fearful among such hirelings is, that they have often, and in time of greatest extremity, not only refused to fight in the defence of those who have entertained them, but revolted to the contrary part, to the utter ruin of those Princes and States who have trusted them."

3. CONGRESS TRIES TO SEDUCE THE HESSIANS FROM THEIR ALLIANCE

August 14, 1776

Whereas it has been the wise policy of these states to extend the protection of their laws to all those who should settle among them, of whatever nation or religion they might be, and to admit them to a participation of the benefits of civil and religious freedom; and the benevolence of this practice, as well as its salutary effects, have rendered it worthy of being continued in future times.

And whereas his Britannic majesty, in order to destroy our freedom and happiness, has commenced against us a cruel and unprovoked war; and, unable to engage Britons sufficient to execute his sanguinary measures, has applied for aid to certain foreign princes, who are in the habit of selling the blood of their people for money, and from them has procured and transported hither considerable numbers of foreigners.

And it is conceived, that such foreigners, if apprised of the practice of these states, would chuse to accept of lands, liberty, safety and a communion of good laws, and mild government, in a country where many of their friends and relations are already happily settled, rather than continue exposed to the toils and dangers of a long and bloody war, waged against a people, guilty of no other crime than that of refusing to exchange freedom for slavery; and that they will do this the more especially when they reflect that after they shall have violated every Christian and moral precept by invading and attempting to destroy those who have never injured them or their country, their only reward, if they escape death and captivity, will be a return to the despotism of their prince, to be by him again sold to do the drudgery of some other enemy to the rights of mankind.

And whereas the parliament of Great Britain have thought fit, by a late act, not merely to invite our troops to desert our service, but to direct a compulsion of our people, taken at sea, to serve against their country:

Resolved, Therefore, that these states will receive all such foreigners who shall leave the armies of his Britannic majesty in America and shall chuse to become members of any of these states; that they shall be protected in the free exercise of their respective religions, and be invested with the rights, privileges and immunities of natives, as established by the laws of these states; and, moreover, that this Congress will provide, for every such person, 50 acres of unappropriated lands in some of these states, to be held by him and his heirs in absolute property.

4. FRANKLIN WRITES A SATIRE ON THE SALE OF THE HESSIANS

From the Count de Schaumbergh to the Baron Hohendorf, Commanding the Hessian Troops in America.

Rome, February 18, 1777

Monsieur Le Baron:—On my return from Naples, I received at Rome your letter of the 27th December of last year. I have learned with unspeakable pleasure the courage our troops exhibited at Trenton, and you cannot imagine my joy on being told that of the 1,950 Hessians engaged in the fight but 345 escaped. There were just 1,605 men killed, and I cannot sufficiently commend your prudence in sending an exact list of the dead to my minister in London. This precaution was the more necessary as the report sent to the English ministry does not give but 1,455 dead. This would make 483,450 florins instead of 643,500 which I am entitled to demand under our convention. You will comprehend the prejudice which such an error would work in my finances, and I do not doubt you will take the necessary pains to prove that Lord North's list is false and yours correct.

The court of London objects that there were a hundred wounded who ought not to be included in the list, nor paid for as dead; but I trust you will not overlook my instructions to you on quitting Cassel, and that you will not have tried by human succor to recall the life of the unfortunates whose days could not be lengthened but by the loss of a leg or an arm. That would be making them a pernicious present, and I am sure they would rather die than live in a condition no longer fit for my service. I do not mean by this that you should assassinate them; we should be humane, my dear Baron, but you may insinuate to the surgeons with entire propriety that a crippled man is a reproach to their profession, and that there is no wiser course than to let every one of them die when he ceases to be fit to fight.

I am about to send you some new recruits. Don't economize them. Remember glory before all things. Glory is true wealth. There is nothing degrades the soldier like the love of money. He must care only for honour and reputation, but his reputation must be acquired in the midst of dangers. A battle gained without costing the conqueror any blood is an inglorious success, while the conquered cover themselves with glory by perishing with their arms in their hands. Do you remember that of the 300 Lacedaemonians who defended the defile of Thermopylae, not one returned? How happy should I be could I say the same of my brave Hessians!

It is true that their king, Leonidas, perished with them: but things have changed, and it is no longer the custom for princes of the empire to go and fight in America for a cause with which they have no concern. And besides, to whom should they pay the thirty guineas per man if I did not stay in Europe to receive them? Then, it is necessary also that I be ready to send recruits to replace the men you lose. For this purpose I must return to Hesse.

It is true, grown men are becoming scarce there, but I will send you boys. Besides, the scarcer the commodity the higher the price. I am assured that the women and little girls have begun to till our lands, and they get on not badly. You did right to send back to Europe that Dr. Crumerus who was so successful in curing dysentery. Don't bother with a man who is subject to looseness of the bowels. That disease makes bad soldiers. One coward will do more mischief in an engagement than ten brave men will do good. Better that they burst in their barracks than fly in a battle and tarnish the glory of our arms. Besides, you know that they pay me as killed for all who die from disease, and I don't get a farthing for runaways.

My trip to Italy, which has cost me enormously, makes it desirable that there should be a great mortality among them. You will therefore promise promotion to all who expose themselves; you will exhort them to seek glory in the midst of dangers; you will say to Major Maundorff that I am not at all content with his saving the 345 men who escaped the massacre of Trenton. Through the whole campaign he has not had ten men killed in consequence of his orders. Finally, let it be your principal object to prolong the war and avoid a decisive engagement on either side, for I have made arrangements for a grand Italian opera, and I do not wish to be obliged to give it up. Meantime I pray God, my dear Baron de Hohendorf, to have you in his holy and gracious keeping.

CHAPTER EIGHT

The Great Declaration

WRITING OF the Declaration of Independence, the embittered Governor Hutchinson alleged that some American leaders had been working for independence ever since the days of the Stamp Act. Late in life John Adams appeared to give support to this theory. The Revolution, he assured his old friend Thomas McKean of Pennsylvania, "was in the minds of the people, and in the union of the colonies, both of which were accomplished before hostilities commenced." But at almost the same time he was assuring another friend that while there had always been a desire for independence from Parliament, there had never been any desire for independence from the Crown before the crisis of 1775-1776. "For my part," he wrote, "there was not a moment during the Revolution when I would not have given everything I ever possessed for a restoration to the state of things before the contest began."

Though there is some exaggeration in this, the evidence is conclusive that it was a "restoration to the state of things before the contest began" that almost all Americans wanted. In March 1775 Benjamin Franklin could assure Lord Chatham that "he had never heard in any conversation from any person drunk or sober the least expression of a wish for a separation or hint that such a thing would be advantageous to America." According to the Maryland clergyman, Jonathan Boucher, George Washington on his way to Philadelphia in the spring of 1776 asserted that "if I ever heard of his joining in any such measures [as independence] I had his leave to set him down for everything wicked." The Loyalist Boucher is not wholly reliable, yet a few weeks later Washington himself was assuring the New York Provincial Congress that "every exertion of my worthy colleagues and myself will be equally extended to the re-establishment of peace and harmony between the Mother Country and these Colonies." Nor can we doubt the authenticity of that report by James Hogg from the short-lived colony of Transylvania that as late as October 1775 both Samuel and John Adams regarded anything looking to independence as an impropriety.

Few things about the history of the American Revolution are more impressive than the slowness with which feeling in favor of independence matured, and the reluctance of the great majority of Americans to contemplate the necessity or the inevitability of a final separation. Far from being those rash, headstrong and violent demagogues that Hutchinson described, that Germain denounced, that King George imagined, the leaders of the American Revolution were prudent, cautious and judicious. There were exceptions, to be sure, and it is doubtless true that there were radicals in every colony working for independence as early as 1775: Sam Adams and Joseph Hawley, Patrick Henry and Richard Henry Lee, Thomas Jefferson and William Henry Drayton, to name but a few of the more prominent. But the great majority of those who voted independence and ultimately won it were not, at the beginning, separatists.

Even Lexington and Concord and Bunker's Hill, even the creation of a Continental Army and the appointment of a Continental commander, did not bring about a revolution in American attitude. The Second Continental Congress might proclaim the necessity of taking up arms, create an army and a navy, authorize privateers, open negotiations (after a fashion) with France, and launch an attack on Canada, but it still petitioned for reconciliation. And even after George III had cavalierly rejected the petition and proclaimed the colonies in a state of rebellion, their spokesmen in Philadelphia hesitated, debated, and indulged in wishful thinking that somehow the cup of independence might be dashed from their lips.

The decisive change in sentiment can be dated from the publication of that remarkable pamphlet, Common Sense, written by the gifted Thomas Paine, newly arrived from England. Published early in January 1776, it was speedily republished in most of the cities of the colonies, and within a few weeks its influence was felt everywhere. "Thousands," wrote the South Carolina historian Ramsay, "were converted by it and were led to long for a separation from the mother country." Some, indeed, heard Paine's words as sounding brass and tinkling cymbals, but to most he spoke with the tongue of angels. In any event the common sense of Paine's arguments appealed alike to the man at the plow and in the street, the soldier in camp and the statesman at his desk in the Continental Congress in Philadelphia.

By early spring of 1776 the trend for independence was beginning to accelerate as two things became increasingly clear: that the mother country had no intention of acquiescing in American demands without intolerable reservations; and that the colonies could, in fact, if united and helped by France, win a contest of arms. In any event February and March saw an upsurge of revolutionary sentiment and activity. In rapid succession the Continental Congress authorized privateers, and armed them; placed an embargo on trade with Britain and the West Indies; sent Silas Deane to France to win financial and other support; instructed the colonies to disarm all unfriendly persons; and opened the ports of America to all nations except Britain.

Meantime sentiment for independence was growing rapidly in the states—a term which we must use now instead of "colonies." Late in March, South Carolina adopted a constitution which implied a condition of independence; on April 12 North Carolina instructed her delegation in Congress that they might concur with others in a declaration of independence; and early in May Rhode Island fell into line. Now, indeed, as John Adams wrote exultantly, every day independence rolled in like a torrent. May 15 was perhaps the decisive day: on that day Virginia, the most populous and most powerful of the states, voted for independence, and Congress formally instructed the states to form their own independent governments.

Now it was only a question of time. New England and the South had both swung over to independence; only the Middle States held back. Under the leadership of such men as Dickinson and Wilson of Pennsylvania, Duane and Jay of New York, Carter Braxton of Virginia and Edward Rutledge of South Carolina, and a handful of others, the moderates gathered themselves for a last stand. When on June 7 Richard Henry Lee introduced his famous resolution looking to independence, they were strong enough to win a postponement of the vote, but that was, in reality, their last show of strength. On July 1 the ever-vacillating John Dickinson tried to stem the tide, but in vain; the next day independence was voted without a dissenting voice.

Meantime a committee of five had "prepared a declaration in conformity to" the resolution of independence: with admirable prescience this committee assigned the task to young Thomas Jefferson, freshly arrived from Virginia. Jefferson's Declaration, not too seriously changed by the committee, was submitted to the Congress on June 28, debated on the second, third and fourth of July, and passed on that now famous day. It was signed, in a desultory fashion, during the following weeks.

No one, not even Jefferson, played a larger role in bringing thirteen reluctant colonies to a declaration of independence than stanch John Adams, and no one rejoiced more deeply when this "greatest question which ever was debated in America" was decided. And it was Adams who in a moment of exultation pronounced the perfect apothegm on the events of the day of independence:

I am well aware of the toil and blood and treasure it will cost us to maintain this declaration and support and defend these States. Yet through all the gloom I can see the rays of ravishing light and glory. I can see that the end is more than worth all the means, and that posterity will triumph in that day's transactions.

I. BENJAMIN RUSH LIMNS SOME OF THE FOUNDING FATHERS

Benjamin Rush was only thirty when the Revolutionary War broke out, but as with so many other young men of his day, he had already achieved position and fame. At the age of twenty-one he had sailed for Edinburgh to study medicine at that famous center, and while abroad had learned not only science but philosophy, and had come under the influence of Dr. Franklin. Back in Philadelphia he rose rapidly to eminence: professor at the College of Philadelphia, leading physician, member of the American Philosophical Society, zealous reformer and ardent Patriot. He early became an advocate of independence, encouraged Tom Paine to write Common Sense, and was elected to the Continental Congress where he had the good fortune to be one of the "signers." In 1777 he became surgeon general of the armies of the Middle Department, and we shall meet him again, enthusiastic, passionate, quarrelsome. Rush knew everybody, and took everybody's measure, not always judiciously. These sketches were written about 1800.

SAMUEL ADAMS. He was near sixty years of age when he took his seat in Congress, but possessed all the vigor of mind of a young man of five and twenty. He was a republican in principle and manners. He once acknowledged to me "that the independance of the United States upon Great Britain had been the first wish of his heart seven years before the war." About the same time he said to me "if it were revealed to him that 999 Americans out of 1000 would perish in a war for liberty, he would vote for that war, rather than see his country enslaved. The survivors in such a war, though few (he said), would propagate a nation of freemen." He abhorred a standing army, and used to say that they were the "shoeblacks of Society." He dreaded the undue influence of an individual in a Republic, and once said to me, "Let us beware of continental and State great men." He loved simplicity and economy in the administration of government, and despised the appeals which are made to the eyes and ears of the common people in order to govern them. He considered national happiness and the public patronage of religion as inseperably connected; and so great was his regard for public worship, as the means of promoting religion, that he constantly attended divine service in the German church in York town while the Congress sat there, when there was no service in their chappel, although he was ignorant of the German language. His morals were irreproachable, and even ambition and avarice, the usual vices of politicians, seemed to have no place in his breast. He seldom spoke in Congress, but was active in preparing and doing business out of doors. In some parts of his conduct I have thought he discovered more of the prejudices of a Massachusetts man than the liberal sentiments of a citizen of the United States. His abilities were considerable, and his knowledge extensive and correct upon Revolutionary subjects, and both friends and enemies agree in viewing him as one of the most active instruments of the American Revolution.

JOHN ADAMS. He was a distant relation of Saml. Adams, but possessed another species of character. He had been educated a lawyer, and stood high in his profession in his native state. He was a most sensible and forcible speaker. Every member of Congress in 1776 acknowledged him to be the first man in the House. Dr. Brownson (of Georgia) used to say when he spoke, he fancied an angel was let down from heaven to illumine the Congress. He saw the whole of a subject at a single glance, and by a happy union of the powers of reasoning and persuasion often succeeded in carrying measures which were at first sight of an unpopular nature. His replies to reflections upon himself, or upon the New England States, were replete with the most poignant humor or satire. I sat next to him while Genl. Sullivan was delivering a request to Congress from Lord Howe for an interview with a committee of the House in their private capacities, after the defeat of the American Army on Long Island on the 26th of August 1776. Mr. Adams, under a sudden impression of the design, and dread of the consequences of the measure, whispered to me a wish "that the first ball that had been fired on the day of the defeat of our army, had gone through his head." When he rose to speak against the proposed interview, he called Genl. Sullivan "a decoy duck, whom Lord Howe has sent among us to seduce us into a renunciation of our independance." In a debate in which Mr. C— insinuated the New England troops as the principal cause of the failure of the expedition into Canada in 1775 [actually 1776], he said "the cause of the failure of that expedition was chiefly to be ascribed to the impudence of the gentleman from Maryland who has fomented jealousies and quarrels between the troops from the New England and Southern States in his visit to Canada, and (said Mr. Adams) if he were now penetrated, as he ought to be, with a sense of his improper and wicked conduct, he would fall down upon his knees upon this floor, and ask our forgiveness. He would afterwards retire with shame, and spend the remainder of his life in sackcloth and ashes, deploring the mischief he has done his country." He was equally fearless of men, and of the consequences of a bold assertion of his opinion in all his speeches. . . .

He was a stranger to dissimulation, and appeared to be more jealous of his reputation for integrity than for talents or knowledge. He was strictly moral, and at all times respectful to Religion. In speaking of the probable issue of the war he said to me in Baltimore in the winter of 1777, "We shall succeed in our struggle, provided we repent of our sins, and forsake them," and then added, "I will see it out, or go to heaven in its ruins." He possessed more learning probably, both ancient and modern, than any man who subscribed the Declaration of Independance. His reading was various. Even the old English poets were familiar to him. He once told me he had read all Bolingbroke's works with great attention. He admired nothing in them but the stile, and to acquire it, he said he had when a young man transcribed his "Idea of a Patriot King." When he went to Holland to negotiate a treaty with that country, he left a blank in Congress. . . .

ELBRIDGE GERRY. He was a respectable young merchant, of a liberal education and considerable knowledge. He was slow in his perceptions and in his manner of doing business, and stammering in his speech, but he knew and embraced truth when he saw it. He had no local or state prejudices. Every part of his conduct in 1775, 1776 and 1777 indicated him to be a sensible, upright man, and a genuine friend to republican forms of government.

ROGER SHEARMAN [SHERMAN]. A plain man of slender education. He taught himself mathematicks, and afterwards acquired some property and a good deal of reputation by making almanacks. He was so regular in business and so democratic in his principles that he was called by one of his friends "a republican machine." Patrick Henry asked him in 1774 why the people of Connecticut were more zealous in the cause of liberty than the people of other States; he answered "because we have more to lose than any of them." "What is that?" said Mr. Henry. "Our beloved charter," replied Mr. Sherman. He was not less distinguished for his piety than his patriotism. He once objected to a motion for Congress sitting on a Sunday upon an occasion which he thought did not require it, and gave as a reason for his objection a regard of the commands of his Maker. Upon hearing of the defeat of the American army on Long Island, where they were entrenched and fortified by a chain of hills, he said to me in coming out of Congress, "Truly in vain is salvation hoped for from the hills, and from the multitude of mountains" (Jeremiah iii, 23).

GEORGE CLYMER. A cool, firm, consistent Republican who loved liberty and government with an equal affection. Under the appearance of manners that were cold and indolent, he concealed a mind that was always warm and active towards the interests of his country. He was well informed in history ancient and modern, and frequently displayed flashes of wit and humor in conversation. His style in writing was simple, correct and sometimes eloquent. "The mould in which this man's mind was cast (to use the words of Lord Peterborough when speaking of Wm. Law) was seldom used."

JAMES WILSON. An eminent lawyer and a great and enlightened statesman. He had been educated for a clergyman in Scotland, and was a profound and accurate scholar. He spoke often in Congress, and his eloquence was of the most commanding kind. He reasoned, declaimed and persuaded according to circumstances with equal effect. His mind, while he spoke, was one blaze of light. Not a word ever fell from his lips out of time, or out of place, nor could a word be taken from or added to his speeches without injuring them. He rendered great and essential services to his country in every stage of the Revolution.

THOMAS JEFFERSON. He possessed a genius of the first order. It was universal in its objects. He was not less distinguished for his political than his mathematical and philosophical knowledge. The objects of his benevolence were as extensive as those of his knowledge. He was not only the friend of his country, but of all nations and religions. While Congress were deliberating upon the measure of sending Commissioners to France I asked him what he thought of being one of them. He said "he would go to hell to serve his country." He was afterwards elected a Commissioner, but declined at that time on account of the sickness of his wife. He seldom spoke in Congress.

ARTHUR MIDDLETON. A man of a cynical temper, but of upright intentions towards his country. He had been educated in England and was a critical Latin and Greek scholar. He read Horace and other classicks during his recess from Congress. He spoke frequently, and always with asperity or personalities. He disliked business, and when put upon the Committee of Accounts he refused to serve and gave as a reason for it that "he hated accounts, that he did not even keep his own accounts, and that he knew nothing about them."

CHARLES THOMPSON. A man of great learning and general knowledge, at all times a genuine Republican, and in the evening of his life a sincere Christian. He was the intimate friend of John Dickinson. He was once told in my presence that he ought to write a history of the Revolution. "No," said he, "I ought not, for I should contradict all the histories of the great events of the Revolution, and shew by my account of men, motives and measures, that we are wholly indebted to the agency of providence for its successful issue. Let the world admire the supposed wisdom and valor of our great men. Perhaps they may adopt the qualities that have been ascribed to them, and thus good may be done. I shall not undeceive future generations."

GENERAL CHARLES LEE. His character was a medley of opposite and contradicting qualities. He loved and admired public virtue, but was addicted to many private vices. He was obscene, profane, and at times impious in his conversation. His avarice discovered itself in every transaction of his life. He studied singularity and eccentricity in his dress, appetite, accommodations, stile in writing, speaking, and swearing. Even his will partook of this weakness in his character. He had many successive intimates, whom he called friends, but he appeared to have no affection for any thing human. A troop of dogs which he permitted to follow him every where seemed to engross his whole heart. He despised prudence, and used to call it "a rascally virtue." With these vices and oddities, he was sincere, and no one ever detected him in a lye, or even in an equivocation. He likewise possessed courage, which he evinced in many battles and duels in different parts of the world. His genius was considerable, and his attainments great in classical learning and in modern languages. He was eloquent and at times witty and brilliant in conversation. He was useful in the beginning of the war by inspiring our citizens with military ideas and lessening in our soldiers their superstitious fear of the valor and discipline of the British army. When he heard of the sentence of the court martial which suspended him from his command, he said "Oh, that I were a dog, that I might not call man my brother!"

II. DEFIANCE OR RECONCILIATION

On May 10, 1775, the Second Continental Congress formally opened in the State House in Philadelphia. Most of the members who drifted in that week or the next were veterans of the First Congress, but there were some very important additions: Benjamin Franklin and James Wilson from Pennsylvania, John Hancock—shortly to be chosen President—from Massachusetts, George Clinton and Philip Schuyler from New York, and, in time, Thomas Jefferson from Virginia. One gratifying addition was a delegate from the frontier colony of Georgia which had not been represented in the First Congress. "There never appeared more perfect unanimity among any sett of men," wrote the enthusiastic Richard Henry Lee, but within a short time unanimity gave way to dissension. There was however (or appeared to be) unanimity on the appointment of Washington to the chief command, and at least an appearance of agreement on the addresses, proclamations and petitions that streamed out from the State House during these early weeks.

But differences of opinion over the fundamental question of separation or reconciliation were deep, and grew deeper with the swift rush of events. What is most interesting is that these differences were not merely between radicals like John Adams or Jefferson and conservatives like Dickinson or Wilson; they were differences in the hearts and minds of individuals. Men seemingly as far apart in their views as John Adams and John Dickinson found themselves equally torn by doubts and misgivings. We can see this best in the two documents from which we take extracts: the Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms, and the so-called Olive Branch Petition to the King; it is revealing that the same man, John Dickinson, helped draft the first and wrote the second, and that John Adams signed both. And it is suggestive, too, that though Adams thought Dickinson had given a "silly cast" to the business of the Congress, he himself was by no means ready to embrace representatives from the upstart colony of Transylvania who had defied the Crown and assumed independence. And as late as August 25—two months after he had helped write the Declaration—Jefferson could assure his kinsman John Randolph that he was “looking with fondness towards a reconciliation with Great Britain.”

Actually it was George III who did more to help members of Congress make up their minds than the maneuvers of the Adamses or the eloquence of a Jefferson. The Olive Branch Petition, which Congress passed July 8, 1775, was entrusted to Richard Penn, descendant of William Penn, whose loyalty could not be suspect; he was to present it to Lord Dartmouth who, in turn, was to pass it on to the King. But with characteristic stubbornness, George III refused to receive it. “The King and his Cabinet,” said Lord Suffolk, “are determined to listen to nothing from the illegal congress, to treat with the colonies only one by one, and in no event to recognize them in any form of association.” No wonder the French ambassador wrote home to Vergennes that “these people appear to me in a delirium.”

While Americans waited for an answer, sentiment for reconciliation grew. Had there been any encouragement from the mother country, it might have crystallized into policy. But on November 1 the Congress heard not only of the rejection of the petition, but that the King had proclaimed the colonies in a state of rebellion. That day, too, brought word that the King was planning to hire German mercenaries, and that the British navy had wantonly burned the town of Falmouth. After all this it was hard to think of reconciliation.

We present here excerpts from the Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms—a document written jointly by Jefferson and Dickinson—and from the Olive Branch Petition; John Adams' unfortunate letter castigating Dickinson; the Royal Proclamation of Rebellion; and some instructions from Pennsylvania which suggest how strong was loyal sentiment in that and other colonies.

1. “OUR CAUSE IS JUST. OUR UNION IS PERFECT”

DECLARATION OF THE CAUSES AND NECESSITY OF TAKING UP ARMS

July 6, 1775

... We are reduced to the alternative of chusing an unconditional submission to the tyranny of irritated ministers, or resistance by force. The latter is our choice. We have counted the cost of this contest, and find nothing so dreadful as voluntary slavery. Honour, justice, and humanity forbid us tamely to surrender that freedom which we received from our gallant ancestors, and which our innocent posterity have a right to receive from us. We cannot endure the infamy and guilt of resigning succeeding generations to that wretchedness which inevitably awaits them, if we basely entail hereditary bondage upon them.

Our cause is just. Our union is perfect. Our internal resources are great, and, if necessary, foreign assistance is undoubtedly attainable. We gratefully acknowledge, as signal instances of the Divine favour towards us, that his Providence would not permit us to be called into this severe controversy, until we were grown up to our present strength, had been previously exercised in warlike operation, and possessed of the means of defending ourselves. With hearts fortified with these animating reflections, we most solemnly, before God and the world, declare that, exerting the utmost energy of those powers which our beneficent Creator hath graciously bestowed upon us, the arms we have been compelled by our enemies to assume, we will, in defiance of every hazard, with unabating firmness and perseverance, employ for the preservation of our liberties; being with one mind resolved to die freemen rather than to live slaves.

Lest this declaration should disquiet the minds of our friends and fellow-subjects in any part of the empire, we assure them that we mean not to dissolve that union which has so long and so happily subsisted between us, and which we sincerely wish to see restored. Necessity has not yet driven us into that desperate measure, nor induced us to excite any other nation to war against them. We have not raised armies with ambitious designs of separating from Great-Britain, and establishing independent states. We fight not for glory or for conquest. We exhibit to mankind the remarkable spectacle of a people attacked by unprovoked enemies, without any imputation or even suspicion of offenses. . . .

With an humble confidence in the mercies of the supreme and impartial Judge and Ruler of the Universe, we most devoutly implore his divine goodness to protect us happily through this great conflict, to dispose our adversaries to reconciliation on reasonable terms, and thereby to relieve the empire from the calamities of civil war.

By order of Congress

2. CONGRESS SENDS AN OLIVE BRANCH PETITION

To the King's Most Excellent Majesty.

July 8, 1775

Most Gracious Sovereign: We, your Majesty's faithful subjects in the Colonies of. . . .

Attached to your Majesty's person, family, and government, with all devotion that principle and affection can inspire; connected with Great Britain by the strongest ties that can unite societies, and deploring every event that tends in any degree to weaken them, we solemnly assure your Majesty, that we not only most ardently desire the former harmony between her and these Colonies may be restored, but that a concord may be established between them upon so firm a basis as to perpetuate its blessings, uninterrupted by any future dissensions to succeeding generations in both countries, and to transmit your Majesty's name to posterity, adorned with that signal and lasting glory that has attended the memory of those illustrious personages, whose virtues and abilities have extricated states from dangerous convulsions, and by securing happiness to others have erected the most noble and durable monuments to their own fame.

We therefore beseech your Majesty, that your royal authority and influence may be graciously interposed to procure us relief from our afflicting fears and jealousies, occasioned by the system before-mentioned, and to settle peace through every part of our Dominions, with all humility submitting to your Majesty's wise consideration, whether it may not be expedient, for facilitating those important purposes, that your Majesty be pleased to direct some mode, by which the united applications of your faithful Colonists to the Throne, in pursuance of their common counsels may be improved into a happy and permanent reconciliation; and that, in the meantime, measures may be taken for preventing the further destruction of the lives of your Majesty's subjects; and that such statutes as more immediately distress any of your Majesty's Colonies may be repealed. . . .

3. "MR. DICKINSON GIVES A SILLY CAST TO OUR DOINGS"

From the Diary of John Adams.

I took my hat, and went out of the door of Congress Hall. Mr. Dickinson observed me and darted out after me. He broke out upon me in a most abrupt and extraordinary manner: in as violent a passion as he was capable of feeling, and with an air, countenance and gestures as rough and haughty as if I had been a school-boy and he the master. He vociferated, "What is the reason, Mr. Adams, that you New England men oppose our measures of reconciliation? There, now, is Sullivan, in a long harangue, following you in a determined opposition to our petition to the King. Look ye! if you don't concur with us in our pacific system, I and a number of us will break off from you and New England, and we will carry on the opposition by ourselves in our own way." I own I was shocked with this magisterial salutation. . . .

The more I reflected on Mr. Dickinson's rude lecture in the State House yard, the more I was vexed with it; and the determination of Congress in favor of the petition did not allay the irritation. . . . I took my pen and wrote a very few lines to my wife, and about an equal number to General James Warren. Irritated with the unpoliteness of Mr. Dickinson and more mortified with his success in Congress, I wrote something like what has been published, but not exactly.

John Adams to James Warren.

Dear Sir: I am determined to write freely to you this time. A certain great fortune and piddling genius whose fame has been trumpeted so loudly has given a silly cast to our whole doings. We are between hawk and buzzard. We ought to have had in our hands a month ago the whole legislative, executive and judicial of the whole continent, and have completely modelled a constitution; to have raised a naval power and opened all our ports wide; to have arrested every friend of government on the continent and held them as hostages for the poor victims in Boston, and then opened the door as wide as possible for peace and reconciliation. After this, they might have petitioned, negotiated, addressed, etc., if they would. Is all this extravagant? Is it wild? Is it not the soundest policy? . . .

4. GEORGE III PROCLAIMS THE AMERICANS IN A STATE OF REBELLION

August 23, 1775

Whereas many of our subjects in divers parts of our Colonies and Plantations in North America, misled by dangerous and ill designing men, and forgetting the allegiance which they owe to the power that has protected and supported them; after various disorderly acts committed in disturbance of the publick peace, to the obstruction of lawful commerce, and to the oppression of our loyal subjects carrying on the same; have at length proceeded to open and avowed rebellion, by arraying themselves in a hostile manner, to withstand the execution of the law, and traitorously preparing, ordering and levying war against us: And whereas, there is reason to apprehend that such rebellion hath been much promoted and encouraged by the traitorous correspondence, counsels and comfort of divers wicked and desperate persons within this realm: To the end therefore, that none of our subjects may neglect or violate their duty through ignorance thereof, or through any doubt of the protection which the law will afford to their loyalty and zeal, we have thought fit, by and with the advice of our Privy Council, to issue our Royal Proclamation, hereby declaring, that not only all our Officers, civil and military, are obliged to exert their utmost endeavours to suppress such rebellion, and to bring the traitors to justice, but that all our subjects of this Realm, and the dominions thereunto belonging, are bound by law to be aiding and assisting in the suppression of such rebellion, and to disclose and make known all traitorous conspiracies and attempts against us, our crown and dignity; and we do accordingly strictly charge and command all our Officers, as well civil as military, and all others our obedient and loyal subjects, to use their utmost endeavours to withstand and suppress such rebellion, and to disclose and make known all treasons and traitorous conspiracies which they shall know to be against us, our crown and dignity; and for that purpose, that they transmit to one of our principal Secretaries of State, or other proper officer, due and full information of all persons who shall be found carrying on correspondence with, or in any manner or degree aiding or abetting the persons now in open arms and rebellion against our Government, within any of our Colonies and Plantations in North America, in order to bring to condign punishment the authors, perpetrators, and abettors of such traitorous designs.

Given at our Court at St. James's the twenty-third day of August, one thousand seven hundred and seventy-five, in the fifteenth year of our reign.

GOD save the KING.

5. PENNSYLVANIA INSTRUCTS AGAINST INDEPENDENCE

In the Assembly, November 9, 1775

The trust reposed in you is of such a nature and the modes of executing it may be so diversified in the course of your deliberations that it is scarcely possible to give you particular instructions respecting it.

We, therefore, in general direct that you, or any four of you, meet in Congress the delegates of the several colonies now assembled in this city and any such delegates as may meet in Congress next year; that you consult together on the present critical and alarming state of public affairs; that you exert your utmost endeavours to agree upon and recommend such measures as you shall judge to afford the best prospect of obtaining redress of American grievances, and restoring that union and harmony between Great Britain and the colonies so essential to the welfare and happiness of both countries.

Though the oppressive measures of the British Parliament and administration have compelled us to resist their violence by force of arms, yet we strictly enjoin you that you, in behalf of this colony, dissent from and utterly reject any propositions, should such be made, that may cause or lead to a separation from our mother country or a change of the form of this government.

You are directed to make report of your proceedings to this House.

III. THE TURN OF THE TIDE

The rejection of the Olive Branch Petition and the Proclamation of Rebellion persuaded many wavering Americans that separation was inevitable, and after November 1775 expressions of defiance more and more drowned out those voices calling for reconciliation. Doubtless the most important single influence in bringing about a change in popular sentiment was the publication, in January 1776, of Common Sense, "by an Englishman." The author was indeed an Englishman, scarcely a year out of England when he penned his remarkable pamphlet. Thomas Paine had arrived in Philadelphia the end of November 1774, and with characteristic impetuosity had thrown himself at once into the struggle for American rights, and made the American cause his own. As he himself wrote later, "When the country into which I had just set my foot was set on fire about my ears, it was time to stir. Those who had been long settled had something to defend; those who had just come had something to pursue; and the call and the concern was equal and universal. For in a country wherein all men were once adventurers, the difference of a few years in their arrival could make none in their rights."

An inveterate champion of the poor and the oppressed, Paine had written an essay pleading the cause of the Negro slave; this caught the attention of the versatile Benjamin Rush who urged the essayist to put his talents to a larger task—that of pleading the cause of independence itself. Nothing pleased Paine more, and the pamphlet, which Rush christened Common Sense, was published on January 9, 1776. Soon it was being reprinted everywhere in the colonies, in Boston and Salem, in Providence and Newport, in New York and in Charleston, and, with suitable omissions, in London itself; soon it was translated into German, into Dutch, into French. It caught the popular fancy as nothing before or since; it sold by the thousand; within three months, according to Paine, it had sold 120,000 copies; no other modern book has enjoyed a comparable sale, or a comparable influence, not Uncle Tom's Cabin, not Progress and Poverty. It was, as Moses Coit Tyler wrote, "precisely fitted to the hour, to the spot, to the passions of men. . . . It brushes away the tangles and cobwebs of technical debate, and flashes common sense upon the situation."

It was meant for plain men, in desperate danger, and desperately in earnest." Above all it presented arguments elementary and to be understood by all, in language that could be read by all; it appealed to the widespread popular sense of Americanism, of separation, of equalitarianism; it appealed to passion and to prejudice as well as to reason.

The influence of Common Sense was prodigious, and from all parts of the country came testimony of the revolution it was working in the minds and hearts of Americans. "I beg leave to let you know that I have read Common Sense," wrote Major Hawley to Elbridge Gerry, "and that every sentiment has sunk into my well prepared heart." Charles Lee wrote to Washington that "I never saw such a masterly, irresistible performance. . . . I own myself convinced by the arguments of the necessity of separation." And Washington himself wrote with characteristic reserve, that "I find Common Sense is working a powerful change in the minds of men."

We give here early expressions of sentiment for independence from Thomas Jefferson and General Nathanael Greene—expressions which could be matched in every colony; Benjamin Rush's account of how Common Sense came to be written; a series of excerpts from the pamphlet itself; and—as if to justify John Adams' ungenerous reflection that though it "probably converted some" it turned others away from independence—an outburst of dissent from that old curmudgeon, Landon Carter of Virginia.

1. "POWER TO DECLARE AND ASSERT A SEPARATION"

Thomas Jefferson to John Randolph.

Philadelphia, November 29, 1775

Dear Sir: . . . It is an immense misfortune to the whole Empire, to have a King of such a disposition at such a time. We are told, and every thing proves it true, that he is the bitterest enemy we have. His Minister is able, and that satisfies me that ignorance or wickedness somewhere controls him. In an earlier part of this contest, our petitions told him, that from our King there was but one appeal. The admonition was despised, and that appeal forced on us. To undo his Empire, he has but one more truth to learn: that, after Colonies have drawn the sword, there is but one step more they can take. That step is now pressed upon us, by the measures adopted, as if they were afraid we would not take it.

Believe me, dear Sir, there is not in the British Empire a man who more cordially loves a union with Great Britain than I do. But, by the God that made me, I will cease to exist before I yield to a connection on such terms as the British Parliament propose; and in this I think I speak the sentiments of America. We want neither inducement nor power, to declare and assert a separation. It is will alone which is wanting, and that is growing apace, under the fostering hand of our King. One bloody campaign will probably decide, everlastingly, our future course; I am sorry to find a bloody campaign is decided on. If our winds and waters should not combine to rescue their shores from slavery, and General Howe's re-enforcement should arrive in safety, we have hopes he will be inspired to come out of Boston and take another drubbing; and we must drub him soundly, before the sceptred tyrant will know we are not mere brutes, to crouch under his hand, and kiss the rod with which he deigns to scourge us.

Yours, &c.,

THOMAS JEFFERSON

2. GENERAL GREENE SAYS THE TIME FOR DELIBERATION IS OVER

Nathanael Greene to Samuel Ward, Member of the Congress from Rhode Island.

Camp on Prospect Hill, January 4, 1776

Dear Sir. . . . I am now to open my mind a little more freely. It hath been said that Canada in the late war was conquered in Germany. Who knows but that Britain may be in the present controversy! I take it for granted that France and Spain have made overtures to the Congress. Let us embrace them as brothers. We want not their land force in America: their navy we do. Their commerce will be mutually beneficial; they will doubtless pay the expense of their fleet, as it will be employed in protecting their own trade. Their military stores we want amazingly. Those will be articles of commerce. The Elector of Hanover has ordered his German troops to relieve the garrisons of Gibraltar and Port-Mahon; France will of consequence attack and subdue Hanover with little trouble. This will bring on a very severe war in Germany and turn Great Britain's attention that way. This may prevent immense expense and innumerable calamities in America.

Permit me, then, to recommend from the sincerity of my heart, ready at all times to bleed in my country's cause, a declaration of independence; and call upon the world, and the great God who governs it, to witness the necessity, propriety and rectitude thereof.

My worthy friend, the interests of mankind hang upon that truly worthy body of which you are a member. You stand the representatives not of America only, but of the whole world; the friends of liberty, and the supporters of the rights of Human Nature.

How will posterity, millions yet unborn, bless the memory of those brave patriots who are now hastening the consummation of Freedom, Truth and Religion! But want of decision renders wisdom in council insignificant, as want of power hath prevented us here from destroying the mercenary troops now in Boston. . . . How can we, then, startle at the idea of expense, when our whole property, our dearest connexions, our liberty, nay! life itself is at stake? Let us, therefore, act like men inspired with a resolution that nothing but the frowns of Heaven shall conquer us. It is no time for deliberation; the hour is swiftly rolling on when the plains of America will be deluged with human blood. Resolves, declarations and all the parade of heroism in words will not obtain a victory. Arms and ammunition are as necessary as men and must be had at the expense of everything short of Britain's claims. . . .

3. DR. RUSH STANDS GODFATHER TO Common Sense

About the year 1774 a certain Thomas Paine arrived in Philadelphia from England with a letter of recommendation from Dr. Franklin. . . . In one of my visits to Mr. Aitken's bookstore I met with Mr. Paine, and was introduced to him by Mr. Aitken. His conversation became at once interesting. I asked him to visit me, which he did a few days afterwards. Our subjects of conversation were political. I perceived with pleasure that he had realized the independence of the American colonies upon Great Britain, and that he considered the measure as necessary to bring the war to a speedy and successful issue.

I had before this interview put some thoughts upon paper upon this subject, and was preparing an address to the inhabitants of the colonies upon it. But I had hesitated as to the time, and I shuddered at the prospect of the consequence of its not being well received. I mentioned the subject to Mr. Paine, and asked him what he thought of writing a pamphlet upon it. I suggested to him that he had nothing to fear from the popular odium to which such a publication might expose him, for he could live anywhere, but that my profession and connections, which tied me to Philadelphia where a great majority of the citizens and some of my friends were hostile to a separation of our country from Great Britain, forbade me to come forward as a pioneer in that important controversy. He readily assented to the proposal, and from time to time he called at my house and read to me every chapter of the proposed pamphlet as he composed it. I recollect being charmed with a sentence in it which by accident, or perhaps by design, was not published. It was as follows: "Nothing can be conceived of more absurd than three millions of people flocking to the American shore every time a vessel arrives from England, to know what portion of liberty they shall enjoy."

When Mr. Paine had finished his pamphlet, I advised him to shew it to Dr. Franklin, Mr. Rittenhouse and Saml. Adams, all of whom I knew were decided friends to American independence. I mention these facts to refute a report that Mr. Paine was assisted in composing his pamphlet by one or more of the above gentlemen. They never saw it till it was written, and then only by my advice. I gave it at his request the title of "Common Sense."

—CORNER, ed., Autobiography of Benjamin Rush, pp. 113-114.

4. Common Sense

Some writers have so confounded society with government as to leave little or no distinction between them; whereas they are not only different, but have different origins. Society is produced by our wants and government by our wickedness; the former promotes our happiness positively by uniting our affections, the latter negatively by restraining our vices. The one encourages intercourse, the other creates distinctions. The first is a patron, the last a punisher.

Society in every state is a blessing, but government, even in its best state, is but a necessary evil; in its worst state an intolerable one; for when we suffer or are exposed to the same miseries by a government, which we might expect in a country without government, our calamity is heightened by reflecting that we furnish the means by which we suffer. Government, like dress, is the badge of lost innocence; the palaces of kings are built upon the ruins of the bowers of paradise. For were the impulses of conscience clear, uniform, and irresistibly obeyed, man would need no other lawgiver; but that not being the case, he finds it necessary to surrender up a part of his property to furnish means for the protection of the rest; and this he is induced to do by the same prudence which in every other case advises him out of two evils to choose the least. Wherefore, security being the true design and end of government, it unanswerably follows that whatever form thereof appears most likely to ensure it to us, with the least expense and greatest benefit, is preferable to all others. . . .

But there is another and greater distinction for which no truly natural or religious reason can be assigned, and that is the distinction of men into kings and subjects. Male and female are the distinctions of nature, good and bad the distinctions of heaven; but how a race of men came into the world so exalted above the rest, and distinguished like some new species, is worth inquiring into, and whether they are the means of happiness or of misery to mankind.

In the early ages of the world, according to the Scripture chronology there were no kings; the consequence of which was there were no wars; it is the pride of kings which throws mankind into confusion. Holland without a king hath enjoyed more peace for this last century than any of the monarchical governments in Europe. Antiquity favors the same remark; for the quiet and rural lives of the first patriarchs have a happy something in them, which vanishes when we come to the history of Jewish royalty.

Government by kings was first introduced into the world by the heathens, from whom the children of Israel copied the custom. It was the most prosperous invention the Devil ever set on foot for the promotion of idolatry. The heathens paid divine honors to their deceased kings, and the Christian world has improved on the plan by doing the same to their living ones. How impious is the title of sacred Majesty applied to a worm, who in the midst of his splendor is crumbling into dust!

As the exalting one man so greatly above the rest cannot be justified on the equal rights of nature, so neither can it be defended on the authority of Scripture; for the will of the Almighty, as declared by Gideon and the prophet Samuel, expressly disapproves of government by kings. . . .

To the evil of monarchy we have added that of hereditary succession; and as the first is a degradation and lessening of ourselves, so the second, claimed as a matter of right, is an insult and imposition on posterity. For all men being originally equals, no one by birth could have a right to set up his own family in perpetual preference to all others forever, and though himself might deserve some decent degree of honors of his contemporaries, yet his descendants might be far too unworthy to inherit them. One of the strongest natural proofs of the folly of hereditary right in kings, is that nature disapproves it, otherwise she would not so frequently turn it into ridicule by giving mankind an ass for a lion.

... Most wise men in their private sentiments have ever treated hereditary right with contempt; yet it is one of those evils which when once established is not easily removed; many submit from fear, others from superstition, and the most powerful part shares with the king the plunder of the rest.

This is supposing the present race of kings in the world to have had an honorable origin; whereas it is more than probable that, could we take off the dark covering of antiquity and trace them to their first rise, we should find the first of them nothing better than the principal ruffian of some restless gang, whose savage manners of pre-eminence in subtlety obtained him the title of chief among plunderers; and who by increasing in power, and extending his depredations, overawed the quiet and defenseless to purchase their safety by frequent contributions. Yet his electors could have no idea of giving hereditary right to his descendants, because such a perpetual exclusion of themselves was incompatible with the free and unrestrained principles they professed to live by. Wherefore, hereditary succession in the early ages of monarchy could not take place as a matter of claim, but as something casual or complemental; but as few or no records were extant in those days, and traditionary history stuffed with fables, it was very easy, after the lapse of a few generations, to trump up some superstitious tale conveniently timed, Mahomet-like, to cram hereditary right down the throats of the vulgar. Perhaps the disorders which threatened, or seemed to threaten, on the decease of a leader and the choice of a new one (for elections among ruffians could not be very orderly) induced many at first to favor hereditary pretensions; by which means it happened, as it hath happened since, that what at first was submitted to as a convenience was afterwards claimed as a right.

England, since the conquest, hath known some few good monarchs, but groaned beneath a much larger number of bad ones; yet no man in his senses can say that their claim under William the Conqueror is a very honorable one. A French bastard, landing with an armed banditti and establishing himself king of England against the consent of the natives, is in plain terms a very paltry rascally original. It certainly hath no divinity in it. However it is needless to spend much time in exposing the folly of hereditary right; if there are any so weak as to believe it, let them promiscuously worship the Ass and the Lion, and welcome. I shall neither copy their humility, nor disturb their devotion. ...

The nearer any government approaches to a republic, the less business there is for a king. It is somewhat difficult to find a proper name for the government of England. Sir William Meredith calls it a republic; but in its present state it is unworthy of the name, because the corrupt influence of the crown, by having all the places in its disposal, hath so effectually swallowed up the power, and eaten out the virtue of the House of Commons (the republican part in the constitution) that the government of England is nearly as monarchical as that of France or Spain. Men fall out with names without understanding them. For 'tis the republican and not the monarchical part of the constitution of England which Englishmen glory in, viz. the liberty of choosing a house of commons from out of their own body—and it is easy to see that when republican virtues fail, slavery ensues. Why is the constitution of England sickly but because monarchy hath poisoned the republic, the crown has engrossed the commons?

In England a king hath little more to do than to make war and give away places; which in plain terms is to impoverish the nation and set it together by the ears. A pretty business indeed for a man to be allowed eight hundred thousand sterling a year for, and worshipped into the bargain! Of more worth is one honest man to society, and in the sight of God, than all the crowned ruffians that ever lived. . . .

The sun never shined on a cause of greater worth. 'Tis not the affair of a city, a county, a province, or a kingdom; but of a continent—of at least one-eighth part of the habitable globe. 'Tis not the concern of a day, a year, or an age; posterity are virtually involved in the contest, and will be more or less affected even to the end of time by the proceedings now. Now is the seed-time of continental union, faith, and honor. The least fracture now will be like a name engraved with the point of a pin on the tender rind of a young oak; the wound would enlarge with the tree, and posterity read it in full grown characters.

By referring the matter from argument to arms, a new era for politics is struck—a new method of thinking has arisen. All plans, proposals, etc. prior to the nineteenth of April, i.e. to the commencement of hostilities, are like the almanacks of the last year; which though proper then, are superseded and useless now. Whatever was advanced by the advocates on either side of the question then, terminated in one and the same point, viz. a union with Great Britain; the only difference between the parties was the method of effecting it; the one proposing force, the other friendship; but it has so far happened that the first has failed, and the second has withdrawn her influence.

As much has been said of the advantages of reconciliation, which, like an agreeable dream, has passed away and left us as we were, it is but right that we should examine the contrary side of the argument, and inquire into some of the many material injuries which these colonies sustain, and always will sustain, by being connected with and dependent on Great Britain. To examine that connection and dependence on the principles of nature and common sense; to see what we have to trust to, if separated, and what we are to expect, if dependent.

I have heard it asserted by some, that as America has flourished under her former connection with Great Britain, the same connection is necessary towards her future happiness, and will always have the same effect. Nothing can be more fallacious than this kind of argument. We may as well assert that because a child has thrived upon milk, it is never to have meat, or that the first twenty years of our lives is to become a precedent for the next twenty. But even this is admitting more than is true; for I answer roundly that America would have flourished as much, and probably much more, had no European power taken any notice of her. The commerce by which she hath enriched herself are the necessities of life, and will always have a market while eating is the custom of Europe. . . .

But Britain is the parent country, say some. Then the more shame upon her conduct. Even brutes do not devour their young, nor savages make war upon their families; wherefore, the assertion, if true, turns to her reproach; but it happens not to be true, or only partly so, and the phrase parent or mother country hath been jesuitically adopted by the king and his parasites, with a low papistical design of gaining an unfair bias on the credulous weakness of our minds. Europe, and not England, is the parent country of America. This new world hath been the asylum for the persecuted lovers of civil and religious liberty from every part of Europe. Hither have they fled, not from the tender embraces of the mother, but from the cruelty of the monster; and it is so far true of England, that the same tyranny which drove the first emigrants from home pursues their descendants still. . . .

I challenge the warmest advocate for reconciliation to show a single advantage that this continent can reap by being connected with Great Britain. I repeat the challenge, not a single advantage is derived. Our corn will fetch its price in any market in Europe, and our imported goods must be paid for, buy them where we will.

But the injuries and disadvantages which we sustain by that connection are without number; and our duty to mankind at large, as well as to ourselves, instruct us to renounce the alliance: because any submission to, or dependence on, Great Britain, tends directly to involve this continent in European wars and quarrels, and set us at variance with nations who would otherwise seek our friendship, and against whom we have neither anger nor complaint. As Europe is our market for trade, we ought to form no partial connection with any part of it. 'Tis the true interest of America to steer clear of European contentions, which she never can do while by her dependence on Britain she is made the makeweight in the scale of British politics.

Europe is too thickly planted with kingdoms to be long at peace, and whenever a war breaks out between England and any foreign power, the trade of America goes to ruin, because of her connection with Britain. The next war may not turn out like the last, and should it not, the advocates for reconciliation now will be wishing for separation then, because neutrality in that case would be a safer convoy than a man of war. Everything that is right or reasonable pleads for separation. The blood of the slain, the weeping voice of nature cries, 'Tis time to part. Even the distance at which the Almighty hath placed England and America is a strong and natural proof that the authority of the one over the other was never the design of heaven. . . .

It is repugnant to reason, to the universal order of things, to all examples from former ages, to suppose that this continent can long remain subject to any external power. The most sanguine in Britain doth not think so. The utmost stretch of human wisdom cannot, at this time, compass a plan, short of separation, which can promise the continent even a year's security. Reconciliation is now a fallacious dream. Nature has deserted the connection, and art cannot supply her place. For, as Milton wisely expresses, "Never can true reconciliation grow where wounds of deadly hate have pierced so deep." . . .

As to government matters, it is not in the power of Britain to do this continent justice: the business of it will soon be too weighty and intricate to be managed with any tolerable degree of convenience by a power so distant from us, and so very ignorant of us; for if they cannot conquer us they cannot govern us. To be always running three or four thousand miles with a tale or a petition, waiting four or five months for an answer, which, when obtained, requires five or six more to explain it in, will in a few years be looked upon as folly and childishness. There was a time when it was proper, and there is a proper time for it to cease.

Small islands not capable of protecting themselves are the proper objects for government to take under their care; but there is something absurd in supposing a continent to be perpetually governed by an island. In no instance hath nature made the satellite larger than its primary planet; and as England and America, with respect to each other, reverse the common order of nature, it is evident that they belong to different systems. England to Europe: America to itself.

I am not induced by motives of pride, party, or resentment to espouse the doctrine of separation and independence; I am clearly, positively, and conscientiously persuaded that 'tis the true interest of this continent to be so; that everything short of that is mere patchwork, that it can afford no lasting felicity—that it is leaving the sword to our children, and shrinking back at a time when a little more, a little further, would have rendered this continent the glory of the earth. . . .

To talk of friendship with those in whom our reason forbids us to have faith, and our affections wounded through a thousand pores instruct us to detest, is madness and folly. Every day wears out the little remains of kindred between us and them; and can there be any reason to hope that as the relationship expires the affection will increase, or that we shall agree better when we have ten times more and greater concerns to quarrel over than ever?

Ye that tell us of harmony and reconciliation, can ye restore to us the time that is past? Can ye give to prostitution its former innocence? Neither can ye reconcile Britain and America. The last cord now is broken, the people of England are presenting addresses against us. There are injuries which nature cannot forgive; she would cease to be nature if she did. As well can the lover forgive the ravisher of his mistress, as the continent forgive the murderers of Britain. The Almighty hath implanted in us these inextinguishable feelings for good and wise purposes. They are the guardians of his image in our hearts. They distinguish us from the herd of common animals. The social compact would dissolve, and justice be extirpated from the earth, or have only a casual existence, were we callous to the touches of affection. The robber and the murderer would often escape unpunished, did not the injuries which our tempers sustain, provoke us into justice.

O ye that love mankind! Ye that dare oppose not only the tyranny but the tyrant, stand forth! Every spot of the old world is overrun with oppression. Freedom hath been hunted round the globe. Asia and Africa have long expelled her. Europe regards her like a stranger, and England hath given her warning to depart. O receive the fugitive, and prepare in time an asylum for mankind!

5. COLONEL CARTER CALLS IT "RASCALLY AND NONSENSICAL"

Diary of Colonel Landon Carter.

14 Wednesday, February, 1776. I see the Philadelphia pamphlet called Common Sense is much advertised in Philadelphia, and it is pretended to be written by an Englishman. If true, it is really much to be suspected of its secret intentions to fix an ill impression that the Americans are resolved not to be reconciled. And, indeed, that matter is encouraged under the most absurd arguments in the world. But I do suppose it to be the concealed topic of even some in the Congress, though they have so repeatedly contradicted, and though they have so severely reprehended Dr. Cooper some time ago, who actually charged them with a design of independency. I have written an answer to the Extracts published by Purdie, but as I do understand by the advertizements, though it is said to be in great demand, the new edition is to contain many additions, I would wait to see what they are; for the present impression of it is quite scandalous and disgraces the American cause much; which, as it is reasonably imagined to be supported by almighty mercy, I would not have its original justice, constitutional freedom, in the least sullied. . . .

24 Saturday, February, 1776. I was at Col. Tayloe's yesterday. Jones was there. At first he introduced the pamphlet called Common Sense, of Philadelphia production, as a most incomparable performance. I replied it was as rascally and nonsensical as possible, for it was only a sophisticated attempt to throw all men out of principles, and I showed him several parts, and it was as much the random of a despot as anything could be, for it declared every man a damned scoundrel that didn't think as he did, a coward and sycophant; and, after reducing mankind to mere brutish nature, that of an implacable and unforgiving temper, it tells us it is that image of God at first implanted in us. Just as if he who said "Father, forgive them," etc., in his expiring moments, intended to instance himself on the cross as an example of unforgiveness. This man writes for independency, and is under the necessity of stating an independence in man at his creation, when it is evident he must be a social being. . . .

29 Friday, March, 1776. . . . This R. H. is a prodigious admirer, if not partly a writer in the pamphlet Common Sense, which is so violent for an independency as to call every man who is not as absurdly implacable as he is a damned rascal and sycophant, that is, a coward. I could not help expressing my detestation at so brutish an author, who must, from the very appellation, be a tyrant in his own heart and, to be sure, a very fit person to head an aristocratic power which must generate from this independency reduced into ever so formal a republican show, and this, no doubt, the lowest in oratory has sunk deep in his own mind. But if Landon will go to town, I will write by him and strive to disappoint these artists, even in revenge.

I was yesterday told that one Robinson, from Philadelphia, has told somebody that independency was thrice proposed in the Congress, but it was each time thrown out by a vast majority; and that to the northward nine-tenths of the people are violently against it. What an opprobrium must this be to these gentlemen of the Congress who not only denied their tendency to independency when they were charged with it by writers, but have over and over again told the whole British world that they only desired to be re-instated as they were in 1763!

13 Saturday, April 1776. . . I begin now more and more to see that the pamphlet called Common Sense, supporting independency, is written by a member of the Congress; for every now and then, when it is answered to the northward, some one or another, perhaps member of the same club, is sure to threaten those who write against it with the terrors of disuniting the Colonies and offending the majesty of the people of particular places. This is comical. Common Sense has no uneasiness of this sort, though he offends against even sense and truth and even against his own position—nay, though he advances new and dangerous doctrines to the peace and happiness of every society. And yet the creature boasts that he is not or has not been answered.

—CARTER, "Diary," William & Mary Quarterly, XVI, 149-152, 258-264.

IV. INDEPENDENCE LIKE A TORRENT

By spring of 1776 the current was flowing swiftly toward independence. Washington's victory before Boston explained, in part, the new note of confidence, and so, too, the public reaction to Common Sense. But most important, in all probability, was the growing realization that the policy of George III left the colonists no feasible alternative. In any event after mid-February Congress took one decisive step after another. On February 18 it authorized privateers; on February 26 it placed an embargo on exports to Britain and the British West Indies; on March 3 it sent Silas Deane to France to negotiate for aid, and instructed him to assure Vergennes "that there was a great appearance that the colonies would come to a total separation"; on March 14 it voted to disarm all Loyalists; on April 6 it opened American ports to the trade of all nations except Britain.

Perhaps even more important was the swift change of sentiment in the states. Almost everywhere, except in the Middle States, the radicals succeeded in getting control of the machinery of government, and committing their states to independence. As early as March 26 South Carolina adopted a constitution which by implication, at least, repudiated the royal tie. On April 12 North Carolina took the bold step of instructing her delegates to support independence, and early in May Rhode Island followed her lead.

Virginia and Massachusetts had precipitated the issue with the mother country; now at last both embraced the logical conclusion of their policies and their arguments, and committed themselves to independence. On May 10 the Provisional Congress of Massachusetts voted, with characteristic concern for democratic processes, to sound out opinion in the towns on the question of independence. All through May and June the freemen of Massachusetts met in their town meetings, solemnly debated the great question, and voted for independence. Here and there was heard a dissenting or a cautious voice, but on the whole it was clear that in Massachusetts public opinion was well ahead of official opinion on this issue.

Even more important was the decision in Virginia. There by his short-sighted and uncompromising tactics, Lord Dunmore had antagonized almost all moderates and waverers, and when a Convention met at Williamsburg on May 6, support for independence was well-nigh unanimous. The question was not, in fact, whether the Convention would vote for separation, but how it would do so: by independent act, or by instructing delegates in Congress to act with other states. Curiously enough it was the moderate Edmund Pendleton who proposed to move decisively for independence, and the fiery Patrick Henry who now wanted to wait on the action of sister states and on foreign aid. On May 15 Pendleton's resolution calling on the Congress to vote independence passed unanimously. That night the old capital was illuminated while enthusiastic Patriots rang bells, fired salutes, hauled down the British flag and raised a "Union Flag of the American States."

The Virginia Resolutions did not reach Philadelphia until May 27, but meantime Congress itself had taken a step which John Adams, at least, thought decisive. Early in May, Adams, now hot for action, had introduced a resolution instructing every colony to adopt such government "as shall best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general." This resolution was adopted on May 10; five days later—just as Virginia was acting—Congress adopted a preamble to the resolution which was a sort of trial run on independence. So at least said Adams who wrote exultantly to his wife that "Great Britain has at last driven America to the last step, a complete separation from her; a total absolute independence, not only of her Parliament, but of her Crown, for such is the amount of the resolve."

1. "LET US UNDER GOD TRUST OUR CAUSE TO THE SWORD"

Samuel Adams to James Warren.

Philadelphia, April 16, 1776

My Dear Sir,—I have not yet congratulated you on the unexpected and happy change of our affairs in the removal of the Rebel army from Boston. Our worthy friend Major Hawley in his letter to me declines giving me joy on this occasion. He thinks it best to put off the ceremony till the Congress shall proclaim Independency. In my opinion, however, it becomes us to rejoice and religiously to acknowledge the goodness of the Supreme Being who in this instance hath signally appeared for us. Our countrymen are too wise to suffer this favorable event to put them off their guard. They will fortify the harbour of Boston, still defend the sea coasts and keep the military spirit universally alive.

I perfectly agree with the Major in his opinion of the necessity of proclaiming Independency. The salvation of this country depends upon its being done speedily. I am anxious to have it done. Every day's delay tries my patience. I can give you not the least color of a reason why it is not done. We are told that Commissioners are coming out to offer us such terms of reconciliation as we may with safety accept of. Why then should we shut the door? This is all amusement. I am exceedingly disgusted when I hear it mentioned. Experience should teach us to pay no regard to it. We know that it has been the constant practice of the King and his junto ever since this struggle began to endeavor to make us believe their designs were pacifick, while they have been meditating the most destructive plans, and they insult our understandings by attempting thus to impose upon us even while they are putting these plans into execution.

Can the King repeal or dispense with Acts of Parliament? Would he repeal the detestable Acts which we have complained of, if it was in his power? Did he ever show a disposition to do acts of justice and redress the grievances of his subjects? Why then do gentlemen expect it? They do not scruple to own that he is a tyrant; are they then willing to be his slaves and dependent upon a nation so lost to all sense of liberty and virtue as to enable and encourage him to act the tyrant? This has been done by the British nation against the remonstrances of common honesty and common sense. They are now doing it and will continue to do it, until we break the band of connection and publicly avow an independence.

It is folly for us to suffer ourselves any longer to be amused. Reconciliation upon reasonable terms is no part of their plan: the only alternative is independence or slavery. Their designs still are as they ever have been to subjugate us. Our unalterable resolution should be to be free. They have attempted to subdue us by force, but God be praised! in vain. Their arts may be more dangerous than their arms. Let us then renounce all treaty with them upon any score but that of total separation, and under God trust our cause to our swords.

One of our moderate prudent Whigs would be startled at what I now write—I do not correspond with such kind of men. You know I never overmuch admired them. Their moderation has brought us to this pass, and if they were to be regarded, they would continue the conflict a century. There are such moderate men here, but their principles are daily going out of fashion. The child Independence is now struggling for birth. I trust that in a short time it will be brought forth and in spite of Pharaoh all America shall hail the dignified stranger.

2. "FOR GOD'S SAKE LET THERE BE A FULL REVOLUTION"

Joseph Hawley to Elbridge Gerry.

Watertown, May 1, 1776

My Dear Sir,

The tories dread a declaration of independency and a course of conduct on that plan more than death. They console themselves with a belief that the southern colonies will not accede to it. My hand and heart is full of it. There will be no abiding union without it. When the colonies come to be pressed with taxes they will divide and crumble to pieces. Will a government stand on recommendations? They will not. Can we subsist, and support our trading people without trade? It appears more and more every day in the country and the army that we cannot. Nay, without a real continental government our army will overrun us, and people will by and by, sooner than you may be aware of, call for their old constitutions, and as they did in England after Cromwell's death, call in Charles the Second. For God's sake let there be a full revolution, or all has been done in vain. Independence and a well planned continental government will save us. God bless you. Amen and amen. J.H.

—AUSTIN, Life of Elbridge Gerry, pp. 175-176.

3. "EVERY DAY ROLLS IN UPON US INDEPENDENCE LIKE A TORRENT"

John Adams to James Warren.

May 20, 1776

My Dear Sir,—Every post and every day rolls in upon us Independence like a torrent. The delegates from Georgia made their appearance this day in Congress with unlimited powers and these gentlemen themselves are very firm. South Carolina has erected her government and given her delegates ample powers, and they are firm enough. North Carolina have given theirs full powers, after repealing an instruction given last August against Confederation and Independence. This days post has brought a multitude of letters from Virginia, all of which breath the same spirit. They agree they shall institute a government—all are agreed in this they say. Here are four Colonies to the southward who are perfectly agreed now with the four to the northward. Five in the middle are not yet quite so ripe; but they are very near it. I expect that New York will come to a fresh election of delegates in the course of this week, give them full powers, and determine to institute a government.

The Convention of New Jersey is about meeting and will assume a government.

Pennsylvania Assembly meets this day and it is said will repeal their instruction to their delegates which has made them so exceedingly obnoxious to America in general, and their own constituents in particular.

We have had an entertaining manœuvre this morning in the State House yard. The Committee of the City summoned a meeting at nine o'clock in the State House yard to consider of the Resolve of Congress of the fifteenth instant. The weather was very rainy, and the meeting was in the open air like the Comitia of the Romans, a stage was erected extempore for the moderator and the few orators to ascend—Col. Roberdeau was the Moderator; Col. McKean, Col. Cadwallader and Col. Matlack the principal orators. It was the very first town meeting I ever saw in Philadelphia and it was conducted with great order, decency and propriety.

The first step taken was this: the Moderator produced the Resolve of Congress of the 15th inst. and read it with a loud stentorian voice that might be heard a quarter of a mile. "Whereas his Brittanic Majesty, etc." As soon as this was read, the multitude, several thousands, some say, tho so wett, rended the welkin with three cheers, hatts flying as usual, etc.

Then a number of resolutions were produced, and moved, and determined with great unanimity. These resolutions I will send you as soon as published. The drift of the whole was that the Assembly was not a body properly constituted, authorized, and qualified to carry the resolve for instituting a new government into execution and therefore that a Convention should be called. And at last they voted to support and defend the measure of a Convention, at the utmost hazard and at all events, etc.

The Delaware Government, generally, is of the same opinion with the best Americans, very orthodox in their faith and very exemplary in their practice. Maryland remains to be mentioned. That is so eccentric a Colony—sometimes so hot, sometimes so cold; now so high, then so low—that I know not what to say about it or to expect from it. I have often wished it could exchange places with Halifax. When they get agoing I expect some wild extravagant flight or other from it. To be sure they must go beyond every body else when they begin to go.

Thus I have rambled through the continent, and you will perceive by this state of it, that we can't be very remote from the most decisive measures and the most critical events. What do you think must be my sensations when I see the Congress now daily passing resolutions which I most earnestly pressed for against wind and tide twelve months ago? and which I have not omitted to labour for a month together from that time to this? What do you think must be my reflections when I see the Farmer Dickinson himself now confessing the falsehood of all his prophecies, and the truth of mine, and confessing himself now for instituting governments, forming a Continental Constitution, making alliances with foreigners, opening ports and all that—and confessing that the defence of the Colonies and preparations for defence have been neglected, in consequence of fond delusive hopes and deceitfull expectations?

I assure you this is no gratification of my vanity.

The gloomy prospect of carnage and devastation that now presents itself in every part of the continent, and which has been in the most express and decisive, nay dogmatical terms foretold by me a thousand times, is too affecting to give me pleasure. It moves my keenest indignation. Yet I dare not hint at these things for I hate to give pain to gentlemen whom I believe sufficiently punished by their own reflections.

4. WILL THE TOWNS SUPPORT INDEPENDENCE?

Massachusetts House of Representatives to the Towns.

May 10, 1776

Resolved, As the opinion of this House that the inhabitants of each Town in this Colony ought, in full meeting warned for that purpose, to advise the person or persons who shall be chosen to represent them in the next General Court whether that, if the honourable Congress should, for the safety of the said Colony, declare them independent of the Kingdom of Great Britain, they, the said inhabitants, will solemnly engage, with their lives and fortunes, to support them in the measure.

5. MASSACHUSETTS TOWN MEETINGS CALL FOR INDEPENDENCE

A. MALDEN DECLARES WHY INDEPENDENCE IS NECESSARY

At a legal meeting of the inhabitants of the town of Malden (Mass.), May 27, 1776, it was voted unanimously that the following instructions be given to their representative, viz. to Mr. Ezra Sargeant.

Sir—A resolution of the hon. house of representatives, calling upon the several towns in this colony to express their minds in respect to the important question of American independence, is the occasion of our now instructing you. The time was, sir, when we loved the king and the people of Great Britain with an affection truly filial; we felt ourselves interested in their glory; we shared in their joys and sorrows; we cheerfully poured the fruit of all our labours into the lap of our mother country, and without reluctance expended our blood and our treasure in their cause.

These were our sentiments toward Great Britain while she continued to act the part of a parent state; we felt ourselves happy in our connection with her, nor wished it to be dissolved; but our sentiments are altered, it is now the ardent wish of our soul that America may become a free and independent state.

A sense of unprovoked injuries will arouse the resentment of the most peaceful. Such injuries these colonies have received from Britain. Unjustifiable claims have been made by the king and his minions to tax us without our consent; these claims have been prosecuted in a manner cruel and unjust to the highest degree. The frantic policy of administration hath induced them to send fleets and armies to America; that, by depriving us of our trade, and cutting the throats of our brethren, they might awe us into submission, and erect a system of despotism in America, which should so far enlarge the influence of the crown as to enable it to rivet their shackles upon the people of Great Britain.

This plan was brought to a crisis upon the ever memorable nineteenth of April. We remember the fatal day! the expiring groans of our countrymen yet vibrate on our ears! and we now behold the flames of their peaceful dwellings ascending to Heaven! we hear their blood crying to us from the ground for vengeance! charging us, as we value the peace of their names, to have no further connection with—who can unfeelingly hear of the slaughter of—and composedly sleep with their blood upon his soul. The manner in which the war has been prosecuted hath confirmed us in these sentiments; piracy and murder, robbery and breach of faith, have been conspicuous in the conduct of the king's troops: defenceless towns have been attacked and destroyed: the ruins of Charlestown, which are daily in our view, daily reminds us of this: the cries of the widow and the orphan demand our attention; they demand that the hand of pity should wipe the tear from their eye, and that the sword of their country should avenge their wrongs. We long entertained hope that the spirit of the British nation would once more induce them to assert their own and our rights, and bring to condign punishment the elevated villains who have trampled upon the sacred rights of men and affronted the majesty of the people. We hoped in vain; they have lost their love of freedom, they have lost their spirit of just resentment; we therefore renounce with disdain our connexion with a kingdom of slaves; we bid a final adieu to Britain.

Could an accommodation now be effected, we have reason to think that it would be fatal to the liberties of America; we should soon catch the contagion of venality and dissipation, which hath led Britains to lawless domination. Were we placed in the situation we were in 1763; were the powers of appointing to offices, and commanding the militia, in the hands of governors, our arts, trade and manufactures would be cramped; nay, more than this, the life of every man who has been active in the cause of his country would be endangered.

For these reasons, as well as many others which might be produced, we are confirmed in the opinion that the present age would be deficient in their duty to God, their posterity and themselves, if they do not establish an American republic. This is the only form of government which we wish to see established; for we can never be willingly subject to any other King than he who, being possessed of infinite wisdom, goodness and rectitude, is alone fit to possess unlimited power.

—MASSACHUSETTS ARCHIVES, CLVI, 101.

B. SCITUATE FREEMEN PLEDGE THEIR LIVES TO INDEPENDENCE

Instructions to Nathan Cushing, Esqr., Representative of the Town of Scituate.

June 4th, 1776

The Inhabitants of this Town being called together on the recommendation of our General Assembly to Signify our minds on the great point of Independence on Great-Britain, think fit to Instruct you on that head.

The Ministry of that Kingdom, having formed a design of Subjecting the Colonies to a distant, external and absolute power in all Cases whatsoever, wherein the Colonies have not, nor in the nature of things can have any share by Representation, have, for a course of years past, exerted their utmost Art and Endeavours to put the same plan, so destructive to both Countries, into Execution. But finding it, through the noble and virtuous opposition of the Sons of Freedom, impracticable by means of mere political Artifice and Corruption, they have at length had a fatal Recourse to a Standing Army, so repugnant to the nature of a free Government, to fire and Sword, to Bloodshed and Devastation, calling in the aid of foreign Troops, as well as endeavouring to stir up the Savages of the wilderness to exercise their barbarities upon us, being determined, by all appearances, if practicable, to extirpate the Americans from the face of the Earth, unless they tamely resign the Rights of humanity, and to repeople this once happy Country with the ready Sons of Vassalage, if such can be found.

We therefor, Apprehending such a subjection utterly inconsistent with the just rights and blessings of Society, unanimously Instruct you to endeavour that our Delegates in Congress be informed, in case that Representative Body of the Continent should think fit to declare the Colonies Independent of Great Britain, of our readiness and determination to assist with our Lives and Fortunes in Support of that, we apprehend, necessary Measure.

—MASSACHUSETTS ARCHIVES, CLVI, 103.

C. NATICK FINDS IMPROPRIETY IN COLONIAL SUBORDINATION

At a Meeting of the Town of Natick, June 20th, 1776

. . . It was unanimously voted that in consideration of the many Acts of the brittish Parliament passed at diverse Sessions of the same within about 13 years past, relating to said Colonies especially those within the two or three last years, by which every Idea of Moderation, Justice, Humanity and Christianity are intirely laid aside and those principles and measures adopted and pursued which would disgrace the most unlightened and uncivilized Tribe of aboriginal natives in the most interior parts of this extensive continent—And also in consideration of the glaring Impropriety, Incapacity and fatal Tendency of any State whatever at the Distance of 3000 Miles to legislate for these colonies, which at the same Time are so numerous, so knowing and capable of Legislating, or to have a negative upon those Laws which they in their respective assemblies, and by their united Representatives in general Congress shall from Time to Time enact and establish for themselves—and upon diverse other considerations, which for Brevity sake we omit to mention—We the Inhabitants of Natick in Town Meeting assembled Do hereby declare . . . that should the honorable continental Congress declare these American Colonies independent of the Kingdom of Great Brittain we will with our Lives and fortunes join with the other Inhabitants of this Colony and with those of the other Colonies in supporting them in said Measure which we look upon to be both important and necessary and which, if we may be permitted to suggest our opinion, the sooner it is come into we shall have fewer Difficulties to conflict with and the grand objects of peace, Liberty and Safety will be more likely speedily to be restored and established in our once happy land.

—MASSACHUSETTS ARCHIVES, CLVI, 113.

6. VIRGINIA RESOLVES FOR INDEPENDENCE

In Convention, May the 15th 1776

Present One Hundred and Twelve Members

Forasmuch as all the endeavours of the United Colonies by the most decent representations and petitions to the king and parliament of Great Britain to restore peace and security to America under the British government and a re-union with that people upon just and liberal terms instead of a redress of grievances have produced from an imperious and vindictive administration increased insult, oppression and a vigorous attempt to effect our total destruction. By a late act, all these colonies are declared to be in rebellion and out of the protection of the British crown, our properties subjected to confiscation, our people, when captivated, compelled to join in the murder and plunder of their relations and countrymen, and all former rapine and oppression of Americans declared legal and just. Fleets and armies are raised, and the aid of foreign troops engaged to assist these destructive purposes. The king's representative in this colony hath not only withheld all the powers of government from operating for our safety, but, having retired on board an armed ship, is carrying on a piratical and savage war against us, tempting our slaves by every artifice to resort to him, and training and employing them against their masters. In this state of extreme danger, we have no alternative left but an abject submission to the will of those over-bearing tyrants, or a total separation from the crown and government of Great Britain, uniting and exerting the strength of all America for defence, and forming alliances with foreign powers for commerce and aid in war:

Wherefore, appealing to the SEARCHER OF HEARTS for the sincerity of former declarations, expressing our desire to preserve the connection with that nation, and that we are driven from that inclination by their wicked councils, and the eternal laws of self-preservation:

RESOLVED unanimously, that the delegates appointed to represent this colony in General Congress be instructed to propose to that respectable body to declare the United Colonies free and independent states, absolved from all allegiance to, or dependence upon, the crown or parliament of Great Britain; and that they give the assent of this colony to such declaration, and to whatever measures may be thought proper and necessary by the Congress for forming foreign alliances and a confederation of the colonies, at such time, and in such manner, as to them shall seem best; Provided, that the power of forming government for, and the regulations of the internal concerns of each colony, be left to the respective colonial legislatures.

RESOLVED unanimously, that a committee be appointed to prepare a Declaration of Rights, and such a plan of government as will be most likely to maintain peace and order in this colony, and secure substantial and equal liberty to the people.

JOHN TAXEWELL

EDMD. PENDLETON P.

Clerk of the Convention

7. RECOMMENDATIONS BY THE CONGRESS TO ESTABLISH NEW GOVERNMENTS

In Congress, May 15, 1776

Whereas his Britannick Majesty, in conjunction with the Lords and Commons of Great Britain, has, by a late act of Parliament, excluded the inhabitants of these United Colonies from the protection of his Crown: And whereas no answer whatever to the humble petition of the Colonies for redress of grievances and reconciliation with Great Britain has been, or is likely to be, given; but the whole force of that Kingdom, aided by foreign mercenaries, is to be exerted for the destruction of the good people of these Colonies: And whereas it appears absolutely irreconcilable to reason and good conscience for the people of these colonies now to take the oaths and affirmations necessary for the support of any Government under the Crown of Great Britain; and it is necessary that the exercise of every kind of authority under the said Crown should be totally suppressed, and all the powers of Government exerted under the authority of the people of the Colonies, for the preservation of internal peace, virtue, and good order, as well as for the defence of their lives, liberties and properties, against the hostile invasions and cruel depredations of their enemies: Therefore

Resolved, That it be recommended to the respective Assemblies and Conventions of the United Colonies, where no Government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs has been hitherto established, to adopt such Government as shall, in the opinion of the Representatives of the People, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular and America in general.

By Order of Congress, JOHN HANCOCK, President

—FORCE, American Archives, 4th Series, VI, 466.

V. THE FINAL DEBATE

On June 7 Richard Henry Lee of Virginia introduced the momentous resolution calling for a declaration of independence, foreign alliances, and a confederation of the American states. This bold proposal precipitated a warm debate which made clear that though the majority of the delegations in Congress were ready for independence, the Middle States "were not yet ripe for bidding adieu to the British connection." It was therefore agreed to postpone action for three weeks; meantime a committee was appointed to draft the necessary declaration. The three-week delay was fatal to the temporizers. On June 14 both Delaware and Connecticut instructed for independence; the next day New Hampshire followed. On that day, too, New Jersey ousted the Loyalist Governor Franklin, and a few days later sent a new delegation to the Congress, authorized to vote independence. And on June 28 Maryland swung into line. The barrier of the Middle Colonies had been broken.

The first day of July, Congress took up the first Lee resolution. There was a stirring debate; Dickinson spoke eloquently for delay; Adams and—apparently—Richard Henry Lee urged the necessity of action. The vote that day disappointed the radicals. South Carolina, surprisingly enough, voted against independence, and so did Pennsylvania; Delaware was divided, and New York, then in the throes of reorganizing itself, refrained from action. Nine to four was not a satisfactory vote for so momentous an issue. That night saw the radicals working with herculean energy to intimidate the intransigents and convert the moderates. Riding all night, Caesar Rodney covered the eighty miles between Dover and Philadelphia in time to swing the vote of Delaware to independence. The delegates from South Carolina changed their minds. Two Pennsylvania dissidents, Dickinson and Robert Morris, stayed away, James Wilson changed his mind, or his vote, and Pennsylvania moved at last into the ranks of independence. That left only New York, and New York courteously refrained from casting a vote. So on July 2 the Congress could vote unanimously for independence. The decree had indeed gone forth.

John Adams and Jefferson are the best historians of independence, and here as in the next section we allow them to tell the story. Jefferson's record of the great debate of June 1776 is, according to Julian Boyd, "the best single source of information concerning the movement toward independence." Just when it was written we do not know, but possibly in the late summer or early fall of 1776, and certainly not later than the end of the war. Its authenticity is, in any event, beyond dispute. Unhappily Jefferson, usually a voluminous and a magnificent letter writer, appears to have written very few letters during June, and those of a purely routine character; happily John Adams, equally voluminous and perhaps more entertaining, sent out a stream of letters which tell us something of what was happening and a great deal about that irresistible figure, John Adams.

1. RICHARD HENRY LEE INTRODUCES SOME FATEFUL RESOLUTIONS

June 7, 1776

RESOLVED, That these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain is, and ought to be totally dissolved.

That it is expedient forthwith to take the most effectual measures for forming foreign Alliances.

That a plan of confederation be prepared and transmitted to the respective Colonies for their consideration and approbation.

—Journals of the Continental Congress, V, 425.

2. "THE SENSIBLE PART OF THE HOUSE OPPOSED THE MOTION"

Edward Rutledge to John Jay.

June 8, 1776

The Congress sat till 7 o'clock this evening in consequence of a motion of Richard Henry Lee's rendering ourselves a free and independent state. The sensible part of the house opposed the motion—they had no objection to forming a scheme of a treaty which they would send to France by proper persons and uniting this continent by a confederacy. They saw no wisdom in a declaration of independence, nor any other purpose to be enforced by it but placing ourselves in the power of those with whom we mean to treat, giving our enemy notice of our intentions before we had taken any steps to execute them and thereby enabling them to counteract us in our intentions and rendering ourselves ridiculous in the eyes of foreign powers by attempting to bring them into an union with us before we had united with each other. For daily experience evinces that the inhabitants of every colony consider themselves at liberty to do as they please upon almost every occasion. And a man must have the impudence of a New Englander to propose in our present disjointed state any treaty (honourable to us) to a nation now at peace. No reason could be assigned for pressing into this measure but the reason of every madman, a show of our spirit.

The event, however, was that the question was postponed; it is to be renewed on Monday when I mean to move that it should be postponed for 3 weeks or months. In the meantime, the plan of confederation and the scheme of treaty may go on. I don't know whether I shall succeed in this motion; I think not, it is at least doubtful. However, I must do what is right in my own eyes, and consequences must take care of themselves.

I wish you had been here. The whole argument was sustained on one side by Robert Livingston, James Wilson, John Dickinson and myself and by the power of all New England, Virginia and Georgia at the other.

3. JEFFERSON RECORDS THE GREAT DEBATE OVER INDEPENDENCE

Notes of Proceedings in the Continental Congress.

June 7 to August 1, 1776

Friday, June 7, 1776, the Delegates from Virginia moved in obedience to instructions from their constituents that the Congress should declare that these United colonies are & of right ought to be free & independent states, that they are absolved from all allegiance to the British crown, and that all political connection between them and the state of Great Britain is & ought to be totally dissolved; that measures should be immediately taken for procuring the assistance of foreign powers, and a Confederation be formed to bind the colonies more closely together.

The house being obliged to attend at that time to some other business, the proposition was referred to the next day when the members were ordered to attend punctually at ten o'clock.

Saturday June 8, they proceeded to take it into consideration and referred it to a committee of the whole, into which they immediately resolved themselves, and passed that day & Monday the 10th in debating on the subject.

It was argued by Wilson, Robert R. Livingston, E. Rutledge, Dickinson and others:

That tho' they were friends to the measures themselves, and saw the impossibility that we should ever again be united with Gr. Britain, yet they were against adopting them at this time:

That the conduct we had formerly observed was wise & proper now, of deferring to take any capital step till the voice of the people drove us into it:

That they were our power, & without them our declarations could not be carried into effect:

That the people of the middle colonies (Maryland, Delaware, Pennsylv., the Jersies & N. York) were not yet ripe for bidding adieu to British connection but that they were fast ripening & in a short time would join in the general voice of America:

That the resolution entered into by this house on the 15th of May for suppressing the exercise of all powers derived from the crown, had shewn, by the ferment into which it had thrown these middle colonies, that they had not yet accomodated their minds to a separation from the mother country:

That some of them had expressly forbidden their delegates to consent to such a declaration, and others had given no instructions, & consequently no powers, to give such consent:

That if the delegates of any particular colony had no power to declare such colony independent, certain they were the others could not declare it for them; the colonies as yet being perfectly independent of each other:

That the assembly of Pennsylvania was now sitting above stairs, their convention would sit within a few days, the convention of New York was now sitting, & those of the Jersies and Delaware counties would meet on the Monday following & it was probable these bodies would take up the question of Independence & would declare to their delegates the voice of their state:

That if such a declaration should now be agreed to, these delegates must retire & possibly their colonies might secede from the Union:

That such a secession would weaken us more than could be compensated by any foreign alliance:

That in the event of such a division, foreign powers would either refuse to join themselves to our fortunes, or having us so much in their power as that desperate declaration would place us, they would insist on terms proportionably more hard & prejudicial:

That we had little reason to expect an alliance with those to whom alone as yet we had cast our eyes:

That France & Spain had reason to be jealous of that rising power which would one day certainly strip them of all their American possessions:

That it was more likely they should form a connection with the British court, who, if they should find themselves unable otherwise to extricate themselves from their difficulties, would agree to a partition of our territories, restoring Canada to France, & the Floridas to Spain, to accomplish for themselves a recovery of these colonies:

That it would not be long before we should receive certain information of the disposition of the French court, from the agent whom we had sent to Paris for that purpose:

That if this disposition should be favorable, by waiting the event of the present campaign, which we all hope would be successful, we should have reason to expect an alliance on better terms:

That this would in fact work no delay of any effectual aid from such ally, as, from the advance of the season & distance of our situation, it was impossible we could receive any assistance during this campaign:

That it was prudent to fix among ourselves the terms on which we would form an alliance, before we declared we would form one at all events:

And that if these were agreed on & our Declaration of Independence ready by the time our Ambassadors should be prepared to sail, it would be as well, as to go into that Declaration at this day:

On the other side it was urged by J. Adams, Wythe and others:

That no gentleman had argued against the policy of the right of separation from Britain, nor had supposed it possible we should ever renew our connection: that they had only opposed it's being now declared:

That the question was not whether, by a declaration of independence, we should make ourselves what we are not; but whether we should declare a fact which already exists:

That as to the people or parliament of England, we had always been independent of them, their restraints on our trade deriving efficacy from our acquiescence only & not from any rights they possessed of imposing them, & that so far our connection had been federal only, & was now dissolved by the commencement of hostilities:

That as to the king, we had bound to him by allegiance, but that this bond was now dissolved by his assent to the late act of parliament, by which he declares us out of his protection; and by his levying war on us, a fact which had long ago proved us out of his protection; it being a certain position in law that allegiance & protection are reciprocal, the one ceasing when the other is withdrawn:

That James the II^d. never declared the people of England out of his protection yet his action proved it & parliament declared it:

No delegates then can be denied, or ever want, a power of declaring an existent truth:

That the delegates from the Delaware counties having declared their constituents ready to join, there are only two colonies, Pennsylvania & Maryland whose delegates are absolutely tied up, and that these had by their instructions only reserved a right of confirming or rejecting the measure:

That the instructions from Pennsylvania might be accounted for from the times in which they were drawn, near a twelvemonth ago, since which the face of affairs has totally changed:

That within that time it had become apparent that Britain was determined to accept nothing less than a carte blanche, and that the king's answer to the Lord Mayor, Alderman & common council of London, which had come to hand four days ago, must have satisfied every one of this point:

That the people wait for us to lead the way:

That they are in favour of the measure, tho' the instructions given by some of their representatives are not:

That the voice of the representatives is not always consonant with the voice of the people, and that this is remarkably the case in these middle colonies:

That the effect of the resolution of the 15th. of May has proved this, which, raising the murmurs of some in the colonies of Pennsylvania & Maryland, called forth the opposing voice of the freer part of the people, & proved them to be the majority, even in these colonies:

That the backwardness of these two colonies might be ascribed partly to the influence of proprietary power & connections, & partly to their having not yet been attacked by the enemy:

That these causes were not likely to be soon removed, as there seemed no probability that the enemy would make either of these the seat of this summer's war:

That it would be in vain to wait either weeks or months for perfect unanimity, since it was impossible that all men should ever become of one sentiment on any question:

That the conduct of some colonies from the beginning of this contest, had given reason to suspect it was their settled policy to keep in the rear of the confederacy, that their particular prospect might be better even in the worst event:

That therefore it was necessary for those colonies who had thrown themselves forward & hazarded all from the beginning, to come forward now also, and put all again to their own hazard;

That the history of the Dutch revolution, of whom three states only confederated at first proved that a secession of some colonies would not be so dangerous as some apprehended:

That a declaration of Independence alone could render it consistent with European delicacy for European powers to treat with us, or even to receive an Ambassador from us:

That till this they would not receive our vessels into their ports, nor acknowledge the adjudications of our courts of Admiralty to be legitimate, in cases of capture of British vessels:

That tho' France & Spain may be jealous of our rising power, they must think it will be much more formidable with the addition of Great Britain; and will therefore see it their interest to prevent a coalition; but should they refuse, we shall be but where we are; whereas without trying we shall never know whether they will aid us or not:

That the present campaign may be unsuccessful, & therefore we had better propose an alliance while our affairs wear a hopeful aspect:

That to wait the event of this campaign will certainly work delay, because during this summer France may assist us effectually by cutting off those supplies of provisions from England & Ireland on which the enemy's armies here are to depend; or by setting in motion the great power they have collected in the West Indies, & calling our enemy to the defence of the possessions they have there:

That it would be idle to lose time in settling the terms of alliance, till we had first determined we would enter into alliance:

That it is necessary to lose no time in opening a trade for our people, who will want clothes, and will want money too for the payment of taxes:

And that the only misfortune is that we did not enter into alliance with France six months sooner, as besides opening their ports for the vent of our last year's produce, they might have marched an army into Germany and prevented the petty princes there from selling their unhappy subjects to subdue us.

4. "THE DECREE IS GONE FORTH"

John Adams to Patrick Henry.

Philadelphia, June 3, 1776

My Dear Sir,—

... The dons, the bashaws, the grandees, the patricians, the sachems, the nabobs, call them by what names you please, sigh and groan and fret, and sometimes stamp and foam and curse, but all in vain. The decree is gone forth, and it cannot be recalled, that a more equal liberty than has prevailed in other parts of the earth must be established in America. The exuberance of pride which has produced an insolent domination in a few, a very few, opulent, monopolizing families, will be brought down nearer to the confines of reason and moderation than they have been used to. This is all the evil which they themselves will endure. It will do them good in this world, and in every other. For pride was not made for man, only as a tormentor.

5. "A REVOLUTION THE MOST COMPLETE AND REMARKABLE IN HISTORY"

John Adams to William Cushing.

Philadelphia, June 9, 1776

... It would give me great pleasure to ride this eastern circuit with you, and prate before you at the bar, as I used to do. But I am destined to another fate, to drudgery of the most wasting, exhausting, consuming kind that I ever went through in my whole life. Objects of the most stupendous magnitude, and measures in which the lives and liberties of millions yet unborn are intimately interested, are now before us. We are in the very midst of a revolution the most complete, unexpected and remarkable of any in the history of nations. A few important subjects must be dispatched before I can return to my family. Every colony must be induced to institute a perfect government. All the colonies must confederate together in some solemn band of union. The Congress must declare the colonies free and independent States, and ambassadors must be sent abroad to foreign courts to solicit their acknowledgement of us as sovereign States, and to form with them, at least with some of them, commercial treaties of friendship and alliance. When these things are once completed, I shall think that I have answered the end of my creation, and sing my nunc dimittis, return to my farm, family, ride circuits, plead law, or judge causes, just which you please.

6. "IT IS UNIVERSALLY ACKNOWLEDGED WE MUST BE INDEPENDENT"

John Adams to John Winthrop.

Philadelphia, June 23, 1776

Your favor of June 1st is before me. It is now universally acknowledged that we are and must be independent. But still, objections are made to a declaration of it. It is said that such a declaration will arouse and unite Great Britain. But are they not already aroused and united, as much as they will be? Will not such a declaration arouse and unite the friends of liberty, the few who are left, in opposition to the present system? It is also said that such a declaration will put us in the power of foreign States; that France will take advantage of us when they see we cannot recede, and demand severe terms of us; that she, and Spain too, will rejoice to see Britain and America wasting each other. But this reasoning has no weight with me, because I am not for soliciting any political connection, or military assistance, or indeed naval, from France. I wish for nothing but commerce, a mere marine treaty with them. And this they will never grant until we make the declaration, and this, I think, they cannot refuse, after we have made it.

The advantages which will result from such a declaration are, in my opinion, very numerous and very great. After that event the colonies will hesitate no longer to complete their governments. They will establish tests, and ascertain the criminality of toryism. The presses will produce no more seditious or traitorous speculations. Slanders upon public men and measures will be lessened. The legislatures of the colonies will exert themselves to manufacture saltpetre, sulphur, powder, arms, cannon, mortars, clothing, and every thing necessary for the support of life. Our civil governments will feel a vigor hitherto unknown. Our military operations by sea and land will be conducted with greater spirit. Privateers will swarm in vast numbers. Foreigners will then exert themselves to supply us with what we want. A foreign court will not disdain to treat with us upon equal terms. Nay farther, in my opinion, such a declaration, instead of uniting the people of Great Britain against us, will raise such a storm against the measures of administration as will obstruct the war, and throw the kingdom into confusion.

A committee is appointed to prepare a confederation of the colonies, ascertaining the terms and ends of the compact and the limits of the Continental Constitution; and another committee is appointed to draw up a declaration that these colonies are free and independent States. And other committees are appointed for other purposes, as important. These committees will report in a week or two, and then the last finishing strokes will be given to the politics of this revolution. Nothing after that will remain but war. . . .

7. "A BLOODY CONFLICT WE ARE DESTINED TO ENDURE"

John Adams to Samuel Chase of Annapolis, Maryland.

Philadelphia, July 1, 1776

Your favor by the post this morning gave me much pleasure, but the generous and unanimous vote of your Convention gave me much more. It was brought into Congress this morning, just as we were entering on the great debate. That debate took up the most of the day, but it was an idle mispence of time, for nothing was said but what had been repeated and hackneyed in that room before, a hundred times, for six months past. In the committee of the whole, the question was carried in the affirmative, and reported to the house. A colony desired it to be postponed until to-morrow. Then it will pass by a great majority; perhaps with almost unanimity. Yet I cannot promise this. Because one or two gentlemen may possibly be found, who will vote point-blank against the known and declared sense of their constituents. Maryland, however, I have the pleasure to inform you, behaved well, Paca, generously and nobly. . . .

If you imagine that I expect this declaration will ward off calamities from this country, you are much mistaken. A bloody conflict we are destined to endure. This has been my opinion from the beginning. You will certainly remember my declared opinion was, at the first Congress, when we found that we could not agree upon an immediate non-exportation, that the contest would not be settled without bloodshed; and that if hostilities should once commence, they would terminate in an incurable animosity between the two countries. Every political event since the nineteenth of April, 1775, has confirmed me in this opinion. If you imagine that I flatter myself with happiness and halcyon days after a separation from Great Britain, you are mistaken again. I do not expect that our new government will be so quiet as I could wish, nor that happy harmony, confidence and affection between the colonies, that every good American ought to study, labor, and pray for, for a long time.

But freedom is a counterbalance for poverty, discord and war and more.

It is your hard lot and mine to be called into life at such a time. Yet even these times have their pleasures.

8. JOHN ADAMS CARRIES THE DAY

From his Autobiography.

Friday, June 28, 1776. A new delegation appeared from New Jersey. Mr. William Livingston and all others who had hitherto resisted independence were left out. Richard Stockton, Francis Hopkinson and Dr. John Witherspoon were new members.

Monday, July 1. A resolution of the Convention of Maryland, passed the 28th of June, was laid before Congress, and read, as follows:

"That the instructions given to their deputies in December last be recalled, and the restriction therein contained, removed; and that their deputies to be authorized and empowered to concur with the other United Colonies, or a majority of them, in declaring the United Colonies free and independent States; in forming a compact between them, and in making foreign alliances, etc." . . .

I am not able to recollect whether it was on this or some preceding day that the greatest and most solemn debate was had on the question of independence. The subject had been in contemplation for more than a year, and frequent discussions had been had concerning it. At one time and another all the arguments for it and against it had been exhausted and were become familiar. I expected no more would be said in public, but that the question would be put and decided. Mr. Dickinson, however, was determined to bear his testimony against it with more formality. He had prepared himself apparently with great labor and ardent zeal, and in a speech of great length, and with all his eloquence, he combined together all that had before been written in pamphlets and newspapers, and all that had from time to time been said in Congress by himself and others. He conducted the debate not only with great ingenuity and eloquence, but with equal politeness and candor, and was answered in the same spirit.

No member rose to answer him, and after waiting some time in hopes that some one less obnoxious than myself, who had been all along for a year before, and still was, represented and believed to be the author of all the mischief, would move, I determined to speak.

It has been said by some of our historians that I began by an invocation to the god of eloquence. This is a misrepresentation. Nothing so puerile as this fell from me. I began by saying that this was the first time of my life that I had ever wished for the talents and eloquence of the ancient orators of Greece and Rome, for I was very sure that none of them ever had before him a question of more importance to his country and to the world. They would probably, upon less occasions than this, have begun by solemn invocations to their divinities for assistance; but the question before me appeared so simple that I had confidence enough in the plain understanding and common sense that had been given me to believe that I could answer, to the satisfaction of the House, all the arguments which had been produced, notwithstanding the abilities which had been displayed, and the eloquence with which they had been enforced.

Mr. Dickinson, some years afterwards, published his speech. I had made no preparation beforehand and never committed any minutes of mine to writing. But if I had a copy of Mr. Dickinson's before me, I would now, after nine and twenty years have elapsed, endeavor to recollect mine.

Before the final question was put, the new delegates from New Jersey came in, and Mr. Stockton, Dr. Witherspoon and Mr. Hopkinson, very respectable characters, expressed a great desire to hear the arguments. All was silence; no one would speak; all eyes were turned upon me.

Mr. Edward Rutledge came to me and said, laughing, "Nobody will speak but you upon this subject. You have all the topics so ready that you must satisfy the gentlemen from New Jersey."

I answered him, laughing, that it had so much the air of exhibiting like an actor or gladiator, for the entertainment of the audience, that I was ashamed to repeat what I had said twenty times before, and I thought nothing new could be advanced by me. The New Jersey gentlemen, however, still insisting on hearing at least a recapitulation of the arguments, and no other gentleman being willing to speak, I summed up the reasons, objections and answers in as concise a manner as I could, till at length the Jersey gentlemen said they were fully satisfied and ready for the question, which was then put and determined in the affirmative.

9. "I ARRIVED IN TIME TO GIVE MY VOICE FOR INDEPENDENCE"

Caesar Rodney to Thomas Rodney.

Philadelphia, July the 4th, 1776

Sir:

I arrived in Congress (tho detained by thunder and rain) time enough to give my voice in the matter of Independence. It is determined by the Thirteen United Colonies, without even one decenting Colony. We have now got through with the whole of the Declaration, and ordered it to be printed, so that you will soon have the pleasure of seeing it. Hand-bills of it will be printed, and sent to the armies, cities, county towns, etc. To be published or rather proclaimed in form. Don't neglect to attend closely and carefully to my harvest and you'll oblige Yours, etc.

CAESAR RODNEY

—BURNETT, Letters of Members of the Continental Congress, I, 528.

VI. THE GREAT DECLARATION

When on June 10 the Congress voted to postpone consideration of Lee's resolution for independence for three weeks, it appointed a committee to draft a declaration of independence, and to this committee named Thomas Jefferson, Benjamin Franklin, John Adams, Robert Livingston and Roger Sherman. This committee, in turn, delegated the task to Jefferson. Just thirty-three years old at the time, Jefferson was one of the youngest members of the Congress, and one of the newest, but already well known. He had written the Summary View, thought by some the best statement of the American case; he had drafted the answer to Lord North's proposal for reconciliation, and contributed a large, possibly a major, part to the Declaration of the Causes and Necessity of Taking Up Arms.

Considering how articulate and literary were the members of the committee—Jefferson, Franklin and Adams wrote incessantly—we know tantalizingly little about the actual drafting of this memorable document. There is no strictly contemporary account, and Jefferson himself, though he found time to write about almost everything else, never found time to give a really circumstantial account of this chapter of his life. Yet it is possible to reconstruct, from such documents as we do have, part of the story. We know, for example, that Jefferson wrote the Declaration in two weeks, for it was worked over by the committee and submitted to the Congress on June 28. We know that he wrote it at his desk (still preserved) in the second-floor parlor of the house of a young German bricklayer named Graff, and that he “turned neither to book nor pamphlet” but drew on his store of political philosophy. We know a good deal about the alterations by Franklin and Adams, and by the Congress, most of them verbal, but one at least substantial—the omission of the diatribe against slavery and the slave trade. But whatever is still uncertain and unclear about the drafting of the Declaration, one thing is beyond dispute, that the Declaration as we know it was the product of the mind and pen of Thomas Jefferson.

Congress debated Jefferson's draft of the Declaration on the afternoon of the second, on the third and part of the fourth of July, and then adopted it “unanimously”—though New York did not vote, and New York's representative on the committee, Robert Livingston, did not sign. There was a formal “signing” on August 2, and some desultory signing thereafter, and eventually fifty-five Americans assured immortality for themselves by putting their signatures on the document, but an impenetrable cloud conceals the actual history of the signing.

We include here five documents, or groups of documents. First is Jefferson's account of the writing of the Declaration, written shortly after the event, brief and inconclusive. Then come three accounts written almost half a century later. The first is from the pungent pen of John Adams in reply to an inquiry from Jefferson's inveterate enemy Timothy Pickering who wanted to make a Fourth of July speech showing that Jefferson was not really very important. Adams's phrase “the Frankfort advice” refers to a meeting at Frankfort with members of the Pennsylvania delegation who urged the Massachusetts men to keep themselves in the background and let Virginia take the lead. The second and third are by Jefferson himself, one of them setting Pickering and Adams right on details, the other recalling the broad philosophical background of the Declaration. Third comes Jefferson's “Rough Draft” as reconstructed by the Jeffersonian scholar, Julian Boyd; it is, says Dr. Boyd, “the most extraordinarily interesting document in American history.” We have given here only the preamble and the controversial paragraph on slavery. Fourth is the Declaration itself, in its final form. And finally a group of letters and accounts which suggest something of the exultation and jubilation that greeted the decision for independence.

1. "THE COMMITTEE DESIRED ME TO DRAW THE DECLARATION"

Jefferson's own account.

It appearing in the course of these debates that the colonies of New York, New Jersey, Pennsylvania, Delaware, Maryland & South Carolina were not yet matured for falling from the parent stem, but that they were fast advancing to that state, it was thought most prudent to wait a while for them, and to postpone the final decisions to July 1, but that this might occasion as little delay as possible a committee was appointed to prepare a declaration of independence. the Commee. were J. Adams, Dr. Franklin, Roger Sherman, Robert R. Livingston & myself. committees were also appointed at the same time to prepare a plan of confederation for the colonies, and to state the terms proper to be proposed for foreign alliance.

the committee for drawing the declaration of Independence desired me to do it. it was accordingly done and being approved by them, I reported it to the house on Friday the 28th. of June when it was read and ordered to lie on the table.

on Monday the 1st. of July the house resolved itself into a commee. of the whole & resumed the consideration of the original motion made by the delegates of Virginia, which being again debated through the day, was carried in the affirmative by the votes of N. Hampshire, Connecticut, Massachusetts, Rhode Island, N. Jersey, Maryland, Virginia, N. Carolina, & Georgia. S. Carolina and Pennsylvania voted against it. Delaware having but two members present, they were divided: the delegates for New York declared they were for it themselves, & were assured their constituents were for it, but that their instructions having been drawn near a twelvemonth before, when reconciliation was still the general object, they were enjoined by them to do nothing which should impede that object. they therefore thought themselves not justifiable in voting on either side, and asked leave to withdraw from the question, which was given them.

the Commee. rose & reported their resolution to the house. Mr. Rutledge of S. Carolina then requested the determination might be put off to the next day, as he believed his colleagues, tho' they disapproved of the resolution, would then join in it for the sake of unanimity. the ultimate question whether the house would agree to the resolution of the committee was accordingly postponed to the next day [July 2], when it was again moved and S. Carolina concurred in voting for it. in the mean time a third member had come post from the Delaware counties and turned the vote of that colony in favor of the resolution. members of a different sentiment attending that morning from Pennsylvania also, their vote was changed, so that the whole 12 colonies who were authorized to vote at all, gave their voices for it: and within a few days the convention of N. York approved of it and thus supplied the void occasioned by the withdrawing of their delegates from the vote.

Congress proceeded the same day [July 2] to consider the declaration of Independence, which had been reported & laid on the table the Friday preceding, and on Monday referred to a commee. of the whole. the pusillanimous idea that we had friends in England worth keeping terms with, still haunted the minds of many. for this reason those passages which conveyed censures on the people of England were struck out, lest they should give them offense. the clause too, reprobating the enslaving the inhabitants of Africa, was struck out in complaisance to South Carolina & Georgia, who had never attempted to restrain the importation of slaves and who on the contrary still wished to continue it. our Northern brethren also I believe felt a little tender under those censures; for tho' their people have very few slaves themselves yet they had been pretty considerable carriers of them to others. The debates having taken up the greater parts of the 2d. 3d. & 4th. days of July were, in the evening of the last closed. the declaration was reported by the commee., agreed to by the house, and signed by every member present except Mr. Dickinson.

2. JOHN ADAMS PLACES VIRGINIA AT THE HEAD OF EVERYTHING

To Timothy Pickering.

August 6, 1822

You inquire why so young a man as Mr. Jefferson was placed at the head of the committee for preparing a Declaration of Independence? I answer: It was the Frankfort advice to place Virginia at the head of everything. Mr. Richard Henry Lee might be gone to Virginia, to his sick family, for aught I know, but that was not the reason for Mr. Jefferson's appointment. There were three committees appointed at the same time, one for the Declaration of Independence, another for preparing articles of confederation, and another for preparing a treaty to be proposed to France. Mr. Lee was chosen for the Committee of Confederation, and it was not thought convenient that the same person should be upon both. Mr. Jefferson came into Congress in June, 1775, and brought with him a reputation for literature, science, and a happy talent of composition. Writings of his were handed about, remarkable for the peculiar felicity of expression. Though a silent member in Congress, he was so prompt, frank, explicit and decisive upon committees and in conversation—not even Samuel Adams was more so—that he soon seized upon my heart; and upon this occasion I gave him my vote, and did all in my power to procure the votes of others. I think he had one more vote than any other, and that placed him at the head of the committee. I had the next highest number, and that placed me the second. The committee met, discussed the subject, and then appointed Mr. Jefferson and me to make the draught, I suppose because we were the two first on the list.

The sub-committee met. Jefferson proposed to me to make the draught.

I said, "I will not."

"You should do it."

"Oh! no."

"Why will you not? You ought to do it."

"I will not."

"Why?"

"Reason enough."

"What can be your reasons?"

"Reason first—You are a Virginian, and a Virginian ought to appear at the head of this business. Reason second—I am obnoxious, suspected and unpopular. You are very much otherwise. Reason third—You can write ten times better than I can.”

“Well,” said Jefferson, “if you are decided, I will do as well as I can.”

“Very well. When you have drawn it up, we will have a meeting.”

A meeting we accordingly had, and conned the paper over. I was delighted with its high tone and the flights of oratory with which it abounded, especially that concerning Negro slavery, which, though I knew his Southern brethren would never suffer to pass in Congress, I certainly never would oppose. There were other expressions which I would not have inserted, if I had drawn it up, particularly that which called the King tyrant. I thought this too personal; for I never believed George to be a tyrant in disposition and in nature; I always believed him to be deceived by his courtiers on both sides of the Atlantic, and, in his official capacity only, cruel. I thought the expression too passionate, and too much like scolding, for so grave and solemn a document; but as Franklin and Sherman were to inspect it afterwards, I thought it would not become me to strike it out. I consented to report it, and do not now remember that I made or suggested a single alteration.

We reported it to the committee of five. It was read, and I do not remember that Franklin or Sherman criticized any thing. We were all in haste. Congress was impatient, and the instrument was reported, as I believe, in Jefferson's handwriting, as he first drew it. Congress cut off about a quarter of it, as I expected they would; but they obliterated some of the best of it, and left all that was exceptionable, if any thing in it was. I have long wondered that the original draught has not been published. I suppose the reason is the vehement philippic against Negro slavery.

As you justly observe, there is not an idea in it but what had been hackneyed in Congress for two years before. The substance of it is contained in the declaration of rights and the violation of those rights, in the Journals of Congress, in 1774. Indeed, the essence of it is contained in a pamphlet, voted and printed by the town of Boston, before the first Congress met, composed by James Otis, as I suppose, in one of his lucid intervals, and pruned and polished by Samuel Adams.

3. “I TURNED TO NEITHER BOOK NOR PAMPHLET”

Thomas Jefferson to James Madison.

Monticello, August 30, 1823

Dear Sir, . . . The committee of five met; no such thing as a sub-committee was proposed, but they unanimously pressed on myself alone to undertake the draught. I consented; I drew it; but before I reported it to the committee, I communicated it separately to Dr. Franklin and Mr. Adams, requesting their corrections, because they were the two members of whose judgments and amendments I wished most to have the benefit before presenting it to the committee. . . . Their alterations were two or three only, and merely verbal. I then wrote a fair copy, reported it to the committee, and from them, unaltered, to Congress. This personal communication and consultation with Mr. Adams, he has misremembered into the actings of a sub-committee.

Pickering's observations, and Mr. Adams' in addition, "that it contained no new ideas, that it is a common-place compilation, its sentiments hacknied in Congress for two years before, and its essence contained in Otis's pamphlet" may all be true. Of that I am not to be the judge. Richard Henry Lee charged it as copied from Locke's treatise on government. Otis' pamphlet I never saw and whether I had gathered my ideas from reading or reflection I do not know. I only know that I turned to neither book nor pamphlet while writing it. I did not consider it as any part of my charge to invent new ideas altogether, and to offer no sentiment which had ever been expressed before. Had Mr. Adams been so restrained, Congress would have lost the benefit of his bold and impressive advocations of the rights of Revolution. For no man's confident and fervid addresses, more than Mr. Adams', encouraged and supported us through the difficulties surrounding us, which, like the ceaseless action of gravity weighed on us by night and by day. Yet on the same ground, we may ask what of these elevated thoughts was new, or can be affirmed never before to have entered the conceptions of man?

Whether, also, the sentiments of Independence, and the reasons for declaring it, which make so great a portion of the instrument, had been hacknied in Congress for two years before the 4th of July '76, or this dictum also of Mr. Adams be another slip of memory, let history say. This, however, I will say for Mr. Adams, that he supported the Declaration with zeal and ability, fighting fearlessly for every word of it. As to myself, I thought it a duty to be, on that occasion, a passive auditor of the opinions of others, more impartial judges than I could be, of its merits or demerits. During the debate I was sitting by Doctor Franklin, and he observed that I was writhing a little under the acrimonious criticisms of some of its parts; and it was on that occasion, that by way of comfort, he told me the story of John Thompson, the hatter, and his new sign.

4. "IT WAS INTENDED TO BE AN EXPRESSION OF THE AMERICAN MIND"

Thomas Jefferson to Henry Lee.

Monticello, May 8, 1825

... With respect to our rights, and the acts of the British government contravening those rights, there was but one opinion on this side of the water. All American whigs thought alike on these subjects. When forced, therefore, to resort to arms for redress, an appeal to the tribunal of the world was deemed proper for our justification. This was the object of the Declaration of Independence. Not to find out new principles, or new arguments, never before thought of, not merely to say things which had never been said before; but to place before mankind the common sense of the subject, in terms so plain and firm as to command their assent, and to justify ourselves in the independent stand we are compelled to take. Neither aiming at originality of principle or sentiment, nor yet copied from any particular and previous writing, it was intended to be an expression of the American mind, and to give to that expression the proper tone and spirit called for by the occasion. All its authority rests then on the harmonizing sentiments of the day, whether expressed in conversation, in letters, printed essays, or in the elementary books of public right, as Aristotle, Cicero, Locke, Sidney, etc. . . .

5. JEFFERSON'S ROUGH DRAFT OF THE DECLARATION

A Declaration of the Representatives of the United States of America, in General Congress assembled.

When in the course of human events it becomes necessary for a people to advance from that subordination in which they have hitherto remained, and to assume among the powers of the earth the equal and independant station to which the laws of nature and of nature's god entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the change.

We hold these truths to be sacred and undeniable; that all men are created equal and independant, that from that equal creation they derive rights inherent and inalienable, among which are the preservation of life, and liberty and the pursuit of happiness; that to secure these ends, governments are instituted among men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed; that whenever any form of government shall become destructive of these ends, it is the right of the people to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new government, laying it's foundation on such principles and organising it's powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their safety and happiness. prudence indeed will dictate that governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes: and accordingly all experience hath shewn that mankind are more disposed to suffer while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. but when a long train of abuses and usurpations, begun at a distinguished period, and pursuing invariably the same object, evinces a design to subject them to arbitrary power, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such government and to provide new guards for their future security. such has been the patient sufferance of these colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to expunge their former systems of government. the history of his present majesty, is a history of unremitting injuries and usurpations, among which no one fact stands single or solitary to contradict the uniform tenor of the rest, all of which have in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over these states. to prove this, let facts be submitted to a candid world, for the truth of which we pledge a faith yet unsullied by falsehood. . . .

6. THE CLAUSE REPROBATING THE ENSLAVING THE INHABITANTS OF AFRICA

. . . he has waged cruel war against human nature itself, violating it's most sacred rights of life & liberty in the persons of a distant people who never offended him, captivating & carrying them into slavery in another hemisphere, or to incur miserable death in their transportation thither. This piratical warfare, the opprobrium of infidel powers, is the warfare of the CHRISTIAN king of Great Britain, determined to keep open a market where MEN should be bought and sold, he has prostituted his negative for suppressing every legislative attempt to prohibit or to restrain this execrable commerce: and that this assemblage of horrors might want no fact of distinguished die, he is now exciting those very people to rise in arms among us, and to purchase that liberty of which he has deprived them, by murdering the people upon whom he also obtruded them; thus paying off former crimes committed against the liberties of one people, with crimes which he urges them to commit against the lives of another.

—BOYD, The Declaration of Independence, pp. 19-21.

7. THE DECLARATION OF INDEPENDENCE

In Congress, July 4, 1776

THE UNANIMOUS DECLARATION OF THE THIRTEEN
UNITED STATES OF AMERICA

When in the Course of human events, it becomes necessary for one people to dissolve the political bands which have connected them with another, and to assume among the Powers of the earth, the separate and equal station to which the Laws of Nature and of Nature's God entitle them, a decent respect to the opinions of mankind requires that they should declare the causes which impel them to the separation.

We hold these truths to be self-evident, that all men are created equal, that they are endowed by their Creator with certain unalienable Rights, that among these are Life, Liberty and the pursuit of Happiness. That to secure these rights, Governments are instituted among Men, deriving their just powers from the consent of the governed, That whenever any Form of Government becomes destructive of these ends, it is the Right of the People to alter or to abolish it, and to institute new Government, laying its foundation on such principles and organizing its powers in such form, as to them shall seem most likely to effect their Safety and Happiness. Prudence, indeed, will dictate that Governments long established should not be changed for light and transient causes; and accordingly all experience hath shown, that mankind are more disposed to suffer, while evils are sufferable, than to right themselves by abolishing the forms to which they are accustomed. But when a long train of abuses and usurpations, pursuing invariably the same Object evinces a design to reduce them under absolute Despotism, it is their right, it is their duty, to throw off such Government, and to provide new Guards for their future security.—Such has been the patient sufferance of these Colonies; and such is now the necessity which constrains them to alter their former Systems of Government. The history of the present King of Great Britain is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations, all having in direct object the establishment of an absolute Tyranny over these States. To prove this, let Facts be submitted to a candid world.

He has refused his Assent to Laws, the most wholesome and necessary for the public good.

He has forbidden his Governors to pass Laws of immediate and pressing importance, unless suspended in their operation till his Assent should be obtained; and when so suspended, he has utterly neglected to attend to them.

He has refused to pass other Laws for the accommodation of large districts of people, unless those people would relinquish the right of Representation in the Legislature, a right inestimable to them and formidable to tyrants only.

He has called together legislative bodies at places unusual, uncomfortable, and distant from the depository of their Public Records, for the sole purpose of fatiguing them into compliance with his measures.

He has dissolved Representative Houses repeatedly, for opposing with manly firmness his invasions on the rights of the people.

He has refused for a long time, after such dissolutions, to cause others to be elected; whereby the Legislative Powers, incapable of Annihilation, have returned to the People at large for their exercise; the State remaining in the mean time exposed to all the dangers of invasion from without, and convulsions within.

He has endeavoured to prevent the population of these States; for that purpose obstructing the Laws of Naturalization of Foreigners; refusing to pass others to encourage their migration hither, and raising the conditions of new Appropriations of Lands.

He has obstructed the Administration of Justice, by refusing his Assent to Laws for establishing Judiciary Powers.

He has made Judges dependent on his Will alone, for the tenure of their offices, and the amount and payment of their salaries.

He has erected a multitude of New Offices, and sent hither swarms of Officers to harass our People, and eat out their substance.

He has kept among us, in times of peace, Standing Armies without the Consent of our legislature.

He has affected to render the Military independent of and superior to the Civil Power.

He has combined with others to subject us to a jurisdiction foreign to our constitution, and unacknowledged by our laws; giving his Assent to their acts of pretended legislation:

For quartering large bodies of armed troops among us:

For protecting them, by a mock Trial, from Punishment for any Murders which they should commit on the Inhabitants of these States:

For cutting off our Trade with all parts of the world:

For imposing taxes on us without our Consent:

For depriving us in many cases, of the benefits of Trial by Jury:

For transporting us beyond Seas to be tried for pretended offences:

For abolishing the free System of English Laws in a neighbouring Province, establishing therein an Arbitrary government, and enlarging its Boundaries so as to render it at once an example and fit instrument for introducing the same absolute rule into these Colonies:

For taking away our Charters, abolishing our most valuable Laws, and altering fundamentally the Forms of our Governments.

For suspending our own Legislature, and declaring themselves invested with Power to legislate for us in all cases whatsoever.

He has abdicated Government here, by declaring us out of his Protection and waging War against us.

He has plundered our seas, ravaged our Coasts, burnt our towns, and destroyed the lives of our people.

He is at this time transporting large armies of foreign mercenaries to compleat the works of death, desolation and tyranny, already begun with circumstances of Cruelty & perfidy scarcely paralleled in the most barbarous ages, and totally unworthy the Head of a civilized nation.

He has constrained our fellow Citizens taken Captive on the high Seas to bear Arms against their Country, to become the executioners of their friends and Brethren, or to fall themselves by their Hands.

He has excited domestic insurrections amongst us, and has endeavoured to bring on the inhabitants of our frontiers, the merciless Indian Savages, whose known rule of warfare, is an undistinguished destruction of all ages, sexes and conditions.

In every stage of these Oppressions We have Petitioned for Redress in the most humble terms: Our repeated Petitions have been answered only by repeated injury. A Prince, whose character is thus marked by every act which may define a Tyrant, is unfit to be the ruler of a free People.

Nor have We been wanting in attention to our British brethren. We have warned them from time to time of attempts by their legislature to extend an unwarrantable jurisdiction over us. We have reminded them of the circumstances of our emigration and settlement here. We have appealed to their native justice and magnanimity, and we have conjured them by the ties of our common kindred to disavow these usurpations, which would inevitably interrupt our connections and correspondence. They too have been deaf to the voice of justice and of consanguinity. We must, therefore, acquiesce in the necessity, which denounces our Separation, and hold them, as we hold the rest of mankind, Enemies in War, in Peace Friends.

We, therefore, the Representatives of the united States of America, in General Congress, Assembled, appealing to the Supreme Judge of the world for the rectitude of our intentions, do, in the Name and by Authority of the good People of these Colonies, solemnly publish and declare, That these United Colonies are, and of Right ought to be Free and Independent States; that they are Absolved from all Allegiance to the British Crown, and that all political connection between them and the State of Great Britain, is and ought to be totally dissolved; and that as Free and Independent States, they have full Power to levy War, conclude Peace, contract Alliances, establish Commerce, and to do all other Acts and Things which Independent States may of right do. And for the support of this Declaration, with a firm reliance on the Protection of Divine Providence, we mutually pledge to each other our Lives, our Fortunes and our sacred Honor.

8. "A GREATER QUESTION NEVER WILL BE DECIDED AMONG MEN"

John Adams to Abigail Adams.

Philadelphia, 3 July, 1776

... Yesterday the greatest question was decided which ever was debated in America, and a greater, perhaps, never was nor will be decided among men. A resolution was passed without one dissenting colony, "that these United Colonies are, and of right ought to be, free and independent States, and as such they have, and of right ought to have, full power to make war, conclude peace, establish commerce, and to do all other acts and things which other States may rightfully do." You will see in a few days a Declaration setting forth the causes which have impelled us to this mighty revolution, and the reasons which will justify it in the sight of God and man. A plan of confederation will be taken up in a few days.

When I look back to the year 1761, and recollect the argument concerning writs of assistance in the superior court, which I have hitherto considered as the commencement of this controversy between Great Britain and America, and run through the whole period from that time to this, and recollect the series of political events, the chain of causes and effects, I am surprised at the suddenness as well as greatness of this revolution. Britain has been filled with folly, and America with wisdom. At least, this is my judgment. Time must determine. It is the will of Heaven that the two countries should be sundered forever. It may be the will of Heaven that America shall suffer calamities still more wasting, and distress yet more dreadful. If this is to be the case, it will have this good effect at least. It will inspire us with many virtues which we have not, and correct many errors, follies and vices which threaten to disturb, dishonor and destroy us. The furnace of affliction produces refinement, in States as well as individuals. And the new governments we are assuming in every part will require a purification from our vices, and an augmentation of our virtues, or they will be no blessings. The people will have unbounded power, and the people are extremely addicted to corruption and venality, as well as the great. But I must submit all my hopes and fears to an overruling Providence, in which, unfashionable as the faith may be, I firmly believe.

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, IX, 418.

9. "THROUGH ALL THE GLOOM RAYS OF RAVISHING LIGHT AND GLORY"

John Adams to Abigail Adams.

3 July 1776

The second day of July, 1776, will be the most memorable epocha in the history of America. I am apt to believe that it will be celebrated by succeeding generations as the great anniversary festival. It ought to be commemorated as the day of deliverance, by solemn acts of devotion to God Almighty. It ought to be solemnized with pomp and parade, with shows, games, sports, guns, bells, bonfires and illuminations, from one end of this continent to the other, from this time forward, forevermore.

You will think me transported with enthusiasm, but I am not. I am well aware of the toil, and blood, and treasure, that it will cost us to maintain this declaration, and support and defend these States. Yet, through all the gloom, I can see the rays of ravishing light and glory. I can see that the end is more than worth all the means, and that posterity will triumph in that day's transaction, even although we should rue it, which I trust in God we shall not.

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, IX, 420.

10. "THE BELLS RANG ALL DAY AND ALMOST ALL NIGHT"

John Adams to Samuel Chase.

Philadelphia, 9 July, 1776

Yours of the 5th came to me the 8th. You will see by this post that the river is passed, and the bridge cut away. The Declaration was yesterday published and proclaimed from that awful stage in the State-house yard; by whom, do you think? By the Committee of Safety, the Committee of Inspection, and a great crowd of people. Three cheers rended the welkin. The battalions paraded on the Common, and gave us the feu de joie, notwithstanding the scarcity of powder. The bells rang all day and almost all night. Even the chimers chimed away. The election for the city was carried on, amidst all this flurry, with the utmost decency and order. Who are chosen, I cannot say; but the list was Franklin, Rittenhouse, Owen Biddle, Cannon, Schlosser, Matlack and Kuhl. Thus you see the effect of men of fortune acting against the sense of the people!

As soon as an American seal is prepared, I conjecture the Declarations will be subscribed by all the members, which will give you the opportunity you wish for, of transmitting your name among the votaries of independence.

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, IX, 420-421.

11. "THUS THE CONGRESS HAVE TIED A GORDIAN KNOT"

From the Diary of Ezra Stiles.

July 13, 1776. Mr. Channing returned from Newport and brought the Congresses Declaration of INDEPENDENCY dated at Philadelphia the fourth day of July instant. This I read at noon, and for the first time realized Independence. Thus the CONGRESS have tied a Gordian knot, which the Parliament will find they can neither cut nor untie. The thirteen united Colonies now rise into an Independent Republic among the kingdoms, states and empires on earth. May the Supreme and Omnipotent Lord of the Monarchical Republic of the immense Universe shower down his blessings upon it, and ever keep it under his holy protection! And have I lived to see such an important and astonishing revolution? Scotch policy transfused thro' the collective body of the ruling powers in Great Britain; and their violent, oppressive and haughty measures have weaned and alienated the affections of three millions of people, and dismembered them from a once beloved parent state. Cursed be that arbitrary policy! Let it never poison the United States of America!

—DEXTER, ed., Literary Diary of Ezra Stiles, II, 23-24.

12. SAVANNAH BURIES GEORGE III AND CELEBRATES INDEPENDENCE

Savannah, in Georgia, August 10, 1776

... His Excellency, the President, and the Honourable the Council met in the Council chamber, and read the Declaration. They then proceeded to the square before the Assembly House, and read it likewise before a great concourse of people, when the Grenadier and Light Infantry Companies fired a general volley. After this they proceeded in the following procession to the Liberty Pole: the Grenadiers in front; the Provost-Marshal on horseback, with his sword drawn; the Secretary with the Declaration; his Excellency the President; the Honourable the Council and Gentlemen; then the Light Infantry and the rest of the Militia of the town and district of Savannah. At the Liberty Pole they were met by the Georgia Battalion who, after reading of the Declaration, discharged their field-pieces and fired in platoons.

Upon this they proceeded to the Battery at the Trustees garden, where the Declaration was read for the last time, and cannon of the Battery discharged. His Excellency and Council, Colonel Lachlan McIntosh, and other gentlemen, with the Militia, dined under the Cedar Trees, and cheerfully drank to the United Free and Independent States of America. In the evening the town was illuminated, and there was exhibited a very solemn funeral procession, attended by the Grenadier and Light Infantry Companies, and other Militia, with their drums muffled and fifes, and a greater number of people than ever appeared on any occasion before in this Province, when George III was interred before the Court-House, in the following manner:

For as much as George III, of Great Britain, hath most flagrantly violated his coronation oath and trampled upon the constitution of our country and the sacred rights of mankind, we therefore commit his political existence to the ground, corruption to corruption, tyranny to the grave, and oppression to eternal infamy, in sure and certain hope that he will never obtain a resurrection to rule again over these United States of America. But my friends and fellow-citizens, let us not be sorry as men without hope for tyrants that thus depart; rather let us remember America is free and independent; that she is, and will be, with the blessing of the Almighty, great among the nations of the earth. Let this encourage us in well-doing to fight for our rights and privileges, for our wives and children, for all that is near and dear unto us. May God give us his blessing, and let all the people say Amen!

13. "THE ALMIGHTY HAS MADE CHOICE OF THE PRESENT GENERATION"

Judge William Henry Drayton's Charge to the Grand Jury.

Charleston, S. C., Oct. 15, 1776

It is but to glance an eye over the historic page to be assured that the duration of empire is limited by the Almighty decree. Empires have their rise to a zenith—and their declension to a dissolution. The years of a man, nay the hours of the insect on the bank of the Hypanis that lives but a day, epitomize the advance and decay of the strength and duration of dominion! One common fate awaits all things upon earth—a thousand causes accelerate or delay their perfection or ruin. To look a little into remote times, we see that, from the most contemptible origin upon record, Rome became the most powerful state the sun ever saw: The world bowed before her imperial Fasces! Yet, having run through all the vicissitudes of dominion, her course was finished. Her empire was dissolved, that the separated members of it might arise to run through similar revolutions.

Great Britain was a part of this mighty empire. But, being dissolved from it, in her turn she also extended her dominion—arrived at, and passed her zenith. Three and thirty years numbered the illustrious days of the Roman greatness. Eight years measure the duration of the British grandeur in meridian lustre! How few are the days of true glory. The extent of the Roman period is from their complete conquest of Italy, which gave them a place whereon to stand, that they might shake the world, to the original cause of their declension, their introduction of Asiatic luxury. The British period is from the year 1758, when they victoriously pursued their enemies into every quarter of the globe, to the immediate cause of their decline—their injustice displayed by the stamp act. In short, like the Roman empire, Great Britain in her constitution of government, contained a poison to bring on her decay, and in each case, this poison was drawn into a ruinous operation by the riches and luxuries of the east.

Thus, by natural causes and common effects, the American states are become dissolved from the British dominion. And is it to be wondered at that Britain has experienced the invariable fate of empire! We are not surprised when we see youth or age yield to the common lot of humanity. Nay, to repine that, in our day, America is dissolved from the British state, is impiously to question the unerring wisdom of Providence. The Almighty setteth up, and he casteth down: He breaks the sceptre, and transfers the dominion: He has made choice of the present generation to erect the American empire. Thankful as we are, and ought to be, for an appointment of the kind, the most illustrious that ever was, let each individual exert himself in this important operation directed by Jehovah himself. From a short retrospect, it is evident the work was not the present design of man.

CHAPTER NINE

The Loyalists

WHEN JOHN ADAMS was in Holland, in 1780, trying to win support to the American cause, he solemnly assured one inquirer that not one twentieth of the American people were tainted with loyalism. Writing in 1815, in a more objective mood (if Adams can ever be accused of objectivity), he put the situation differently. "If I were called upon to calculate the divisions among the people of America I should say that full one-third were averse to the revolution. . . . An opposite third conceived a hatred of the English and gave themselves up to an enthusiastic gratitude to France. The middle third, comprising principally the yeomanry, the soundest part of the nation, and always averse to war, were rather lukewarm both to England and France; and sometimes stragglers from them, and sometimes the whole body, united with the first or the last third, according to circumstances." Other estimates at the time differed as widely as those of Adams at different times. While most Patriots asserted that the Americans were well-nigh unanimous in their devotion to liberty and independence, the Loyalist Joseph Galloway confidently testified that four fifths of all Americans were, or wanted to be, loyal to the King!

These differences of opinion and assertion are not hard to understand, for the estimates turn not so much on evidence as on semantics and the subjective interpretation of the evidence. How define the terms "Patriot" and Loyalist"? If by Patriot we mean only those who were ready to fight for the new nation, then Adams' one third is too high; after all, a free population of only 2,000,000 could not put over 25,000 men in the field at once, and a rich and fertile land allowed its soldiers to freeze and to starve. If by Loyalist we mean only those who were actively loyal, and whose loyalty carried them into exile or into British ranks, then again Adams' estimate is too large. But if the term Loyalist be stretched to cover not only those who were actively loyal, but those who were against independence and war, and tried to hold aloof, then the figure of one third is clearly too small. Two things are apparent: that there was always a substantial portion of the American population which had no enthusiasm for either the rebellion or its suppression, and that the number and zeal of Patriots and Loyalists alike changed constantly with the varying fortunes of the war.

The situation has other dimensions as well. To some extent, and for some purposes, the Revolution was a class conflict, a war, if not between the "haves" and the "have-nots," then between the "ins" and the "outs." While it is possible to discern fairly clear social and economic patterns of loyalism and rebellion in any one state, it is almost impossible to generalize these for all the states. Thus while on the whole the landed gentry of New York were Loyalists (with such notable exceptions as the Van Rensselaers, the Livingstons, and the Schuylers!), this was not true of the landed gentry of Virginia; while the small farmers of Massachusetts were Patriots, this was not true of the small farmers of upstate New York or upcountry North Carolina; while most Loyalists were Anglicans, in Pennsylvania it was the Quakers and in the Carolinas the dissenters who more commonly joined the Royal ranks. In so far as the Revolution involved not only the question of home rule, but the question who should rule at home, it tended to identify radicalism with patriotism, and conservatism with loyalism. Much of loyalism in Pennsylvania, for example, reflected the long-standing quarrel between the Quakers and the Scots-Irish; the "Loyalists" who fought at Moore's Creek Bridge in 1776, and at King's Mountain later, were not fighting for King George but against the low-country planters who had punished them at the time of the Regulator uprising; and no one has ever succeeded in unraveling the tangled strands of patriotism, state pride, self-seeking, war, speculation and diplomacy, which the Allen brothers of Vermont wove during these years.

Loyalism had both a geographical and a class pattern, and both were opaque. It was stronger in the Middle States than in New England, stronger in the lower South than in the upper, strongest of all in New York—which the British held through most of the war. It was weakest in Massachusetts and Connecticut, and in Virginia, the oldest colonies, with the longest traditions and habits of self-government. A fairly accurate indication of geographical distribution is provided by the statistics of compensation to Loyalists granted by the British government at the close of the war. Of those receiving compensation 941 were from New York, 321 from South Carolina, 226 from Massachusetts, 208 from New Jersey, 148 from Pennsylvania, 140 from Virginia, 135 from North Carolina, and 129 from Georgia.

Loyalism had something of a class pattern as well. In a broad way it can be said that rich merchants, large landowners, Anglican clergymen, professional men, and officials tended to be loyal. But there are so many exceptions that the generalization is not very helpful: thus great landowners like Washington in Virginia and Willie Jones in North Carolina were Patriots; so were lawyers like Adams and Jefferson and professional men like Benjamin Rush and Doctor Warren, and many of the leading merchants of Boston, Philadelphia and Charleston. In a broad way it can be said that the small farmers, seamen, fishermen and dissenters were Patriots, but the small farmers of upstate New York and upcountry North Carolina provided many supporters to the Crown, the Quakers were mostly loyal, and John Wesley used his influence to keep his American followers faithful to the mother country.

Perhaps the best indication of the strength and tenacity of loyalism can be read in the figures (we cannot say statistics) of those who left the American states for new homes in Britain or Canada during and after the war. Altogether the Loyalist exodus withdrew some 75,000 to 80,000 from the American population—roughly one out of every 30 white families. It was a loss the new nation could ill afford.

At the very outset of the conflict the Loyalists formulated an elaborate rationale for their position—one which should appeal to those who find the Unionist arguments of 1861 convincing. But they were far more than a vocal minority; they were a fighting minority as well. From the beginning many of them took an active part in the war. Loyalists did most of the fighting in upcountry North and South Carolina; Loyalists harried the northern frontier, and with Brant's Indians perpetrated the Wyoming and Cherry Valley massacres; Loyalists helped the British regulars hold New York and Long Island. Loyalists provided, too, many Royal regiments: the Tory Rangers, Tarleton's Legion, Rawdon's Volunteers, St. Leger's Loyal Greens, the Pennsylvania Loyalists and many others; it has been estimated that altogether some 30,000 Loyalists at one time or another wore the British uniform. Yet though the British permitted themselves to be bemused by the phantom of great Loyalist armies, they did next to nothing to organize, support, maintain and reward Loyalist military co-operation.

It is no wonder that many Americans regarded the Loyalists with a loathing which they never felt for the British regulars, nor that they treated them with incomparably greater severity. They took for granted that they would have to fight the British, but to many of them it seemed monstrous that they should have to fight fellow Americans as well. Then, too, the rules of war of necessity applied to the fighting between British and American armies, but no rules of war protected the hapless Loyalists who were, in the eyes of the Americans, not formal opponents but renegades and traitors. "If America fails," observed a committee of the Congress in 1776, with palpable exaggeration, "it will be owing to such divisions more than to the force of our enemies." At the beginning there were efforts to win over the Loyalists by reason, or by social and economic pressures, but these mild methods speedily gave way to harsher ones: whipping, coats of tar and feathers, fines, confiscation of property, banishment, and—on paper at least—death. These rancorous measures had the support of Washington, Governor Livingston and Gouverneur Morris, men otherwise moderate and judicious. The Loyalists, in turn, met bitterness with bitterness and savagery with savagery, especially in the border warfare along the great frontier arc from upper New York around to Kentucky and down to South Carolina and Georgia.

A thousand or more Loyalists sailed to Halifax and eventually to England in 1776, and all through the war others made their painful way to the mother country, until not only London but provincial cities like Bristol had their little refugee colonies. Most of these exiles were dependent on British bounty, and few of them were happy in England. The British, in turn, did not quite know what to do with these American refugees who (with the conspicuous exception of Benjamin Thompson, later Count Rumford) were too old to fight, too poor to go into business, too unsophisticated to fit into the government, and too embittered to give sound advice. Most of them suffered the fate of such refugees at all times: they were men without a country.

Happily neither the Americans nor the English were good haters, and the passions of war evaporated quickly after the Treaty of Paris. If few states restored Loyalist property (as they were morally though perhaps not legally bound to do) most of them did repeal their punitive legislation. Within a short time a good many quondam Loyalists—like the inimitable Samuel Curwen—found it possible to return to their old homes and resume their old ways of life.

I. THE LOYALISTS ARGUE THEIR CAUSE

In a sense the Loyalist argument was more logical, as it was certainly more natural, than the Patriot, for Loyalists had merely to defend the old tried and true system that had functioned for 150 years, while the Patriots had to justify a revolution. Almost everything was on the side of maintaining the status quo: loyalty to King and Empire, desire for peace, fear of change, and sentiment. To most Americans loyalty to George III was as natural as is loyalty to Elizabeth II to Canadians today. And very few Americans—anyway outside Boston—actually felt the heavy hand of tyranny about which demagogues like Sam Adams and Tom Paine so furiously declaimed. Nor was the alternative of independence anything which respectable folk could contemplate without distress. Was it not ridiculous to suppose that a handful of colonials could successfully oppose the most powerful empire on the globe? Was it not absurd to think that thirteen independent colonies could be welded together into a single nation? And was it not downright frightening to contemplate rule not by the statesmen who had ruled so well in the past, but by firebrands and demagogues who were preaching doctrines of democracy and equality?

So the Loyalists reasoned, and to many thoughtful men at the time their reasoning seemed sound. The literary argument of the Loyalists has been so luminously explored by Moses Coit Tyler in his magisterial Literary History of the Revolution that we need not rehearse it here. We can present only a few brief excerpts from that argument. First is a small segment of the Westchester Farmer, the Reverend Samuel Seabury's reply to Alexander Hamilton's Full Vindication of the Measures of Congress; Hamilton, in turn, replied to Seabury with another pamphlet, the Farmer Refuted. Seabury, a zealous Anglican minister and an ardent pamphleteer, attached himself to the Royal cause once the war was under way, and was duly rewarded with a chaplaincy in one of the King's regiments, and a D.D. from Oxford University; after the war he served as first bishop of the Episcopal Church in America. Our second selection, from the pen of young Peter Van Schaack, illustrates well the mental and spiritual travail through which many upright Americans went in this crisis. Talented beyond most of his contemporaries, married into one of the first families of the province of New York, and active in the prerevolutionary agitation for American rights, Van Schaack was one of those who championed the American cause but drew back in alarm from independence. He tried to remain neutral, and for a time succeeded, but in 1778 he went into exile in England and stayed there throughout the war. When in 1784, however, the New York legislature restored his citizenship he gladly came home and settled for the rest of his life in Kinderhook. Something of the hard lot of the neutral, exposed to the hostility and ravages of both sides, is told in the diary of James Allen of Philadelphia.

1. THE REVEREND SAMUEL SEABURY ARGUES THE CAUSE OF GREAT BRITAIN

December 24, 1774

In answer to Alexander Hamilton.

... Do you think, Sir, that Great Britain is like an old, wrinkled, withered, worn-out hag, whom every jackanapes that truants along the streets may insult with impunity? You will find her a vigorous matron, just approaching a green old age; and with spirit and strength sufficient to chastise her undutiful and rebellious children. Your measures have as yet produced none of the effects you looked for: Great Britain is not as yet intimidated; she has already a considerable fleet and army in America; more ships and troops are expected in the spring; every appearance indicates a design in her to support her claim with vigour. You may call it infatuation, madness, frantic extravagance, to hazard so small a number of troops as she can spare against the thousands of New England. Should the dreadful contest once begin— But God forbid! Save, heavenly Father! O save my country from perdition!

Consider, Sir, is it right to risk the valuable blessings of property, liberty and life, to the single chance of war? Of the worst kind of war—a civil war? a civil war founded on rebellion? Without ever attempting the peaceable mode of accommodation? Without ever asking a redress of our complaints from the only power on earth who can redress them? When disputes happen between nations independent of each other, they first attempt to settle them by their ambassadors; they seldom run hastily to war till they have tried what can be done by treaty and mediation. I would make many more concessions to a parent than were justly due to him, rather than engage with him in a duel. But we are rushing into a war with our parent state without offering the least concession; without even deigning to propose an accommodation. You, Sir, have employed your pen, and exerted your abilities, in vindicating and recommending measures which you know must, if persisted in, have a direct tendency to produce and accelerate this dreadful event. The congress also foresaw the horrid tragedy that must be acted in America, should their measures be generally adopted; why else did they advise us “to extend our views to mournful events,” and be in all “respects prepared for every contingency?”

May God forgive them, but may he confound their devices: and may he give you repentance and a better mind!

2. A NEW YORK MODERATE WEIGHS LOYALTY AGAINST REBELLION

From the journal of Peter Van Schaack.

January, 1776, at Kinderhook

The only foundation of all legitimate governments is certainly a compact between the rulers and the people, containing mutual conditions, and equally obligatory on both the contracting parties. No question can therefore exist, at this enlightened day, about the lawfulness of resistance, in cases of gross and palpable infractions on the part of the governing power. It is impossible, however, clearly to ascertain every case which shall effect a dissolution of this contract; for these, though always tacitly implied, are never expressly declared, in any form of government.

As a man is bound by the sacred ties of conscience to yield obedience to every act of the legislature so long as the government exists, so, on the other hand, he owes it to the cause of liberty to resist the invasion of those rights which, being inherent and unalienable, could not be surrendered at the institution of the civil society of which he is a member. In times of civil commotions, therefore, an investigation of those rights which will necessarily infer an inquiry into the nature of government, becomes the indispensable duty of every man.

There are perhaps few questions relating to government of more difficulty than that at present subsisting between Great Britain and the Colonies. It originated about the degree of subordination we owe to the British Parliament, but by a rapid progress it seems now to be whether we are members of the empire or not. In this view, the principles of Mr. Locke and other advocates for the rights of mankind are little to the purpose. His treatise throughout presupposes rulers and subjects of the same state, and upon a supposition that we are members of the empire, his reasonings, if not inapplicable, will be found rather to militate against our claims; for he holds the necessity of a supreme power, and the necessary existence of one legislature only in every society, in the strongest terms.

Here arises the doubt: if we are parts of the same state, we cannot complain of a usurpation, unless in a qualified sense, but we must found our resistance upon an undue and oppressive exercise of a power we recognize. In short, our reasonings must resolve into one or the other of the following three grounds, and our right of resistance must be founded upon either the first or third of them; for either, first, we owe no obedience to any acts of Parliament; or, secondly, we are bound by all acts to which British subjects in Great Britain would, if passed with respect to them, owe obedience; or, thirdly, we are subordinate in a certain degree, or, in other words, certain acts may be valid in Britain which are not so here.

Upon the first point I am exceedingly clear in my mind, for I consider the Colonies as members of the British empire, and subordinate to the Parliament. But, with regard to the second and third, I am not so clear. The necessity of a supreme power in every state strikes me very forcibly; at the same time, I foresee the destructive consequences of a right in Parliament to bind us in all cases whatsoever. To obviate the ill effects of either extreme, some middle way should be found out, by which the benefits to the empire should be secured arising from the doctrine of a supreme power, while the abuses of that power to the prejudice of the colonists should be guarded against; and this, I hope, will be the happy effect of the present struggle.

The basis of such a compact must be the securing to the Americans the essential rights of Britons, but so modified as shall best consist with the general benefit of the whole. If upon such a compact we cannot possess the specific privileges of the inhabitants of Great Britain (as for instance a representation in Parliament we cannot), this must not be an obstacle; for there is certainly a point in which the general good of the whole, with the least possible disadvantage to every part, does centre, though it may be difficult to discern it, and every individual part must give way to the general good. . . .

It may be said that these principles terminate in passive obedience: far from it. I perceive that several of the acts exceed those bounds which, of right, ought to circumscribe the Parliament. But my difficulty arises from this, that, taking the whole of the acts complained of together, they do not, I think, manifest a system of slavery, but may fairly be imputed to human frailty and the difficulty of the subject. Most of them seem to have sprung out of particular occasions, and are unconnected with each other, and some of them are precisely of the nature of other acts made before the commencement of his present Majesty's reign, which is the era when the supposed design of subjugating the colonies began. If these acts have exceeded what is and ought to be declared to be the line of right, and thus we have been sufferers in some respects by the undefined state of the subject, it will also, I think, appear from such a union, when established, if past transactions are to be measured by the standard hereafter to be fixed, that we have hitherto been deficient in other respects, and derived benefit from the same unsettled state.

In short, I think those acts may have been passed without a preconceived plan of enslaving us, and it appears to me that the more favorable construction ought ever to be put on the conduct of our rulers. I cannot therefore think the government dissolved; and as long as the society lasts, the power that every individual gave the society when he entered into it can never revert to the individuals again, but will always remain in the community.

If it be asked how we come to be subject to the authority of the British Parliament, I answer, by the same compact which entitles us to the benefits of the British constitution and its laws; and that we derive advantage even from some kind of subordination, whatever the degree of it should be, is evident, because, without such a controlling common umpire, the colonies must become independent states, which would be introductive of anarchy and confusion among ourselves.

Some kind of dependence being then, in my idea, necessary for our own happiness, I would choose to see a claim made of a constitution which shall concede this point, as, before that is done by us and rejected by the mother country, I cannot see any principle of regard for my country which will authorize me in taking up arms, as absolute dependence and independence are two extremes which I would avoid; for, should we succeed in the latter, we shall still be in a sea of uncertainty and have to fight among ourselves for that constitution we aim at.

There are many very weighty reasons besides the above to restrain a man from taking up arms, but some of them are of too delicate a nature to be put upon paper; however, it may be proper to mention what does not restrain me. It is not from apprehension of the consequences should America be subdued, or the hopes of any favor from government, both which I disclaim; nor is it from any disparagement of the cause my countrymen are engaged in, or a desire of obstructing the present measures.

I am fully convinced that men of the greatest abilities and the soundest integrity have taken parts in this war with America, and their measures should have a fair trial. But this is too serious a matter, implicitly to yield to the authority of any characters, however respectable. Every man must exercise his own reason and judge for himself; "for he that appeals to Heaven must be sure that he has right on his side," according to Mr. Locke. It is a question of morality and religion, in which a man cannot conscientiously take an active part without being convinced in his own mind of the justice of the cause; for obedience while government exists being clear on the one hand, the dissolution of the government must be equally so, to justify an appeal to arms; and whatever disagreeable consequences may follow from dissenting from the general voice, yet I cannot but remember that I am to render an account of my conduct before a more awful tribunal, where no man can be justified who stands accused by his own conscience of taking part in measures which, through the distress and bloodshed of his fellow-creatures, may precipitate his country into ruin.

—VAN SCHAACK, Life of Peter Van Schaack, pp. 54-58.

3. JAMES ALLEN OF PHILADELPHIA FINDS IT HARD TO BE NEUTRAL

October 15, 1777 . . . Gen Washington has issued orders to take the blankets, shoes, stockings, etc., of private families for the use of the army. This, together with the licentiousness, plundering, stealing and impressing of the military, will sink this country to perdition. Misery begins to wear her ghastliest form; it is impossible to endure it. Three fourths of my income arises from my estate in Philadelphia, from which I am cut off. My rents here being paid in continental money, which is now depreciated as 6 to 1 and I obliged to pay in all articles four fold—in some, as butter, meat, cheese, etc., nine fold—ruin can't be very distant.

The prevailing idea now is that no man has any property in what the publick has use for, and it is seldom they ask the owner; so wanton is this species of oppression called pressing that if they could by fair means get anything by a little trouble, they chuse to take private property by violence if somewhat nearer at hand. This I have seen in many instances, and felt in my own case. When the hospital and publick works were erected in this little town [Northampton, Pennsylvania], I offered to supply them with wood at a reasonable rate, to avoid being plundered; yet they have hitherto gone on cutting my timber, burning my fences and taking bricks from me, rather than employ some of the many idle men they have in cutting wood.

The militia who occasionally assemble here, and have now met for near a month, plunder without ceremony all who do not turn out in militia; horses, waggons, cows, turkeys are daily brought into town. Yesterday a farmer sold me his whole brood of turkeys and fowls on receiving information that a neighbour, with whom he had a law suit 3 years ago, had informed the militia, who were setting out to take them away. It is probable they will soon plunder me of them, as every night they steal my poultry. The officers of militia never think of punishing them, neither are they able or disposed to do it. It is a fine time to gratify low private revenge, and few opportunities are lost.

My tenants whose rents are due in sterling often pay off arrears of 6 or 7 years in continental money at the old exchange, and yet I dare not object, tho' I am as much robbed of my property as if it was taken out of my drawer.

—ALLEN, "Diary," Penn. Mag. of Hist. and Biog., IX, 295-296.

II. THE RUTH OF CIVIL WAR

The very strength of loyalism in America condemned it to persecution. Had the Loyalists been few in number, weak and disorganized, the Patriots might have ignored them, or have contented themselves with making sure that they could do no harm. But they were numerous and powerful, strong enough at times to take the offensive against the Patriots and endanger the success of the Revolution. It was not, therefore, surprising that even before Independence the Patriots moved to frustrate, intimidate, punish and, if possible, wipe out loyalism. In the fall of 1774 the Provincial Congress of Massachusetts denounced Loyalists as "infamous betrayers of their country," and the Continental Congress in setting up the Association called for a "committee in every county, city and town . . . to observe the conduct of all persons touching this association . . . to the end that all foes to the rights of British America may be publicly known and universally contemned as enemies of American liberty."

It was in fact these self-constituted committees of safety—often the successors of the earlier committees of correspondence and the Liberty Boys—that were the instruments for intimidating Loyalists. Such groups could not be easily controlled, nor was there any assurance that they would operate with a nice regard for justice, or that they would not, on occasion, confuse loyalism with conservatism or Anglicanism, or use their extralegal authority to indulge personal or class grudges. Most of the early violence—breaking windows, whipping, tarring and feathering—was perpetrated by members of these committees and their friends and hangers-on.

Very soon, however, the provincial legislatures gave at least an appearance of legality to the proceedings of these committees. State after state passed test laws, required ostentatious proof of devotion to the Patriot cause, and imposed penalties against loyalism, active and passive alike. In a broad way these laws limited freedom of speech and freedom of movement, disfranchised, suppressed, quarantined or banished Tories, and made adhering to George III a crime punishable by confiscation of property and, in extreme and aggravated cases, by death.

The treatment of the Loyalists was harsh, but harshness has almost always characterized the treatment of those who were on the wrong, or losing, side of a revolution. From the point of view of the Patriots, the Loyalists were traitors and therefore worse than open enemies. Nor can the judicious historian deny that the Patriots had considerable justification for their attitude and their actions. Loyalists were numerous enough to be dangerous; they did in fact give aid to the enemy; many were spies and informers, many more sold food and supplies to the British; thousands fought in the British ranks.

And it cannot fairly be said that Americans were more severe in their treatment of Tories than the British had been in their treatment of the Scots after Culloden, for example, or of the Irish after a long series of uprisings, or than the Austrians had been in their punishment of Italians who rebelled against their rule, or the French in their treatment of other Frenchmen who were not sufficiently extreme in their revolutionary zeal. The administration of the loyalty and security programs in our own day should make us more understanding of the enormously difficult problems that confronted the Patriots during the Revolution.

Indeed what is perhaps most impressive about this melancholy chapter is not the severity but the relative mildness of the Patriots. There was violence, to be sure, but little bloodshed and few authenticated cases of loss of life. Thus while the Pennsylvania "Blacklist" of Loyalists guilty of high treason contained 490 names, only a handful of these were punished, and only two finally hanged. While the New York Committee to Detect Conspiracies tried some 1,000 Loyalist "traitors," over 600 of these were released on bail, and few actually punished. Far more open to criticism is the ruthlessness with which some states applied the policy of confiscation of Tory estates, and it is hard not to suspect that here covetousness rather than patriotism dictated zeal. New York, Pennsylvania, Virginia, North Carolina and other states confiscated large Tory estates. Some of these properties were large and were ultimately acquired by small farmers. Thus Tories unwittingly made their contribution to American economic democracy. Other confiscated holdings were relatively small and were picked up by speculators with ready cash or by neighboring farmers capitalizing on the misfortunes of former friends. As was to be expected, Patriot "insiders" not infrequently profited in such dealings, but it must be borne in mind that the objective of such confiscation measures was to raise cash for the hard-pressed states and to punish notorious Tories, not to bring about economic leveling.

We present here a series of accounts of the mistreatment of Loyalists, from Massachusetts to South Carolina. First an inspirational document which suggests something of how widespread was the net with which to catch Tories—an appeal, rather late in the day, to greed and hatred. All the rest of the documents date from the outbreak of the conflict. Our first witness, Ann Hulton, it will be remembered, was the sister of the Commissioner of Customs of Boston; next come two accounts of the sufferings of Connecticut Loyalists, Dr. Beebe of East Haddam and the Reverend Samuel Peters of Hebron. Third we give a lively picture of conditions in Wilmington, North Carolina, as seen through the highly prejudiced eyes of Janet Schaw, another sister of a Royal official. Captain Alexander Graydon of Pennsylvania is one of the best historians of the Revolution in that state, and this story of the trials of Dr. Kearsley is a familiar one. Lord Campbell's letter to the "good" Lord Dartmouth suggests that Negro slaves suspected of treason fared worse than white Loyalists or traitors. All the misdeeds which the Loyalists relate here were perpetrated by mobs. We include also a sample of what might be called legal—or at least quasi-legal—intimidation: punishment for subversion as provided by committees of safety.

1. "THE TORIES! THE TORIES WILL YET BE THE RUIN OF YOU!"

Appeal to the Inhabitants of Philadelphia, 1779.

Rouse, America! Your danger is great—great from a quarter where you least expect it. The Tories, the Tories will yet be the ruin of you! 'Tis high time they were separated from among you. They are now busy engaged in undermining your liberties. They have a thousand ways of doing it, and they make use of them all. Who were the occasion of this war? The Tories. Who persuaded the tyrant of Britain to prosecute it in a manner before unknown to civilized nations, and shocking even to barbarians? The Tories! Who prevailed on the savages of the wilderness to join the standard of the enemy? The Tories! . . . Who advised and who assisted in burning your towns, ravaging your country and violating the chastity of your women? The Tories! Who are the occasion that thousands of you now mourn the loss of your dearest connections? The Tories. Who have always counteracted the endeavors of Congress to secure the liberties of this country? The Tories! . . . Who take the oaths of allegiance to the States one day and break them the next? The Tories! Who prevent your battalions from being filled? The Tories! Who dissuade from entering the army? The Tories! Who persuade those who have enlisted to desert? The Tories! Who harbor those who do desert? The Tories!

In short, who wish to see us conquered, to see us slaves, to see us hewers of wood and drawers of water? The Tories!

—MOORE, Diary of the American Revolution, II, 166.

2. "THE UNHAPPY WRETCH STILL CRIED: 'CURSE ALL TRAITORS!'"

Ann Hulton to Mrs. Lightbody.

Boston, January 31, 1774

. . . But the most shocking cruelty was exercised a few nights ago, upon a poor old man, a tidesman, one Malcolm. He is reckoned creasy, a quarrel was picked with him, he was afterward taken and tarred and feathered. Theres no law that knows a punishment for the greatest crimes beyond what this is of cruel torture. And this instance exceeds any other before it. He was stript stark naked, one of the severest cold nights this winter, his body covered all over with tar, then with feathers, his arm dislocated in tearing off his cloaths. He was dragged in a cart with thousands attending, some beating him with clubs and knocking him out of the cart, then in again. They gave him several severe whippings, at different parts of the town. This spectacle of horror and sportive cruelty was exhibited for about five hours.

The unhappy wretch they say behaved with the greatest intrepidity and fortitude all the while. Before he was taken, [he] defended himself a long time against numbers, and afterwards when under torture they demanded of him to curse his masters, the King, Governor, etc., which they could not make him do, but he still cried, "Curse all traitors!" They brought him to the gallows and put a rope about his neck, saying they would hang him. He said he wished they would, but that they could not, for God was above the Devil.

The doctors say that it is impossible this poor creature can live. They say his flesh comes off his back in stakes.

It is the second time he has been tarred and feathered and this is looked upon more to intimidate the judges and others than a spite to the unhappy victim tho' they owe him a grudge for some things particularly. He was with Govr. Tryon in the battle with the Regulators and the Governor has declared that he was of great service to him in that affair, by his undaunted spirit encountering the greatest dangers.

Govr. Tryon had sent him a gift of ten guineas just before this inhuman treatment. He has a wife and family and an aged father and mother who, they say, saw the spectacle which no indifferent person can mention without horror.

These few instances amongst many serve to shew the abject state of government and the licentiousness and barbarism of the times. There's no magistrate that dare or will act to suppress the outrages. No person is secure. There are many objects pointed at, at this time, and when once marked out for vengeance, their ruin is certain.

The judges have only a weeks time allowed them to consider whether they will take the salaries from the Crown or no. Govr. Hutchinson is going to England as soon as the season will permit.

We are under no apprehension at present on our own account but we can't look upon our safety secure for long.

3. "THE NEW FASHION DRESS OF TAR AND FEATHERS"

Joseph Spencer to Governor Trumbull.

East Haddam, [Connecticut], September 14, 1774

Honoured Sir: Doctor Beebe, who will deliver this, will wait on your Honour in hopes of the favour of your Honour's advice with respect to an unhappy affair that concerns himself. The zeal of people here, in general, runs very high for what is called Liberty; and there being a few amongst us that don't agree with the rest, who are called Tories, many people here have thought proper to visit the Tories and demand some satisfaction with relation to their principles and practices; and they have accordingly visited several in this society, and I think they have, except Doctor Beebe, given them satisfaction. They have, a large number of them, visited the Doctor this week, and he refused to say any thing that gave satisfaction, and the people have been so rough with him as to give him the new fashion dress of tar and feathers; and he thinks himself extremely abused, and has been desirous that I would grant surety of the peace against a few of them, but I declined; he seems to think he is obliged, in duty, to prosecute some of them; but, however, has finally applied to your Honour for advice as to the necessity or expediency of his prosecuting in this case.

I hope also, myself, to have your Honour's advice as to my duty with respect to signing a precept for the Doctor in this case. I believe if one should be granted, it will not be executed to any advantage without force from abroad to govern our people; for although these rough measures lately taken place with us are contrary to my mind, yet I am not able to prevent it at present.

I am, honoured sir, your Honour's most obedient and humble servant,

JOSEPH SPENCER

4. THE MOBS CRY: "DOWN WITH THE CHURCH, THE RAGS OF POPERY!"

The Reverend Samuel Peters to the Reverend Doctor Achmuty of New York.

Boston, October 1, 1774

Reverend Sir: The riots and mobs that have attended me and my house, set on by the Governour of Connecticut, have compelled me to take up my abode here; and the clergy of Connecticut must fall a sacrifice, with the several churches, very soon to the rage of the puritan nobility, if the old serpent, that dragon, is not bound. Yesterday I waited on his Excellency, the Admiral, etc., Doctor Canner, Mr. Troutbeck, Doctor Byles, etc. I am soon to sail for England; I shall stand in great need of your letters, and the letters of the clergy of New-York; direct to Mr. Rice Williams, woollen draper, in London, where I shall put up. Judge Achmuty, etc., etc., will do all things reasonable for the neighbouring charter; necessity calls for such friendship, as the head is sick and the heart faint, and spiritual iniquity rides in high places with halberts, pistols and swords. See the Proclamation I send you by my nephew, and their pious Sabbath day, the 4th of last month, when the preachers and magistrates left the pulpits, etc., for the gun and drum, and set off for Boston, cursing the King and Lord North, General Gage, the Bishops and their cursed Curates, and the Church of England. And for my telling the church people not to take up arms, etc., it being high treason, etc., the Sons of Liberty have almost killed one of my church, tarred and feathered two, abused others; and on the sixth day destroyed my windows, and rent my clothes, even my gown, etc., crying out, "Down with the church, the rags of Popery," etc. Their rebellion is obvious; treason is common; and robbery is their daily diversion; the Lord deliver us from anarchy! The bounds of New-York may directly extend to Connecticut River, Boston meet them, and New-Hampshire take the Province of Maine, and Rhode Island be swallowed up as Dathan. Pray lose no time, nor fear worse times than attend,

Reverend sir, your very humble servant,

SAMUEL PETERS

5. JANET SCHAW SEES THE OBEDIENT SONS OF BRITANNIA INSULTED

Wilmington, North Carolina, [June 1775]

Good heavens, what a scene this town is! Surely you folks at home have adopted the old maxim of King Charles: "Make friends of your foes, leave friends to shift for themselves."

We came down in the morning in time for the review, which the heat made as terrible to the spectators as to the soldiers, or what you please to call them. They had certainly fainted under it, had not the constant draughts of grog supported them. Their exercise was that of bush-fighting, but it appeared so confused and so perfectly different from any thing I ever saw,

I cannot say whether they performed it well or not; but this I know, that they were heated with rum till capable of committing the most shocking outrages. We stood in the balcony of Doctor Cobham's house and they were reviewed on a field mostly covered with what are called here scrubby oaks, which are only a little better than brushwood. They at last however assembled on the plain field, and I must really laugh while I recollect their figures: 2000 men in their shirts and trousers, preceded by a very ill beat-drum and a fiddler, who was also in his shirt with a long sword and a cue at his hair, who played with all his might. They made indeed a most unmartial appearance. But the worst figure there can shoot from behind a bush and kill even a General Wolfe.

Before the review was over, I heard a cry of tar and feather. I was ready to faint at the idea of this dreadful operation. I would have gladly quitted the balcony, but was so much afraid the victim was one of my friends that I was not able to move; and he indeed proved to be one, tho' in a humble station. For it was Mr. Neilson's poor English groom. You can hardly conceive what I felt when I saw him dragged forward, poor devil, frightened out of his wits. However at the request of some of the officers, who had been Neilson's friends, his punishment was changed into that of mounting on a table and begging pardon for having smiled at the regiment. He was then drummed and fiddled out of town, with a strict prohibition of ever being seen in it again.

One might have expected that, tho' I had been imprudent all my life, the present occasion might have inspired me with some degree of caution, and yet I can tell you I had almost incurred the poor groom's fate from my own folly. Several of the officers came up to dine, amongst others Colonel Howe, who with less ceremony than might have been expected from his general politeness stepped into an apartment adjoining the hall and took up a book I had been reading, which he brought open in his hand into the company. I was piqued at his freedom, and reproved him with a half compliment to his general good breeding. He owned his fault and with much gallantry promised to submit to whatever punishment I would inflict. You shall only, said I, read aloud a few pages which I will point out, and I am sure you will do Shakespear justice. He bowed and took the book, but no sooner observed that I had turned up for him that part of Henry the fourth where Falstaff describes his company, than he coloured like scarlet. I saw he made the application instantly; however he read it thro', tho' not with the vivacity he generally speaks; however he recovered himself and, coming close up to me, whispered, "You will certainly get yourself tarred and feathered; shall I apply to be executioner?"

I am going to seal this up. Adieu.

I closed my last packet at Doctor Cobham's after the review, and as I hoped to hear of some method of getting it sent to you, stayed, tho' Miss Rutherford was obliged to go home. As soon as she was gone, I went into the town, the entry of which I found closed up by a detachment of the soldiers; but as the officer immediately made way for me, I took no further notice of it, but advanced to the middle of the street, where I found a number of the first people in town standing together, who (to use Milton's phrase) seemed much impassioned. As most of them were my acquaintances, I stopped to speak to them, but they with one voice begged me for heaven's sake to get off the street, making me observe they were prisoners, adding that every avenue of the town was shut up, and that in all human probability some scene would be acted very unfit for me to witness. I could not take the friendly advice, for I became unable to move and absolutely petrified with horror.

Observing however an officer with whom I had just dined, I beckoned him to me. He came, but with no very agreeable look, and on my asking him what was the matter, he presented a paper he had folded in his hand. "If you will persuade them to sign this they are at liberty," said he, "but till then must remain under this guard, as they must suffer the penalties they have justly incurred."

"And we will suffer every thing," replied one of them, "before we abjure our king, our country and our principles. This, ladies," said he turning to me, who was now joined by several ladies, "is what they call their Test, but by what authority this gentleman forces it on us, we are yet to learn."

"There is my authority," pointing to the soldiers with the most insolent air; "dispute it, if you can."

Oh Britannia, what are you doing, while your true obedient sons are thus insulted by their unlawful brethren; are they also forgot by their natural parents?

6. HOW PHILADELPHIANS DEALT WITH TORIES

Memoirs of Alexander Graydon.

August, 1775

Among the disaffected in Philadelphia, Doctor Kearsley was pre-eminently ardent and rash. An extremely zealous Loyalist, and impetuous in his temper, he had given much umbrage to the whigs; and if I am not mistaken, he had been detected in some hostile machinations. Hence he was deemed a proper subject for the fashionable punishment of tarring, feathering and carting. He was seized at his own door by a party of the militia, and, in the attempt to resist them, received a wound in his hand from a bayonet. Being overpowered, he was placed in a cart provided for the purpose, and amidst a multitude of boys and idlers, paraded through the streets to the tune of the rogue's march. I happened to be at the coffee-house when the concourse arrived there. They made a halt, while the Doctor, foaming with rage and indignation, without his hat, his wig dishevelled and bloody from his wounded hand, stood up in the cart and called for a bowl of punch. It was quickly handed to him; when so vehement was his thirst that he drained it of its contents before he took it from his lips.

What were the feelings of others on this lawless proceeding, I know not, but mine, I must confess, revolted at the spectacle. I was shocked at seeing a lately respected citizen so cruelly vilified, and was imprudent enough to say that, had I been a magistrate, I would, at every hazard, have interposed my authority in suppression of the outrage. But this was not the only instance which convinced me that I wanted nerves for a revolutionist. It must be admitted, however, that the conduct of the populace was marked by a lenity which peculiarly distinguished the cradle of our republicanism. Tar and feathers had been dispensed with, and excepting the injury he had received in his hand, no sort of violence was offered by the mob to their victim. But to a man of high spirit, as the Doctor was, the indignity in its lightest form was sufficient to madden him: it probably had this effect, since his conduct became so extremely outrageous that it was thought necessary to confine him. From the city he was soon after removed to Carlisle, where he died during the war.

A few days after the carting of Mr. Kearsley, Mr. Isaac Hunt, the attorney, was treated in the same manner, but he managed the matter much better than his precursor. Instead of braving his conductors like the Doctor, Mr. Hunt was a pattern of meekness and humility; and at every halt that was made, he rose and expressed his acknowledgments to the crowd for their forbearance and civility. After a parade of an hour or two, he was set down at his own door, as uninjured in body as in mind. He soon after removed to one of the islands—if I mistake not, to Barbadoes—where, it was understood, he took orders.

Not long after these occurrences, Major Skene of the British Army ventured to show himself in Philadelphia. Whatever might have been his inducement to the measure, it was deemed expedient by the newly constituted authorities to have him arrested and secured. A guard was accordingly placed over him at his lodgings at the city tavern. The officer to whose charge he was especially committed was Mr. Francis Wade, the brewer, an Irishman of distinguished zeal in the cause, and one who was supposed to possess talents peculiarly befitting him for the task of curbing the spirit of a haughty Briton, which Skene undoubtedly was.

I well recollect the day that the guard was paraded to escort him out of the city on his way to some other station. An immense crowd of spectators stood before the door of his quarters, and lined the street through which he was to pass. The weather being warm, the window sashes of his apartment were raised, and Skene, with his bottle of wine upon the table, having just finished his dinner, roared out in the voice of a Stentor, "God save great George our king!" Had the spirit of seventy-five in any degree resembled the spirit of Jacobinism, to which it has been unjustly compared, this bravado would unquestionably have brought the Major to the lamp-post, and set his head upon a pike; but as, fortunately for him, it did not, he was suffered to proceed with his song, and the auditory seemed more generally amused than offended.

7. "A POOR MAN WAS TARRED AND FEATHERED TEN TIMES"

Lord William Campbell to Lord Dartmouth.

Charlestown [S. C.], August 19, 1775

... This is a very disagreeable subject for me to dwell on, but my duty requires I should represent the true state of this Province, and of my unfortunate vicinage of N. Carolina, and Georgia, which is equally neglected, equally abandoned. Your Lordship will, I am sure, excuse my warmth when I acquaint that yesterday under colour of law they hanged and burned an unfortunate wretch, a free Negro of considerable property, one of the most valuable and useful men in his way in the Province, on suspicion of instigating an insurrection, for which I am convinced there was not the least ground.

I could not save him, my Lord! the very reflection harrows my soul! I have only the comfort to think I left no means untried to preserve him.

They have now dipt their hands in blood. God Almighty knows where it will end, but I am determined to remain till the last extremity in hope to promote the King's service, tho my familys being here adds not a little to my distress.

Another act of barbarity, tho happily of not so tragical a nature, was committed a few days ago on a poor man, the gunner of Fort Johnson, who for expressing his loyalty was tarred and feathered 10 or 12 times, in different parts of the town, and otherwise treated with great cruelty, stopping him at the doors of those Crown officers who were most obnoxious; and the mob so grossly insulted Mr. Milligan, in particular, who is surgeon to the forts and garrisons in this Province, that he was under a necessity of taking refuge on board the King's ship till the packet boat sails.

8. TAR AND FEATHERS MAKE THOMAS RANDOLPH REPENT

From the records of the Committee of Safety.

New York, December 28, 1775

The 6th of December, at Quibbletown, Middlesex County, Piscataway Township, New-Jersey, Thomas Randolph, cooper, who had publicly proved himself an enemy to his country, by reviling and using his utmost endeavours to oppose the proceedings of the Continental and Provincial Conventions and Committees, in defence of their rights and liberties; and he, being judged a person of not consequence enough for a severer punishment, was ordered to be stripped naked, well coated with tar and feathers, and carried in a wagon publicly round the town; which punishment was accordingly inflicted. And as he soon became duly sensible of his offence, for which he earnestly begged pardon, and promised to atone, as far as he was able, by a contrary behaviour for the future, he was released, and suffered to return to his house in less than half an hour. The whole was conducted with that regularity and decorum that ought to be observed in all publick punishments.

III. THE PROPRIETY AND LEGALITY OF LOYALTY OATHS

Most of the provincial assemblies had recourse to loyalty oaths at an early stage in the controversy with the mother country. The Massachusetts Provincial Congress, for example, required a special loyalty test for the "Governours and Instructors" of Harvard College. Many Loyalists managed to evade the requirement; many others, doubtless, took it under duress; here and there some refused to take it on principle, and their arguments against the legality and justice of the special loyalty oath are of lively interest to us today.

Even before the Declaration of Independence, Rhode Island passed a test act which provided that any male inhabitant over sixteen years of age "suspected of being inimical to the United American Colonies" might be summoned before a member of the Assembly and required to subscribe to an oath of loyalty. In July 1776 additional acts provided a fine of £100 on any person who persisted in acknowledging George III, and forfeiture of the right to vote and other rights of citizenship. No sooner were these acts on the law books than officers of the Rhode Island Brigade presented the Assembly with a list of 77 inhabitants of Newport suspected of being Loyalists. Among these were four Jews. They were promptly called before the Assembly and according to its proceedings, Rabbi Isaac de Abraham Touro appeared and refused to sign the test as he had not been naturalized and it is against his Religious Principles and likewise he is a subject to the States of Holland. Isaac Hart refused to sign the test until it was required of all alike. Meyer Pollock refused to sign because it was contrary to the custom of Jews.

But it was the fourth, Moses M. Hays, who raised the issue of principle most elaborately. We give here the report of the Committee on Suspected Persons on his appearance before it, and his own petition to the Assembly.

No less interesting is the argument formulated by Peter Van Schaack, whom we have already met earlier in this chapter. Persuasive as it was, it was not accepted; yet the New York authorities permitted Van Schaack to live on at Kinderhook, on parole, and to leave the next year for England.

It should be added that loyalty oaths were also imposed by the British military authorities, and that such an oath was reputed to have been taken under duress by Richard Stockton, a Signer, when he was captured by the British.

1. MOSES HAYS REFUSES TO TAKE A LOYALTY OATH

[July 1, 1776]

Report of the Rhode Island Committee on Suspected Persons.

He refused to sign the Test and called for his accusers. He was then told there was a number present whom he saw there. He likewise called for his accusation which was read.

"I have and ever shall hold the strongest principles and attachments to the just rights and privileges of this my native land, and ever have and shall conform to the rules and acts of this government and pay as I always have my proportion of its exigencies. I always have asserted my sentiments in favor of America and confess the war on its part just.

"I decline subscribing the Test at present from these principles: first, that I deny ever being inimical to my country and call for my accusers and proof of conviction. Second, that I am an Israelite and am not allowed the liberty of a vote, or voice in common with the rest of the voters though consistent with the Constitution and the other Colonies. Thirdly, because the Test is not general and consequently subject to many glaring inconveniences. Fourthly, Continental Congress nor the General Assembly of this nor the Legislatures of the other Colonies have never in this contest taken any notice or countenance respecting the society of Israelites to which I belong. When any rule, order or directions is made by the Congress or General Assembly I shall to the utmost of my power adhere to the same."

To the Honorable the General Assembly of Rhode Island Now Sitting at New Port:

New Port, July 17, 1776

Moses M. Hays of New Port begs leave humbly to represent to your honors that he hath ever been warmly and zealously attacht to the rights and liberties of the colonies and ever uniformly conducted himself consistant with the rest of the good and friendly people of these colonies, and always despised inimicall principles, and as farr as one person can testify for another, numbers of creditable persons can testify. Yet on the 12th inst. was cited by the sheriff to appear at the court house on that same day at 2 o'clock in the afternoon when I attended accordingly, and being called was informed by your honorable speaker that an information had been lodged against me among a number of persons of being inimicall to the country (Mr. Sears, Mr. Fowler and Mr. Geo. Wanton and some officers present). I denied and do still deny holding or entertaining such principles, and desired to know my accusers and accusations.

I was answered by Mr. Bowles reading a paper purporting to be a complaint from the officers that there were many suspected inimicall persons in town and naming them; desired they might be called on. And no other allegations appearing against me I declined signing the Test then for reasons I gave in writing, which will no doubt be laid before your honors and trust they will appear justifiable.

I ask of your Honors the rights and privileges due other free citizens when I conform to everything generally done and acted and again implore that the justice of your Honors may interfere in my behalf and will give me leave again to call for the cause and my accusation of inimicalty, that I may have an opportunity of vindication before your Honors. I am with great respect

Your Honors most obedient and humble servant,

M. M. HAYS

2. THE TEST OATH IS ILLEGAL AND ILLOGICAL

Peter Van Schaack to the Provincial Convention.

Kinderhook, 25th January, 1777

Gentlemen:

I am now about setting out, conformably to the sentence of your Committee, to make the town of Boston my prison, to which I am condemned by them unheard, upon a charge of maintaining an equivocal neutrality in the present struggles. How far the punishment of banishment for this can be justified, either by the practice of other nations or upon those principles on which alone legitimate governments are founded, and how far it answers those ends, which alone make punishments a lawful exercise of power, I shall not at present inquire; but as it implies that your committee considers me as a subject of your State, it behooves me, gentlemen, "to address you with that freedom which can never give offence to the representatives of a free people."

When I appeared before the Albany committee, I refused to answer the question whether I considered myself as a subject of Great Britain or of the State of New York, because I perceived the dilemma in which it would involve me, of either bringing punishment on myself, in consequence of my own declaration, or of taking an oath which, if I had been never so clear respecting the propositions it contains under the circumstances it was offered to me, and in my present situation I should not have taken.

The reasons peculiar to myself I shall not urge; but, supposing the independency of this State to be clearly established, I conceive it is premature to tender an oath of allegiance before the government to which it imposes subjection, the time it is to take place of the present exceptionable one, and who are to be the rulers, as well as the mode of their appointment in future, are known; . . .

But, gentlemen, admitting there was never so clear a majority in favor of independency, and who were convinced that they were absolved from their allegiance, and admitting that you are now vested with powers to form a new government by the suffrages of a majority of the people of this State; permit me to observe that those who are of different sentiments, be they never so few, are not absolutely concluded in point of right thereby. The question whether a government is dissolved and the people released from their allegiance is, in my opinion, a question of morality as well as religion, in which every man must judge, as he must answer for himself; and this idea is fairly held up to the public in your late address, wherein you declare "that every individual must one day answer for the part he now acts." If he must answer for the part he acts, which certainly presupposes the right of private judgement, he can never be justifiable in the sight of God or man if he acts against the light of his own conviction. In such a case no majority, however respectable, can decide for him.

But, admitting that a man is never so clear about the dissolution of the old government, I hold it that every individual has still a right to choose the State of which he will become a member; for before he surrenders any part of his natural liberty, he has a right to know what security he will have for the enjoyment of the residue, and "men being by nature free, equal and independent," the subjection of any one to the political power of a State can arise only from "his own consent." I speak of the formation of society and of a man's initiating himself therein, so as to make himself a member of it; for I admit that when once the society is formed, the majority of its members undoubtedly conclude the rest.

Upon these principles, I hold it that you cannot justly put me to the alternative of choosing to be a subject of Great Britain, or of this State, because should I deny subjection to Great Britain, it would not follow that I must necessarily be a member of the State of New York; on the contrary, I should still hold that I had a right, by the "immutable laws of nature," to choose any other State of which I would become a member. And, gentlemen, if you think me so dangerous a man as that my liberty at home is incompatible with the public safety, I now claim it at your hands as my right that you permit me to remove from your State into any other I may prefer, in which case I reserve to myself the power of disposing my property by sale or otherwise. . . .

If my principles are ill-founded, or misapplied, I shall readily retract my errors when pointed out; but if they are founded on the immutable laws of nature and the sacred rights of mankind, if they are such as are generally acknowledged by writers of the greatest eminence, and if they are necessarily connected with the same principles on which the American opposition is justified, I trust they will readily be admitted by you, though urged by an extra-judicial way, but are clearly connected with my defence, on a charge which has been thought of importance enough to subject me to banishment from my native place. . . .

IV. THE RISING TIDE OF FURY

After the Declaration of Independence not only the popular but what might be called the official attitude toward Tories became increasingly virulent. The most interesting thing about this collection of letters is not the extreme severity of the opinions expressed, but the dignity and distinction of those who were prepared to be so ruthless. Hawley and Sam Adams were, from the beginning, implacable in their devotion to independence and their hatred of loyalism; but Patrick Henry had wavered a bit on independence; Gouverneur Morris, like his colleagues Jay and Duane, had wavered and temporized; and Governor Livingston, though an ardent Patriot, was an aristocrat and a gentleman. This particular letter of his concerned an appeal by the Loyalist Philip Schuyler, member of a family as famous as Livingston's, to return to his New Jersey home.

1. MAJOR HAWLEY WANTS DEATH FOR ALL TORIES

Joseph Hawley to Elbridge Gerry.

Dear Sir: I have often said that I supposed a Declaration of Independence would be accompanied with a declaration of high treason. Most certainly it must immediately, and without the least delay, follow it. Can we subsist—did any State ever subsist, without exterminating traitors? I never desire to see high treason extended here further than it is now extended in Britain. But an act of high treason we must have instantly. The Colonies have long suffered inexpressibly for want of it. No one thing made the Declaration of Independence indispensably necessary more than cutting off traitors. It is amazingly wonderful that, having no capital punishment for our intestine enemies, we have not been utterly ruined before now. For God's sake, let us not run such risks a day longer! It appears to me, sir, that high treason ought to be the same in all the United States, saving to the legislature of each Colony or State the right of attainting individuals by act or bill of attainder. The present times show most clearly the wisdom and sound policy of the common law in that doctrine, or part thereof, which consists in attainting by an act of the whole legislature. Our Tories (be sure the learned of them) knew very well the absurdity of punishing as high treason any acts or deeds in favour of the Government of the King of Great Britain, so long as we all allowed him to be King of the Colonies.

Dear Sir, this matter admits of no delay; and when the act declaratory of high treason is passed, the strongest recommendation for a strict execution of it, I humbly conceive, ought to accompany it. Our whole cause is every moment in amazing danger for want of it. The common understanding of the people, like unerring instinct, has long declared this; and from the clear discerning which they have had of it, they have been long in agonies about it. They expect that effectual care will now be taken for the general safety, and that all those who shall be convicted of endeavouring, by overt act, to destroy the State, shall be cut off from the earth.

2. "REVOLUTIONS ARE SELDOM ACHIEVED WITHOUT CALAMITY"

Gouverneur Morris to his mother [a Loyalist].

December 19, 1776

I am sorry it is not in my power to see you at present. I know it is your wish that I were removed from public affairs; indeed, as far as relates to my own ease and enjoyments, I wish so too. But I know it is the duty of every good citizen or man to preserve that post in which by a superior order he is placed. Where the happiness of a considerable part of our fellow creatures is deeply concerned, we soon feel the insignificancy of an individual. And whatever lot that individual shall experience, while a conscious rectitude of conduct inspires and supports him, though he may be unfortunate, he cannot be miserable.

What may be the event of the present war, it is not in man to determine. Great revolutions of empire are seldom achieved without much human calamity; but the worst which can happen is to fall on the last bleak mountain of America, and he who dies there, in defence of the injured rights of mankind, is happier than his conqueror, more beloved of mankind, more applauded by his own heart.

—SPARKS, Life of Gouverneur Morris, I, 22.

3. MORE IS TO BE FEARED FROM THE LOYALISTS THAN THE BRITISH!

Samuel Adams to James Warren.

Baltimore, February 16, 1777

My Dear Sir,—A few days ago a small expedition was made by the authority of this State aided by a detachment of Continental Regulars, to suppress the Tories in the Counties of Somerset and Worcester on the Eastern Shore of Chesapeake, where they are numerous and have arisen to a great pitch of violence. We this day have a rumour that one of their principals, a Doctor Cheyney, is taken and we hope to hear of the business being effectually done, very soon. In my opinion, much more is to be apprehended from the secret machinations of these rascally people than from the open violence of British and Hessian soldiers, whose success has been in a great measure owing to the aid they have received from them.

You know that the Tories in America have always acted upon one system. Their head quarters used to be at Boston—more lately at Philadelphia. They have continually embarrassed the publick councils there and afforded intelligence, advice and assistance to General Howe. Their influence is extended throughout the United States. Boston has its full share of them, and yet I do not hear that measures have been taken to suppress them. On the contrary, I am informed that the citizens are grown so polite as to treat them with tokens of civility and respect. Can a man take fire into his bosom and not be burned? Your Massachusetts Tories communicate with the enemy in Britain as well as New York. They give and receive intelligence, from whence they early form a judgment of their measures. I am told they discovered an air of insolent triumph in their countenances, and saucily enjoyed the success of Howe's forces in Jersey before it happened.

Indeed, my friend, if measures are not soon taken, and the most vigorous ones, to root out these pernicious weeds, it will be in vain for America to persevere in this generous struggle for the publick liberty. . . .

—Warren-Adams Letters, I, 291-292.

4. GOVERNOR PATRICK HENRY EXERCISES POWERS NOT GIVEN BY LAW

To Benjamin Harrison, Speaker of the House of Delegates.

May 25, 1779

Sir: A certain Zechariah Snead was detected going secretly to the British flag vessels, and, being examined and found to lay under very strong suspicions of disaffection, has been ordered to gaol. A few days ago, a person calling her self Letitia Fitzgerald appeared in this city; her husband, she pretends, is the eldest son of the Duke of Leinster, was apprehended in the Nansemond County and was under examination for treasonable practices, when the enemy entered Suffolk and released him. A great variety of circumstances concur to induce a belief that this is a dangerous woman, and that she came hither with some wicked intention. She was therefore sent to gaol also.

The Executive having in these two instances exercised a power not expressly given them by law, I take this method of informing the legislature of it, and have only to add that apprehension for the public safety is the sole reason for the proceeding.

I am, Sir, Your most humble servant,
P. HENRY

—WIRT, Life of Henry, III, 242.

5. GOVERNOR LIVINGSTON NEVER WANTS THE LOYALISTS BACK

William Livingston to Robert Livingston.

Trenton, April 22, 1782

Dear Brother,

I have just now received your letter of the 12th instant, desiring my passport for Mr. Philip Schuyler to come from New York to Second River, and for the two Miss Schuylers to go thither and fetch him. I am persuaded that I need use no arguments to convince either you, or Sister Livingston, of the particular pleasure it would give me to oblige her in any request that was consistent with my duty to this State to grant. But the present is not in that predicament. I have never given any permission for a person to return into this State who had voluntarily left our lines to go into those of the enemy, as I am informed this gentleman has done. Such people have had an opportunity to make their election. They have made it. They must abide by the event of their choice; and we do not want them back again. Nor have I ever granted a permission for their relations living amongst us, to visit them in the enemys lines. This rule I have inviolably adhered to, in opposition to the warmest solicitations of my nearest connections, having in similar cases refused the applications of Lady Stirling, Sister Alida Hoffman, and the children of Mrs. Van Horne.

I am sensible that in particular instances the rule might be counter acted without public detriment, and probably in the case in question the readmission of Mr Schuyler would not prove injurious to the State. But the precedent would be pernicious, and once established no one in like circumstances could be refused without the imputation of partiality; and the fatal consequences that would attend an universal indulgence are too obvious to require an illustration. My relations, I am sure, would not wish me to adopt a measure that would either be prejudicial to the country on the one hand, or expose my administration on the other to be branded with the reproach of partiality to individuals.

I hope, however, that this will not prevent Sister from prosecuting her purpose of coming into New-Jersey to see her friends and relations, who, I dare say, will be glad to see her; and I believe none more so than my family at Elizabeth Town. If she inquires about the proper rout as she comes on, I believe she will be in no danger from the enemy. . . .

I doubt whether we shall have a peace this summer, as the ultra-atlantic blockheads will probably try another campaign, which will only redound to our advantage by bringing them so much the lower, and the winter I suppose will be consumed in negotiation. But next spring I believe we must have it, as the people of England, among many other reasons that inspire that hope, are turning Liberty Boys in shoals, and are determined, whether the royal fool will hear or not, to beseige his throne with petitions and remonstrances against the farther prosecution of the war. Scotland itself, even the land of rebellion and loyalty, is running into associations and committees and drawing the most spirited remonstrances for putting an immediate period to the American war, in order to prevent the utter ruin of Great Britain. What think you of Congress now! Rivington owes me one of his ears; and I suppose Governor Clinton claims the other; and as the fellow has but two the public may take his head.

I am your affectionate brother and humble servant,

WIL: LIVINGSTON

V. TORY DEFIANCE

Loyalists took the offensive not only in military but in verbal battle. We have already seen something of the Loyalist argument; we present here a few examples of what might be called Loyalist defiance. The letters speak for themselves; it is sufficient that we introduce, here, the speakers. Peter Oliver—already an old man when the conflict with the mother country broke out—was a distinguished member of one of the Bay Colony's distinguished families. A graduate of Harvard College, he had been appointed chief justice of the colony in 1771; a member of the Hutchinson circle, he was a councillor and then a "mandamus" councillor, who enjoyed the distinction of impeachment by an outraged General Court. Oliver sailed with Gage to England where Oxford promptly gave him a degree of Doctor of Civil Laws. Jonathan Sewall (or, as he later spelled it, Sewell) is best known to us through the Diary of John Adams. A graduate of Harvard College, he was for long intimate with Adams, who counted him his closest friend. Personal resentment against the General Court apparently turned Sewall from his earlier ardent attachment to the colonial cause; he attached himself to the Hutchinson-Oliver group, was made attorney general, and like Oliver sailed for England in 1775 where he eventually settled in Bristol. Adams said of him that "he possessed a lively wit, a pleasing humor, brilliant imagination, a great subtlety of reasoning and an insinuating eloquence."

Jacob Duché was an Anglican preacher who found revolutionary violence and separation from England not to his taste. Member of an old Philadelphia family, brother-in-law to Francis Hopkinson, he had studied at Cambridge University and formed sentimental ties to England. At the beginning of the Revolutionary struggle, however, Duché was an ardent and eloquent Patriot, and chaplain to the Continental Congress. When Howe captured Philadelphia he promptly put the Reverend Mr. Duché in jail, and there, apparently, Duché experienced a change of mind or of heart. This famous letter was the product of that change. Ostracized for his apostasy, Duché left for England in December 1777, but his heart was in America, and he never reconciled himself to his exile. Not until 1792 did Pennsylvania permit him to return to his old home. Still inclined to sudden conversions, he was at the end of his life converted to Swedenborgianism.

Jonathan Odell, like Jacob Duché, was an Anglican clergyman who, curiously enough, had served in his day as a surgeon in the British Army. On the outbreak of the war he took refuge with the British in New York where he was made army chaplain, secretary to General Carleton, and served as a go-between in negotiations between André and Arnold. This indictment of Washington was part of a longer poem, "The American Times," published in Rivington's Royal Gazette. Odell departed with the British at the end of the war, and lived out his life in New Brunswick.

1. PETER OLIVER POINTS OUT THAT HEAVEN PUNISHES ALL REBELS
To Polly Hutchinson, his sister-in-law.

Boston, May 26th, 1775

My Dear Polly,—

The only satisfaction that absent friends can receive from each other is by intercourse in an epistolary way. This intercourse hath been interrupted by the Sons of Anarchy, and is like to be a short time to come, but I have great reason to think not much longer, for yesterday arrived three approved generals—Howe, Clinton and Burgoyne, who are to be followed (and who are expected in a few days) by 5 or 6000 troops from Ireland, with a regiment of horse; so that we shall have here 13 or 14000 well disciplined troops, when the campaign will be opened by 5 as fine general officers as perhaps are in the King's service. They expected in England that we were in a much better situation than we are, or more would have been sent. But I can assure you from the best and undoubted authority that the English nation were never more united than they are now against the Americans; and that force of ships, men and money are now devoted to support the dignity of Great Britain; and I have good reason to think that when the news of the late battle arrives, which I suppose is now arrived in England, that we shall have this summer 20 or 30 thousand over, and somebody must pay for them.

What miseries must attend a conquest or no conquest! They plunder the properties of all the friends of Government, and the public must pay for them. They boast of their numbers, but their numbers grow tired: they say their leaders have deceived them, and they are uneasy. A person who hath been active for years past in the defection sent to me to-day to intercede for him, and is almost distracted; another of the like stamp sent to me to get his house excepted from the ravages of the troops when they go out, but he is fled himself out of the Province.

I feel the miseries which impend over my country: may Heaven avert them by the people's being convinced of the horrid crime of rebellion, before it is too late! The God of Order may punish a community for a time with their own disorders, but it is incompatible with the rectitude of the Divine Nature to suffer anarchy to prevail. Observe, my dear, the course of Providence: the first and grand incendiary is now marked out as a madman; Molineaux is supposed to have died an unnatural death; Mr. Bowdoin is not far from dying; Pitts not likely to continue long; Denny, it is said, is ill with a mortification in his leg; Hancock is thought to be ruined in his large fortune; Lee, of Marblehead, is dead, and after the battle was frightened, and continued so till he died; I am informed that Hawley has guards about him to prevent his injuring himself. . . .

Yours Affectionately,

PETER OLIVER

2. A MASSACHUSETTS LOYALIST BIDS HIS AMERICAN FRIENDS TREMBLE

Jonathan Sewall to John Foxcroft.

London, March 14, 1775

Dear Johnny,

Don't be frightened at seeing a letter from an old tory friend, lest it should come under the inspection of your high and mighty committees, as I suppose will be the case in your free and independent state. I hereby declare I have never received a line from you since I left Cambridge, August 31, 1774, excepting one while I was at Boston relative to two gowns which Molly H. stole from my wife, of which I desired you to make enquiry, and this is the first scrip I have attempted to you since the said date, so that you can't be charged with holding a correspondence with me. Thus much to prevent any mistakes which might expose you to the perils of tarring and feathering, Simsbury mines, a gaol or a galows.

I presume it can give no offence to committees, congresses, parsons, or generals that I embrace a favourable, or rather a possible opportunity of advising you that I am yet in the land of the living, though very probably they may all be offended at the fact; but to ease their gall-bladders a little, I assure you and them, I hope in God I shall not live to see the day when America shall become independent of Great Britain. I suppose by this time you have entered so thoroughly into their mad scheme that it will afford you no pleasure to hear your quondam friends on this side of the Atlantic are well. However, I will mortify you by assuring you they are all in good health and spirits, and government has liberally supplied the wants of all the tory refugees who needed its assistance; and none here entertains the penumbra of a doubt how the game will end. No more does pious, frank, single-eyed, conscientious Dr. Elliot, you will say. Aye, I have seen his letters and compared them with two or three conversations he had with me between Charlestown Ferry and the college, not long before my flight. Well, duplicity may be justified on some principles for aught I know; but I don't like it. . . .

I should like to take one peep at my house, but I suppose I should not know it again. Sic transit gloria mundi. I shan't break my heart about it. Every dog they say has his day, and I doubt not I shall have mine. Ah, my old friend, could you form a just idea of the immense wealth and power of the British nation, you would tremble at the foolish audacity of your pigmy states. Another summer will bring you all over to my opinion. I feel for the miseries hastening on my countrymen, but they must thank their own folly. God bless and carry you safe through!

3. WASHINGTON IMPILORED TO LEAD THE COLONIES BACK TO BRITAIN

The Reverend Jacob Duché to George Washington.

Philadelphia, October 8, 1777

. . . And now, my dear Sir, suffer me in the language of truth and real affection to address myself to you. All the world must be convinced that you are engaged in the service of your country from motives perfectly disinterested. You risked every thing that was dear to you. You abandoned all those sweets of domestic life of which your affluent fortune gave you the uninterrupted enjoyment. But had you? could you have had the least idea of matters being carried to such a dangerous extremity as they are now? Your most intimate friends at that time shuddered at the thoughts of a separation from the mother country; and I took it for granted that your sentiments coincided with theirs. What have been the consequences of this rash and violent measure? A degeneracy of representation—confusion of counsels—blunders without number. The most respectable characters have withdrawn themselves, and are succeeded by a great majority of illiberal and violent men.

Take an impartial view of the present Congress, and what can you expect from them? Your feelings must be greatly hurt by the representation from your native province. You have no longer a Randolph, a Bland, or a Braxton; . . . Characters now present themselves whose minds can never mingle with your own. Your Harrison alone remains, and he disgusted with his unworthy associates. As to those of my own province, some of them are so obscure that their very names never met my ears before, and others have only been distinguished for the weakness of their understandings and the violence of their tempers. One alone I except from the general charge. . . .

From the New England Provinces can you find one that as a gentleman you could wish to associate with? unless the soft and mild address of Mr. Hancock can atone for his want of every other qualification necessary for the station he fills. Bankrupts, attorneys, and men of desperate fortunes are his colleagues.

Maryland no longer sends a Tilghman and a Protestant Carroll. Carolina has lost its Lynch, and the elder Middleton has retired.

Are the dregs of a Congress then still to influence a mind like yours? These are not the men you engaged to serve. These are not the men that America has chosen to represent her now. Most of them were elected by a little low faction, and the few gentlemen that are among them now well known to be upon the balance and looking up to your hand alone to move the beam. 'Tis you, Sir, and you alone that supports the present Congress. Of this you must be fully sensible. Long before they left Philadelphia, their dignity and consequence was gone. What must it be now, since their precipitate retreat? . . .

After this view of Congress, turn to your army. The whole world knows that its very existence depends upon you, that your death or captivity disperses it in a moment, and that there is not a man on that side of the question in America, capable of succeeding you. As to the army itself, what have you to expect from them? Have they not frequently abandoned even yourself in the hour of extremity? Have you, can you have, the least confidence in a set of undisciplined men and officers, many of whom have been taken from the lowest of the people, without principle and without courage? Take away those that surround your person, how few are there that you can ask to sit at your table?

Turn to your little navy—of that little, what is left? Of the Delaware fleet, part are taken, the rest must soon surrender. Of those in the other Provinces, some taken, one or two at sea, and others lying unmanned and unrigged in their harbours.

And now where are your resources? O, my dear Sir! how sadly have you been abused by a faction void of truth and void of tenderness to you and your country! They have amused you with hopes of a declaration of war on the part of France. Believe me from the best authority, it was a fiction from the first. . . .

From your friends in England, you have nothing to expect. Their numbers are diminished to a cipher. The spirit of the whole nation is in full activity against you. A few sounding names among the nobility, though perpetually rung in your ears, are said to be without character, without influence. Disappointed ambition, I am told, has made them desperate, and they only wish to make the deluded Americans instruments of their revenge. All orders and ranks of men in Great Britain are now unanimous, and determined to risk their all on the contest. Trade and manufactures are found to flourish; and new channels are continually opening, that will, perhaps, more than supply the old. In a word, your harbours are blocked up, your cities fall one after another, fortress after fortress, battle after battle is lost. A British army, after having passed almost unmolested through a vast extent of country, have possessed themselves with ease of the capital of America. How unequal the contest now! How fruitless the expense of blood!

Under so many discouraging circumstances, can virtue, can honour, can the love of your country prompt you to persevere? Humanity itself (and sure I am humanity is no stranger to your breast) calls upon you to desist. Your army must perish for want of common necessities, or thousands of innocent families must perish to support them. Wherever they encamp the country must be impoverished. Wherever they march the troops of Britain will pursue, and must complete the devastation which America herself has begun.

Perhaps it may be said that "it is better to die than to be slaves." This, indeed, is a splendid maxim in theory; and, perhaps, in some instances, may be found experimentally true. But where there is the least probability of any happy accommodation, surely wisdom and humanity call for some sacrifices to be made to prevent inevitable destruction. You will know that there is but one invincible bar to such an accommodation; could this be removed, other obstacles might readily be overcome. 'Tis to you, and you alone, your bleeding country looks, and calls aloud for this sacrifice. Your arm alone has strength sufficient to remove this bar. May Heaven inspire you with the glorious resolution of exerting this strength at so interesting a crisis, and thus immortalizing yourself as a friend and guardian of your country.

Your penetrating eye needs not more explicit language to discern my meaning. With that prudence and delicacy, therefore, of which I know you to be possessed, represent to Congress the indispensable necessity of rescinding the hasty and ill-advised Declaration of Independency. Recommend, and you have an undoubted right to recommend, an immediate cessation of hostilities. Let the controversy be taken up where that Declaration left it, and where Lord Howe certainly expected to find it. Let men of clear and impartial characters, in or out of Congress, liberal in their sentiments, heretofore independent in their fortunes (and some such may surely be found in America), be appointed to confer with His Majesty's Commissioners. Let them, if they please, prepare some well-digested constitutional plan, to lay before them as the commencement of a negotiation. When they have gone thus far, I am confident that the most happy consequences will ensue. Unanimity will immediately take place through the different Provinces. Thousands who are now ardently wishing and praying for such a measure will step forth and declare themselves the zealous advocates of constitutional liberty, and millions will bless the Hero that left the field of war to decide this most important contest with the weapons of wisdom and humanity. . . .

Your most obedient and Sincere friend and servant
JACOB DUCHÉ

4. "HEAR THY INDICTMENT, WASHINGTON . . ."

Jonathan Odell

Hear thy indictment, Washington, at large;
Attend and listen to the solemn charge:
Thou hast supported an atrocious cause
Against thy King, thy country, and the laws;
Committed perjury, encouraged lies,
Forced conscience, broken the most sacred ties;
Myriads of wives and daughters at thy hand
Their slaughtered husbands, slaughtered sons, demand;
That pastures hear no more the lowing kine,
That towns are desolate, all—all is thine;
The frequent sacrilege that pained my sight,
The blasphemies my pen abhors to write,
Innumerable crimes on thee must fall—
For thou maintainest, thou defendest, all. . . .

What could when half-way up the hill to fame,
Induce thee to go back and link with shame?
Was it ambition, vanity, or spite
That prompted thee with Congress to unite;
Or did all three within thy bosom roll,
"Thou heart of hero with a traitor's soul"?
Go, wretched author of thy country's grief,
Patron of villainy, of villains chief;
Seek with thy curséd crew the central gloom,
Ere truth's avenging sword begin thy doom;
Or sudden vengeance of celestial dart
Precipitate thee with augmented smart.

VI. LOYALISTS IN EXILE

A romantic aura commonly clings to the exiles from a lost cause—the Huguenots who found refuge in Holland and England, the Stuarts in France, the aristocratic refugees from the French Revolution who scattered about the courts and capitals of Europe—but the Loyalists who found refuge in London or in Canada during and after the American Revolution did not have a very romantic time of it. As we have already seen, many of the distinguished opponents of independence followed Governor Hutchinson to England in 1775 and 1776, and others drifted over in the course of the war. Nova Scotia, too, had its quota of distinguished Loyalists, but most of those who went there, or to Upper Canada, were of the plainer sort. Many of the exiles in London and the provincial towns were men of education, much given to writing letters and keeping diaries, and it is possible for us to reconstruct their lives abroad with some authenticity.

Perhaps the best of the diaries is that kept by the Salem judge, Samuel Curwen. A graduate of Harvard College, he had taken part in the expedition against Louisbourg, then been appointed customs officer and, eventually, judge of the vice-admiralty court. His official position and his temperament inclined him to conservatism, and he was one of the supporters of Governor Hutchinson. With the outbreak of war, he departed first for Philadelphia, then for London. Fortunately for us he kept a diary and preserved his letters; these give us vivid pictures of the American group in London and tell us that few of them—certainly not Curwen himself—were ever happy in exile.

Many of those who fled to England were men of property, but they were rarely able to take any property with them; most of them therefore found themselves with fairly high standards of living and no means to maintain them. Inevitably they became pensioners of the British government. Curwen himself received a meager pension of £100, but as he had thoughtfully left his wife in Salem, he was able to manage with this. Not so most of the others, who clamored for pensions, offices, half pay and other perquisites, and often received them.

Indeed, a good part of the energies of the Americans in exile went to persuading the British government to compensate them for the injuries they had suffered. And the government was, on the whole, generous, though few of the Loyalists thought so. Colonial officials were usually given jobs back in England, or put on pension; those who had served in the army were put on half pay; preachers were assigned to parishes in the country or the provincial towns. But what about compensation for losses—which, often considerable, were invariably exaggerated in the telling? Some 5,000 Loyalists eventually submitted claims for compensation; these claims totaled well over £10,000,000. The Crown established a commission to inquire into these claims; the commission, working with admirable impartiality and thoroughness, held hearings in London, Montreal, Quebec, Halifax, and even New York, and eventually made awards totaling some £3,000,000. In addition pensions for loss of office went to 204 Loyalists, to the sum of almost £26,000 annually, and annual allowances to another 588 who had lost no property but had other claims on the bounty of the British government.

Far more important were the arrangements made for the refugees who fled to Canada—Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Upper Canada or Ontario. Here the British government was not only generous but farsighted.

It granted 500 acres of land to heads of families, and 300 acres to single men; set aside 2,000 acres in each township to the support of religion and 1,000 acres to the support of schools; provided rations, fuel, clothing and other forms of assistance for a period of years. Altogether the government gave some 3,000,000 acres of land to the United Empire Loyalists, as they came to be called, and spent some $9,000,000 on resettling them.

We give here some extracts from the diary and letters of Samuel Curwen, and a letter from David Colden, son of the famous Cadwallader, of New York, describing his efforts to obtain compensation from the government. He died a few weeks after writing this letter, but his claim was eventually settled by an outright award of £2,720, with £880 to his son and £460 to each daughter.

1. A MASSACHUSETTS LOYALIST EATS OUT HIS HEART IN EXILE

From the diary of Samuel Curwen.

Philadelphia, May 4, 1775. Since the late unhappy affairs at Concord and Lexington, finding the spirit of the people to rise on every fresh alarm (which has been almost hourly) and their tempers to get more and more soured and malevolent against all moderate men, whom they see fit to reproach as enemies of their country by the name of Tories, among whom I am unhappily (although unjustly) ranked, and unable longer to bear their undeserved reproaches and menaces hourly denounced against myself and others, I think it a duty I owe myself to withdraw for awhile from the storm which, to my foreboding mind, is approaching. Having in vain endeavored to persuade my wife to accompany me—her apprehensions of danger from an incensed soldiery, a people licentious and enthusiastically mad and broken loose from all the restraints of law or religion being less terrible to her than a short passage on the ocean—and being moreover encouraged by her, I left my late peaceful home (in my sixtieth year) in search of personal security and those rights which, by the laws of God, I ought to have enjoyed undisturbed there, and embarked at Beverly on board the schooner Lively, Captain Johnson, bound hither, on Sunday, the 23d ultimo, and have just arrived, hoping to find an asylum amongst Quakers and Dutchmen, who, I presume, from former experience, have too great a regard for ease and property to sacrifice either, at this time of doubtful disputation, on the altar of an unknown goddess, or rather doubtful divinity.

My fellow-passengers were Andrew Cabot and his wife and child, and Andrew Dodge. My townsman, Benjamin Goodhue, was kind enough to come on board, and having made my kinsman and correspondent, Samuel Smith, acquainted with my arrival, he was pleased to come on board also, and his first salutation, "We will protect you, though a Tory," embarrassed me not a little; but soon recovering my surprise, we fell into a friendly conversation, and he taking me to his house, I dined with his family and their minister, Mr. Sproat, suffering some mortification in the case of truth.

After an invitation to make his house my home during my stay here, which I did not accept, I took leave and went in pursuit of lodgings, and on enquiring at several houses, ascertained they were full, or for particular reasons would not take me; and so many refused as made it fearful whether, like Cain, I had not a discouraging mark upon me or a strong feature of Toryism. The whole city appears to be deep in congressional principles, and inveterate against "Hutchinsonian Addressers." Happily we at length arrived at one Mrs. Swords', a widow lady, in Chestnut-street, with whom I found quarters, rendered more agreeable by S. Waterhouse's company, who also lodges here. . . .

May 6, 1775. Saw Pelatiah Webster, who, at the instance of Mr. Goodhue, treats me civilly. Having had several intimations that my residence here would be unpleasant, if allowed at all, when it shall be known that I am what is called "an Addresser," . . . I have . . . consulted the few friends I think it worth while to advise with, and, on the result, am determined to proceed to London in the vessel in which I came here.

On the credit of Samuel Smith and Sons, I have, with their assistance, procured flour to freight a vessel.

May 7, 1775, Sunday. Dr. Franklin arrived last night, which was announced by ringing of bells, to the great joy of the city. I cannot but promise myself some good, as his knowledge and experience must have influence in the approaching Congress, which will, I doubt not, listen to his judgment. He is, it is said, to return to England again soon, at Lord Chatham's instance, who tells him he must be on the spot at the opening of Parliament.

May 9, 1775. Dined with Stephen Collins; passed the evening at Joseph Reed's, in company with Col. Washington (a fine figure, and of a most easy and agreeable address), Richard Henry Lee and Col. Harrison, three of the Virginia delegates. Besides Mr. and Mrs. Reed were Mrs. Deberdt, Dr. Shippen and Thomas Smith. I staid till twelve o'clock, the conversation being chiefly on the most feasible and prudent method of stopping up the channel of the Delaware to prevent the coming up of any large ships to the city. I could not see the least disposition to accomodate matters.

Col. Caswell and Mr. Hewes, the North Carolina delegates, arrived this day, and are at our lodgings. . . .

May 12, 1775. Sent my baggage on board the Lively; received a letter from Stephen Collins to Mr. Neat, of London; paid my respects to Mrs. Deberdt, and received a letter to her son. Received my invoice of flour from Samuel Smith and Sons. Mr. Startin presented me with an open letter on Wilkinson and Co., Birmingham, and Mr. Reed and lady gave me letters to their brother, Dennis Deberdt, London. From post-office took Rivington's two last newspapers, and received from the publishers all the present week's Philadelphia papers. Messrs. Lee and Webster took leave, and with my fellow-passenger, Mr. Webster's son Pelatiah, I went on board the Lively.

May 16, 1775. Spoke Capt. Waterman in a schooner from Nantucket, who brought me a letter from Nathan Goodale, stating that his family, Mr. Pynchon's and Mr. Orne's had arrived there, to which I replied. . . .

London, July 4. Arrived at the New England Coffee-House, Threadneedle-street, at 7 o'clock, P.M., July 5. Met my townsman and friend, Benjamin Pickman, which rejoiced me; we walked to Westminster Hall; in Chancery saw Sir Thomas Sewell, Master of the Rolls, sitting with his hat on; at Common Pleas saw Judge Blackstone and Sergeant Glynn; and the King's Bench, Lord Mansfield and Mr. Sergeant Wedderburne. Lord Mansfield's manner is like the late Judge Dudley's, of Massachusetts. His peering eyes denote a penetration and comprehension peculiarly his own. Mr. Wedderburne spoke, but at no great length.

July 9, 1775. Went to Old Jewry Meeting-house, where I met Gov. Hutchinson, his son and daughter—a cordial reception and invitation to visit him. Mr. Isaac Smith and Mr. Deberdt sat in the pew next me.

To Rev. Thomas Barnard, Salem.

London, 22d July, 1775

Dear Sir:

The dissipation, self-forgetfulness and vicious indulgences of every kind which characterize this metropolis are not to be wondered at. The temptations are too great for that degree of philosophy and religion ordinarily possessed by the bulk of mankind. The unbounded riches of many afford the means of every species of luxury, which (thank God) our part of America is ignorant of; and the example of the wealthy and great is contagious.

From the diary again.

April 1, A.M. [1776]. At Gov. Hutchinson's; he was alone, reading a new pamphlet entitled "An Inquiry whether Great Britain or America is most in fault." I accepted an invitation to return to dinner. Taking leave for the present, I departed, walking through the palace and park to Mr. Bliss's lodgings, where I met Judge Sewall, Mr. Oxnard and Mr. Smith; returned to the Governor's, with whom only young Oliver and myself dined.

From thence, in passing through Leicester-Square, I called in at Mr. Copley's to see Mr. Clarke and the family, who kindly pressed my staying to tea; and in the mean time amused myself by seeing his performances in painting. He was then at work on a family-piece containing himself, Mr. Clarke, his wife and four children, of all of whom I observed a very striking likeness. At tea was present Mr. West, a Philadelphian, a most masterly hand in historic painting; author of the well known and applauded piece, now in print, called "West's Death of Wolfe," and taken from his painting. He is now at work on a piece called the "Death of Stephen," for the King, and for which he is to have one thousand pounds. Mr. West is the King's history-painter, and was kind enough to put me into a way of obtaining a sight of the Queen's palace, which he tells me contains, except Houghton Hall, the finest collection of capital paintings of any house in England.

Returned with Mr. Clarke, who was going to see his son Jonathan, sick. . . .

[April 3, 1776.] Went with Mr. Clarke to procure more convenient lodgings for his sick son, which we found, as recommended by Dr. Pitcairn, in Cross-street, in what is called the Queen's House, said to be a place of Elizabeth's, on a small scale, low, and in the taste of the sixteenth century. The remains of the porter's lodge at the bottom of the garden, in a peculiar style, are yet seen. In one of the lower rooms is a painting on the windows, with the date of 1588. . . .

May 4. Called on my friend Browne, who had sent a message last evening by Mr. Pickman to invite his three countrymen to his lodgings. Col. Browne acquainted me with some facts relative to the unfortunate abandonment of Boston by the King's troops; which after all has the appearance of being forced. Would to God this ill-judged, unnatural quarrel was ended, but I fear thousands of useful innocents must be sacrificed to the wickedness, pride and folly of unprincipled men. Many of our countrymen called during our stay.

To Dr. Charles Russell, Antigua.

London, June 10, 1776

Dear Sir:

I congratulate you on your retreat from the land of oppression and tyranny; for, surely, greater never appeared since the days of Nimrod. I sincerely wish well to my native country, and am of opinion that the happiness of it depends on restraining the violences and outrages of profligate and unprincipled men, who run riot against all the laws of justice, truth and religion. Sad and deplorable is the condition of those few that, like Abdiel amidst hostile bands of fallen spirits, retain their primitive loyalty. So strangely unprosperous hitherto have been the measures of administration in America that the active Provincials have taken courage, and accomplished what in contemplation would have appeared morally impossible.

Gen. Burgoyne sailed from hence ten weeks ago for Canada with four thousand Brunswickers and seven or eight regiments; Lord Howe, in the Eagle, about a month since, and the first division of Hessians, consisting of eight or ten thousand, about a fortnight before him. Gen. Howe, his brother, with nine thousand, was at Halifax the beginning of April. The second division ('tis said) will sail this week, consisting of four thousand, which completes the whole number of foreign troops. The whole of the regular army on the Continent will not be short of forty thousand men.

It is surprising what little seeming effect the loss of American orders has on the manufactories; they have been in full employ ever since the dispute arose; stocks are not one jot lessened, the people in general little moved by it; business and amusement so totally engross all ranks and orders here that Administration finds no difficulty on the score to pursue their plans. The general disapprobation of that folly of independence which America now evidently aims at makes it a difficult part for her friends to act.

By letters from Salem to the 16th April I find they were in a quiet state there, and hugging themselves in the fatal error that Government had abandoned the design of reducing them to obedience. Six vessels laden with refugees are arrived from Halifax, amongst whom are R. Lechmere, I. Vassal, Col. Oliver, Treasurer Gray, etc. Those who bring property here may do well enough, but for those who expect reimbursement for losses, or supply for present support, will find to their cost the hand of charity very cold; the latter may be kept from starving, and beyond that their hopes are vain. "Blessed is he (saith Pope) that expecteth nothing, for he shall never be disappointed"; nor a more interesting truth was ever uttered.

I find my finances so visibly lessening that I wish I could remove from this expensive country (being heartily tired of it) and, old as I am, would gladly enter into a business connection anywhere consistently with decency and integrity, which I would fain preserve. The use of the property I left behind me I fear I shall never be the better for; little did I expect from affluence to be reduced to such rigid economy as prudence now exacts. To beg is a meanness I wish never to be reduced to, and to starve is stupid; one comfort, as I am fast declining into the vale of life: my miseries cannot probably be of long continuance.

With great esteem; etc.

2. BRITAIN ECONOMIZES ON THE LOYALISTS

Samuel Curwen to the Reverend Isaac Smith.

London, February 14, 1783

Dear Sir: . . . This day I went to the Treasury to inquire about my allowance, and to my comfort found it stood as at first. A few are raised, some struck off, more lessened. Of those that have come to my knowledge, Gov. Oliver's is lessened £100, out of £300; Mr. Williams, who has married a fortune here, is struck off; Harrison Gray, with a wife and two children, struck off; his brother Lewis lessened to £50; D. Ingersoll reduced from £200 to £100; Samuel H. Sparhawk, from £150 to £80; Benjamin Gridley from £150 to £100; Thomas Danforth's, Samuel Sewall's, Samuel Porter's, Peter Johannot's, G. Brinley's, Edward Oxnard's and mine continue as at first; Chandler's raised £50; Samuel Fitch's £20; Col. Morrow's £50; one whose name I forget is sunk from £100 to £30; and many names and sums totally forgotten. On the whole, it is said the sum paid last year to refugees, amounting to near £80,000, is now shrunk by the late reform to £38,000; and if the Commissioners act on the same frugal plan respecting the petitioners whose cases will probably soon be considered, I very much doubt whether the sum of last year's expenditures under this head, including all their additional allowances, will not exceed this year's.

This is the great, the important day on which the preliminaries are to undergo a most critical and severe discussion, and will determine the fate of Lord Shelburne's Administration; news unluckily for it has arrived that the Government of Virginia has declared they will pay no regard to any remonstrances, or request, or requisition respecting Refugees, which manifests the fatality of the preliminary article recommending the same.

Your faithful friend,

S. CURWEN

3. LOYALISTS DEVOTE THEMSELVES TO ALLOWANCES AND COMPENSATION

David Colden to his wife.

London, June 27, 1784

My dearest Nancey,

I had the pleasure to write to you from Falmouth, by a packett then waiting for a wind, which I hope would give you very early intelligence of our safe arrival there, in 21 days from Sandy Hook. . . .

I have a well furnished parlour, bed room and what they call a powdering room for dressing in, for which I pay a guinea a week. I board myself; the maid of the house dresses my victuals, goes to market for me, and sets the table; so that I have little use for a servant, and have not yet got one.

I have already had the pleasure to see almost all my American acquaintance, and shall find employment for some time in returning their visits. As yet I have been wholly occupied in receiving visits, and in pursuing the first step that is taken by all my distressed fellow sufferers; I mean the applications to obtain something for my present support. What will be my success I do not yet know. My friends encourage me to have good hopes; but it is much more difficult to obtain the largest allowance of £200 a year, now, than it was some time ago. When I have accomplished this part of my business, I shall then endeavour to get the examination of my claim for compensation brought on as soon as possible.

When this is done I shall perhaps be able to indulge myself in what is ever nearest my heart. I mean the contemplation of a plan for getting you and my dear dear daughters settled with me somewhere. At present I can say nothing to you on the subject with any more certainty than when I was in America. But be assured, my dear Nancey, this great and astonishing part of the world has nothing in it that can abate the extream anxiety I feel to be with you and my children.

I have not yet been out to look at any one of the great or wonderfull things that are to be seen in this city. I have had a glance at some of them in passing, but as I am obliged to go about in a coach (both because I have not, as you know, breath to walk, and if I had, would never find my way), I have not been able to make the least observation on any thing.

Cad has already seen St James's—the Kings and Prince of Wales's stables—Kensington Gardens—Westminster Abbey and many other places. He is happy in having the two Ludlows, McWaltons son, and other Yorkers who go about with him. Sandy Hamilton is much grown, and only that he is too much the man, is much improved. His father looks very well, and lives as if flush of money; yet he has got nothing from Govt and his friends are as much at a loss as we used to be to know how he manages. Antill has got as much added to his half pay as makes him £200 a year. He tells me he has wrote for Peggy, but— Yesterday I dined and passed the evening at Captn Doughlass's—they live in a genteel stile; she in a thriving way. Susan Middleton grows up too stout, and does not get rid of her red face, which is a great loss to her, but she is a pleasant, unaffected girl. Mrs Douglass never looked better. Bob Auchmuty was there; he was among my first visitants. He intends going to Halifax this season. Jack Middleton has called several times, and is very friendly to Cad. I am surprised to think how many of my friends have found me out in so short a time! Even Mr Patterson, who lives in the city not less than three miles from me, was here yesterday, and told Cad he would carry him to see many places. He has got so much added to his half pay as makes him up £160 a year with which he appears well satisfied. Which is the case with very few of the poor folks from America that I have seen. Many of them have got no allowance yet; and I shall probably be as far forward in my application as those who were much earlier here. My worthy friend Judge Ludlow gives me that full share of his kindest attention on which I had an undoubted reliance. Even his matters are not so determined that he can say when [he] will leave this country, or where he will go to—the probability at present is to Nova Scotia, and that he may go there this season. I shall push hard not to be left behind. James Delancey will sail in two or three weeks to Halifax, by whom I shall write to our friends in that part of the world. James has been very attentive to me—and the old Genl affectionately kind.

Supposeing, my dear Nancey, that you are still mistress at Spring Hill, I must put you in mind of disposing of all the old iron, plow shears, harrow teeth, tire of cart wheels, etc., etc. They can be conveyed privately to Tom, and besides paying his acct. will produce something for you. Send the steel mill to Mr Ustick, if he will take it. I owe him for some seed wheat. Sell the iron bound waggon; L. Laurence will assist you in it. As to beds, bedding, and the kitchen furniture you have left, you had best not part with any of it: should we settle either in Nova Scotia or Canada, you cannot any way be supplied as well as by bringing it with you. You will not, my dear, however flatter yourself that there is any probability of our getting together before next spring, for if I should get to Nova Scotia this fall, it must be too late to bring you there. It is indeed quite too early for me to say any thing on this subject, but it so occupies my heart and head that I am induced to communicate even my present thoughts about it. . . .

Tell my friends and neighbors, and all who ever think of me, that I daily think of them with a warm heart and sincere good will. If I have time I will write a line to my girls; I know it will make them happy; never had parent the happiness of children more at heart than I have theirs. God bless and protect you all!

I am my dear Nancey's most affect.

VII. THE RETURN OF THE NATIVES

Many of those who were forced into exile counted themselves foes of independence but friends to America. Whatever their distaste for the leveling principles of the Americans, they discovered, when they arrived in England, that they were even less at home in the aristocratic and corrupt upper-class circles of the mother country than in the homespun society of the colonies. Even a man like Hutchinson never ceased to think fondly of his home land—Massachusetts Bay—or to speak affectionately of it. Many—we will never know how many—managed to make their peace with the American authorities, and their neighbors, and return to their native shores. We give here what may perhaps be regarded as a happy ending to a melancholy tale: the return of Samuel Curwen and of Peter Van Schaack to their old homes.

1. SAMUEL CURWEN COMES HOME

Samuel Curwen to William Pynchon.

London, November 28, 1783

Dear Sir:

However unfavorable to my wishes the result of the American Assemblies may be, I shall be gratified by receiving the earliest advices. Capt. Nathaniel West brings me a message from the principal merchants and citizens of Salem, prospering and encouraging my return; which instance of moderation I view as an honor to the town and respectful to myself, and I wish to return my thanks through you. It affords me pleasure, and I would cheerfully accept the offer; but should the popular dislike rise against me, especially if cooperating with governmental resolves, to what a plight should I be reduced, being at present (but for how long is a painful uncertainty) on the British Government list for £100 a year (a competency for a single person exercising strict economy), to surrender this precarious allowance without public assurances of personal security.

It would be little short of madness, should the popular rage combine with the public decisions to prevent our future residence; deprived of all assistance, and even the last refuge of the wretched, hope here, expelled there. Imagine to yourself the distress of an old man, without health, under such adverse circumstances, and you will advise me to wait with resignation till the several Assemblies shall have taken decisive measures on congressional recommendation, agreeably to the Provisional Treaty, if that body shall deem it prudent to conform to what their Commissioners have agreed to.

But enough of this. One of your Massachusetts public ministers, Mr. John Adams, is here in all the pride of American independence; by Mr. Gorham I am told he uttered to him the following speech, that "together with the war he had buried all animosity against the absentees." Though he is of a rigid temper and a thorough-paced Republican, candor obliges me to give him credit for the humanity of the sentiment, being spoken in private and to one of his own party, and probably without an intention to be published abroad.

In a conversation with my informant, he further replied that he chose to consider himself as a plain American Republican; his garb plain, without a sword, which is carrying his transatlantic ideas, I fear, a little too far. Should he have the curiosity, or his public character render it expedient, to attend at a royal levee, or at a drawing-room at St. James's on a Court day, I hope he will not deserve and meet with as mortifying a repulse as our late Chancellor, Lord Thurlow, at the Court of Versailles, whose surly pertinacity in wearing a bob-wig occasioned his being refused admittance into the King's presence. However frivolous a part of dress soever a sword may appear to one of Mr. Adams's scholar-like turn, he is by this time, I fancy, too well acquainted with the etiquette of Courts to neglect so necessary an appendage, without which no one can find admittance out of the clerical line.

I have nothing further to add but my ardent wishes for an increase of the health and happiness of yourself and family; for I am truly,

Your friend,

S. CURWEN

From the diary.

July 10, 1784. To the Treasury; found the American door besieged by a score of mendicants like myself, waiting their turns. Though I thought my early attendance would have entitled me to No. 1, I was glad to stand No. 21. So great was the crowd that I was more than once about to depart and leave them.

July 28, 1784. Took leave at lodgings 107 Bishopgate-street within and proceeded to the ship Union, lying at Irongate, where I propose to abide till my arrival at Gravesend. Paid twenty guineas in part for my passage money. From henceforth I bid an everlasting farewell to London. . . .

Sept. 25. Arrived at Boston, and at half past three o'clock landed at the end of Long Wharf, after an absence of nine years and five months, occasioned by a lamented civil war, excited by ambitious, selfish men here and in England, to the disgrace, dishonor, distress and disparagement of these extensive territories. By plunder and rapine some few have accumulated wealth, but many more are greatly injured in their circumstances; some have to lament over the wreck of their departed wealth and estates, of which pitiable number I am; my affairs having sunk into irretrievable ruin.

2. "JOHN JAY DID NOT CEASE A FRIEND TO PETER VAN SCHAACK"

John Jay to Peter Van Schaack.

Paris, September 17, 1782

Doctor Franklin sent me this morning your letter of the 11 August last. I thank you for it. Aptitude to change in anything never made a part of my disposition, and I hope makes no part of my character. In the course of the present troubles I have adhered to certain fixed principles, and faithfully obeyed their dictates, without regarding the consequences of such conduct to my friends, my family or myself; all of whom, however dreadful the thought, I have been ready to sacrifice if necessary to the public objects in contest.

Believe me, my heart has nevertheless been, on more than one occasion, afflicted by the execution of what I thought and still think was my duty. I felt very sensibly for you and for others, but as society can regard only the political propriety of men's conduct, and not the moral propriety of their motives to it, I could only lament your unavoidably becoming classed with many whose morality was convenience, and whose politics changed with the aspect of public affairs. My regard for you as a good old friend continued, notwithstanding. God knows that inclination never had a share in any proceedings of mine against you; from such thorns no man could expect to gather grapes, and the only consolation that can grow in their unkindly shade is a consciousness of doing one's duty and the reflection that, as on the one hand I have uniformly preferred the public's weal to my friends and connections, so on the other I have never been urged by private resentments to injure a single individual. Your judgment and consequently your conscience differed from mine on a very important question; but though as an independent American I considered all who were not for us, and you among the rest, as against us, yet be assured that John Jay did not cease to be a friend to Peter Van Schaack. No one can serve two masters. Either Britain was right and America wrong, or America right and Britain wrong. They who thought Britain right were bound to support her, and America had a just claim to the services of those who approved her cause. Hence it became our duty to take one side or the other, and no man is to be blamed for preferring the one which his reason recommended as the most just and virtuous.

Several of our countrymen indeed left and took arms against us, not from any such principles, but from the most dishonourable of human motives. Their conduct has been of a piece with their inducements, for they have far outstripped savages in perfidy and cruelty. Against these men every American must set his face and steel his heart. There are others of them, though not many, who, I believe, opposed us because they thought they could not conscientiously go with us. To such of them as have behaved with humanity I wish every species of prosperity that may consist with the good of my country.

You see how naturally I slide into the habit of writing as freely as I used to speak to you. Ah! my friend, if ever I see New York again, I expect to meet with "the shade of many a departed joy"; my heart bleeds to think of it. Where and how are your children? Whenever, as a private friend, it may be in my power to do good to either, tell me; while I have a loaf, you and they may freely partake of it. Don't let this idea hurt you. If your circumstances are easy, I rejoice; if not, let me take off some of their rougher edges.

Mrs. Jay is obliged by your remembrance, and presents you her compliments. The health of us both is but delicate. Our little girl has been very ill, but is now well. My best wishes always attend you, and be assured that, notwithstanding many political changes,

I remain, dear Peter,

Your affectionate friend and servant,

JOHN JAY

3. "MY HEART WARMS UP WHEN OUR COUNTRY IS THE SUBJECT"

Peter Van Schaack to John Jay.

London, October 15, 1782

I will not attempt to describe my feelings upon perusal of your very friendly letter. I consider it as a perfect picture, in which I can trace every well-known feature of your character. Your unreserved commemoration of our old friendship, and assurance of its continuance; your kind inquiries into the situation of me and my children, and generous offers with respect to both them and myself; and your pathetic allusion to the melancholy scenes you will meet upon your return to New York, melted my heart; and every idea of party distinction or political competition vanished in an instant.

The line you have drawn between your political character and your private friendships is so strongly marked, and will be so strictly attended by me, that I hope our correspondence will not end here. Be assured that were I arraigned at the bar, and you my judge, I should expect to stand or fall only by the merits of my cause.

With respect to the great contest in which, unfortunately, I differed from others of my valuable friends as well as yourself, I can say with the most sacred regard to truth, I was actuated by no motive unfriendly to my country, nor by any consideration of a personal private nature. Men's hearts are not always known, even to themselves; but believe me that I spared no pains in examining into all the secret recesses of mine. I can say, too, that my wishes were to have gone with you. The very appearance (and in my view of things it was appearance only) of taking part against my country distressed me in the extreme. Could it be for the sake of Great Britain that I could wish to sacrifice the welfare of my native country? My attachment to her (great indeed it was) was founded in the relation she stood in to America, and the happiness which I conceived America derived from it; nor did it appear to me, from anything that had happened, that the connexion was dissolved. Upon the whole, as even in a doubtful case I would rather be the patient sufferer than run the risk of being the active aggressor; and as I should rather be even a figure for the hand of scorn to point its slow and moving finger at than to destroy the peace of my own mind, I concluded, rather than to support a cause I could not approve, to bear distress that might result from the part I took; and if America is happier for the revolution, I declare solemnly that I shall rejoice that the side I was on was the unsuccessful one.

You, my dear sir, will excuse my saying thus much on a subject so interesting to all that is dear to me in life. My heart warms up whenever our country (I must call it my country) is the subject; and in my separation from it, "I have dragged at each remove a lengthening chain." . . .

—JAY, Correspondence and Public Papers, II, 354-355.

CHAPTER TEN

The Struggle for Democracy at Home

THE AMERICAN REVOLUTION has a twofold character. It was a war for independence which led to the breakup of the Old Empire and the emergence of a new nation in the New World. It was an internal revolution, which provided the occasion and the impetus for far-reaching changes in government, economy and society. In terms now familiar, it solved the problem of home rule in the empire, and raised the problem of who should rule at home.

This chapter addresses itself to the important but rarely dramatic story of the internal changes that accompanied the war itself. Some of those changes were an almost inevitable product of the war. To some extent they came of their own accord; to some extent they were planned or contrived. For the most part they were a combination of fortuity and contrivance, for wise and farsighted leaders took advantage of processes of change and tried to channel them into what they thought were the right paths.

The Revolutionary War, like almost all wars, brought its own far-reaching changes, and this even without any deliberate revolutionary program. The destruction of royal governments required the establishment of new American governments, and it was clear that this provided an opportunity to establish them on sound foundations: every state but Connecticut and Rhode Island seized this opportunity. The war, too, revived American titles to western lands, and opened up vast areas to settlement on what were, almost of necessity, liberal terms. It dispossessed tens of thousands of Tories, provided the occasion for the confiscation of royal and proprietary lands and of Loyalist estates, and even of debts owed to British merchants. Thus the Irish poet Tom Moore could sneer at

*Those vaunted demagogues who nobly rose
From England's debtors to be England's foes,
Who could their monarch in their purse forget
And break allegiance but to cancel debt.*

All this brought with it a redistribution of existing wealth, and the creation of new sources of wealth. And war itself, then as always, stirred up and metamorphosed society and economy. It threw men of different colonies and different classes together. It brought in tens of thousands of British, thousands of French and German soldiers and sailors, who contributed something to the wealth, something to the habits, and something even to the stock of the Americans. It put a premium on talent rather than on wealth or family; created innumerable vacancies in government, church and business, and filled those vacancies with new men; loosened men from habitual loyalties and attached them to new ideas and institutions.

This was all in what might be called the ordinary course of wartime history. But more was involved in the internal revolution than this. It was difficult to justify a war on the basis of the philosophy of the Declaration of Independence and not feel some compulsion to apply that philosophy to domestic concerns. All men, said the Continental Congress, were created equal, and endowed with inalienable rights, including life, liberty and happiness. Governments exist to secure men in these rights—it is for this reason that they are established. These sentiments—Jefferson called them self-evident truths—commanded the support of Patriot leaders and presumably of the American people generally. They were not the doctrines of a closet-philosophy, but had consequences. It is with some of these consequences, institutional or intellectual, that we are concerned here.

The obvious place for Americans to begin was in the making of governments. The passing of royal authority necessitated the establishment of independent state governments, and after the Congressional Resolution of May 15, 1776, all the states—except Connecticut and Rhode Island, which were content with their colonial charters—proceeded to refashion their governments, carrying out, with different degrees of thoroughness, the political principle that government derives its authority from below. The most far-reaching consequence of the Revolution internally is this institutionalization of the principle that men make government. The method was the constitutional convention; its product was new state constitutions.

Those constitutions inevitably covered wide ground, and provided an opportunity, again, to apply some of the more urgent principles of the Revolutionary philosophy. The first constitution, that of Virginia, was drafted by a leading political philosopher, George Mason, and contained a Bill of Rights which soon became a model for other states, here and abroad. The new constitutions, and their bills of rights, did away with many of the built-in privileges that had been part of the royal and proprietary governments, toppled Church establishments, introduced sweeping reforms in the organization and structure of government, and less sweeping changes in suffrage and representation; and furnished an opportunity for the expression of pious sentiments about such matters as democracy, education and slavery. In some states these sentiments were translated into legislation or into unofficial practices.

It would, of course, be misleading to present the Revolution as a social revolution in the sense of the French Revolution, or of the Russian Revolution of our own time. It would be equally misleading to omit this chapter of our history, or to minimize its importance. It must be confessed, however, that it does not lend itself eagerly to narrative presentation. Most of the material that illuminates social and economic changes is formal and elaborate, rather than informal and personal. It is explicit in constitutions, laws, proclamations and similar documents which cannot be called vivacious, rather than implicit in personal accounts. There was, it seems, but little awareness of what was going on and little temptation to describe it. Here, as in so many chapters, we are grateful for the combination of philosophical insight, practical energy, and literary affluence in Thomas Jefferson and John Adams.

The richest material tells the story of constitution making. Another group of documents, far less elaborate, illuminates the story of religious freedom; a third suggests something of the criticism of and assault on slavery; and a fourth touches on some new departures in education—mostly on paper. We include, in addition, a few miscellaneous papers touching on social changes and on that process of democratization which was eventually to be of immense importance.

I. ALL POWER IS IN THE PEOPLE

Although the Declaration of Independence propounded a revolutionary and explosive philosophy, at the time its arguments excited little attention and almost no opposition. Even the Loyalists, unalterably opposed to independence and often embittered or outraged by American egalitarianism, had little to say in criticism of the philosophical argument set forth in the Declaration. We may assume, then, that what Jefferson announced was, indeed, the common sense of the matter, and that when he wrote that "I did not consider it as any part of my charge to invent new ideas" he in a sense accepted the imputation that his ideas were familiar and commonplace.

It is fascinating to see how, during these Revolutionary years, Americans took both the ideas and the practices of democracy in their stride; how they took for granted that the source of all authority was in the people and that men had an indubitable right to alter, or abolish, governments, and to institute new governments. This was not, after all, so surprising. Nature, or history, is always aping art, and the methods of making government which Locke and Rousseau imagined to belong to some golden age of the past, and which modern sociologists assert belong only to the imagination, had been familiar practice in America since the days of the Mayflower Compact and the Fundamental Orders of Connecticut.

We give here a handful of documents which present, in dramatic form, this instinctive habit of making government by democratic processes. First there is a letter from Richard Henderson, founder of the Transylvania Colony in what is now Kentucky, describing the habits of freedom that obtain among Americans, and after it comes, quite logically, Henderson's address to the delegates who had gathered together to draw up a compact of government. In May 1775 Henderson had called a convention of representatives from the four little settlements of Boonsboro, Harrodsburg, Boiling Springs and St. Asaph's Station. After listening to Henderson's eloquent words the delegates accepted the constitution which he had written vesting authority largely in the Transylvania Company. Even when these and other newcomers revolted against the Transylvania Company the next year, they followed in their revolt the democratic procedure which Henderson had advised.

The notion that government of necessity derives its authority from the consent of the governed was widespread and contagious. We give here three expressions of it from three different societies: first, the "mechanicks" of New York who argued that authority to create a constitution had to come from "the inhabitants at large"; second, the freeholders of a town in Connecticut, who argued that the town should elect, directly, its representative to the Continental Congress; third, the frontier town of Hanover, New Hampshire—torn by the rival claims of New Hampshire and Vermont—which argued the absurdity of government by a legislature which held over from before independence. Finally we have Samuel Adams' declaration of faith in the democratic processes as recalled by a traveling Frenchman, the Marquis de Chastellux.

1. AMERICANS "FREE AS THEIR OWN THOUGHTS"

Richard Henderson to Cunningham Corbett, a Glasgow merchant.

Bladensburg, July 30, 1774

Dear Sir: . . . You know something of the disposition that rules the people here. As you go northward, they are not less zealous, but more steady. And it is to be wished that those who attempt to give law to this country had correspondents among that set of men whom we call the country gentlemen of America, to correct the advices which they receive from other quarters. These men have ideas of liberty resembling the old English ideas. They have always hitherto been, as King Alfred said the English ought to be, free as their own thoughts. Indeed, even our commonality have never been used to stand in awe of rank and station. They are a well-informed, reasoning commonality too, perhaps the most of any on earth, because of the free intercourse between man and man that prevails in America: their free access to courts of law, as parties and jurors, where they hear the rights of the subject nobly debated; their frequent and free elections, which give occasion for candidates to scan each other's principles and conduct before the tribunal of the people, together with the freedom and general circulation of newspapers, and the eagerness and leisure of the people to read them, or to listen to those who do.

In such a country it is plain that the sentiments of the ablest patriots soon become the general sentiments. Our ancestors, say they, with a view of enlarging, not of diminishing the rights of their posterity, emigrated to a waste country, then useless, stipulating allegiance to the Crown, and coincidence of laws with those of England, and reserving all the rights of Englishmen, especially exemption from taxes, unless they should tax themselves. This contract was solemnly ratified in the face of the world by charters. England breaks the contract, claims a right of taxation, and sends an army to enforce it. If a contract, say they, must bind both parties, or else neither party, and she breaks loose, now, are we bound? . . .

2. "ALL POWER IS ORIGINALLY IN THE PEOPLE"

Richard Henderson's address to the Transylvania delegates.

23 May, 1775

Mr. Chairman, and Gentlemen of the Convention:

You are called and assembled at this time for a noble and an honourable purpose—a purpose, however ridiculous or idle it may appear at first view to superficial minds, yet is of the most solid consequence; and if prudence, firmness and wisdom are suffered to influence your councils and direct your conduct, the peace and harmony of thousands may be expected to result from your deliberations; in short, you are about a work of the utmost importance to the well-being of this country in general, in which the interest and security of each and every individual is inseparably connected; for that State is truly sickly, politically speaking, whose laws or edicts are not careful, equally, of the different members, and most distant branches, which constitute the one united whole. Nay, it is not only a solecism in politics, but an insult to common sense, to attempt the happiness of any community, or composing laws for their benefit, without securing to each individual his full proportion of advantage arising out of the general mass; thereby making his interest (that most powerful incentive to the actions of mankind) the consequence of obedience. This, at once, not only gives force and energy to legislation, but as justice is and must be eternally the same, so your laws, founded in wisdom, will gather strength by time, and find an advocate in every wise and well-disposed person.

You, perhaps, are fixing the palladium, or placing the first cornerstone of an edifice, the height and magnificence of whose superstructure is now in the womb of futurity, and can only become great and glorious in proportion to the excellence of its foundation. These considerations, gentlemen, will no doubt animate and inspire you with sentiments worthy of the grandeur of the subject.

Our peculiar circumstances in this remote country, surrounded on all sides with difficulties, and equally subject to one common danger, which threatens our common overthrow, must, I think, in their effects, secure to us an union of interests, and consequently that harmony in opinion, so essential to the forming good, wise and wholesome laws.

If any doubt remain amongst you with respect to the forces or efficacy of whatever laws you now or hereafter make, be pleased to consider that all power is originally in the people; therefore, make it their interest by impartial and beneficial laws, and you may be sure of their inclination to see them enforced. For it is not to be supposed that a people, anxious and desirous of having laws made, who approve of the method of choosing Delegates or Representatives to meet in General Convention for that purpose, can want the necessary and concomitant virtue to carry them into execution.

Nay, gentlemen, for argument's sake, let us set virtue, for a moment, out of the question, and see how the matter will then stand. You must admit that it is, and ever will be, the interest of a large majority that the laws should be esteemed and held sacred. If so, surely this large majority can never want inclination or power to give sanction and efficacy to those very laws which advance their interest and secure their property.

And now, Mr. Chairman and gentlemen of the Convention, as it is indispensably necessary that laws should be composed for the regulation of our conduct—as we have a right to make such laws without giving offence to Great Britain, or any of the American Colonies—without disturbing the repose of any society or community under Heaven—if it is probable, nay, certain, that the laws may derive force and efficacy from our mutual consent, and that consent resulting from our own virtue, interest and convenience, nothing remains but to set about the business immediately, and let the event determine the wisdom of the undertaking.

Among the many objects that must present themselves for your consideration, the first in order must, from its importance, be that of establishing courts of justice and tribunals, for the punishment of such as may offend against the laws you are about to make. As this law will be the chief cornerstone in the ground work or basis of our Constitution, let us, in a particular manner, recommend the most dispassionate attention, while you take for your guide as much of the spirit and genius of the laws of England as can be interwoven with those of this country. We are all Englishmen, or what amounts to the same; ourselves and our fathers have, for many generations, experienced the invaluable blessings of that most excellent Constitution, and surely we cannot want motives to copy from so noble an original.

Many things, no doubt, crowd upon your minds, and seem equally to demand your attention. But next to that of restraining vice and immorality, surely nothing can be of more importance than establishing some plain and easy method of recovery of debts, and determining matters of dispute with respect to property, contracts, torts, injuries, etc. These things are so essential, that if not strictly attended to, our name will become odious abroad, and our peace of short and precarious duration. It would give honest and disinterested persons cause to suspect that there was some colourable reason, at least for the unworthy and scandalous assertions, together with the groundless insinuations contained in an infamous and scurrilous libel lately printed and published, concerning the settlement of this country. . . .

I have not the least doubt, gentlemen, but that your conduct, in this Convention will manifest the honest and laudable intentions of the present adventurers, whilst a conscious blush confounds the wilful calumniators and officious detractors of our infant and, as yet, little community.

Next to the establishment of courts or tribunals, as well for the punishment of publick offenders as the recovering of just debts, that of establishing and regulating a militia seems of the greatest importance. It is apparent that, without some wise institution respecting our mutual defence, the different towns or settlements are, every day, exposed to the most imminent danger, and liable to be destroyed at the mere will of the savage Indians.

Nothing, I am persuaded, but their entire ignorance of our weakness and want of order has, hitherto, preserved us from the destructive and rapacious hands of cruelty, and given us an opportunity, at this time, of forming secure, defensive plans, to be supported and carried into execution by the authority and sanction of a well digested law.

There are sundry other things highly worthy your consideration, and demand redress, such as the wanton destruction of our game, the only support of life amongst many of us, and for want of which the country would be abandoned ere tomorrow, and scarcely a probability remain of its ever becoming the habitation of any Christian people. This, together with the practice of many foreigners who make a business of hunting in our country, killing, driving off and lessening the number of wild cattle and other game, whilst the value of the skins and furs is appropriated to the benefit of persons not concerned or interested in our settlements. These are evils, I say, that I am convinced cannot escape your notice and attention.

Mr. Chairman and Gentlemen of the Convention, you may assure yourselves that this new-born country is an object of the most particular attention of the Proprietors here on the spot, as well as those on the other side of the mountains, and that they will most cheerfully concur in every measure which can, in the most distant and remote degree, promote its happiness or contribute to its grandeur.

3. "EVERY MAN IS A CO-LEGISLATOR WITH ALL THE OTHERS"

Address of the Mechanics of New York City to the Delegates to the Congress of New York.

Mechanicks' Hall, June 14, 1776

Elected Delegates: With due confidence in the declaration which you lately made to the Chairman of our General Committee that you are, at all times, ready and willing to attend to every request of your "constituents or any part of them"; we, the Mechanics in Union, though a very inconsiderable part of your constituents, beg leave to represent that one of the clauses in your Resolve respecting the establishment of a new form of Government is erroneously construed, and for that reason may serve the most dangerous purposes; for it is well known how indefatigable the emissaries of the British Government are in the pursuit of every scheme which is likely to bring disgrace upon our ruler, and ruin upon us all. At the same time we cheerfully acknowledge that the genuine spirit of liberty which animates the other parts of that Resolve, did not permit us to interpret it in any other sense than that which is the most obvious, and likewise the most favourable to the natural rights of man.

We could not, we never can, believe you intended that the future delegates or yourselves should be vested with the power of framing a new Constitution for this Colony, and that its inhabitants at large should not exercise the right which God has given them, in common with all men, to judge whether it be consistent with their interest to accept or reject a Constitution framed for that State of which they are members. This is the birthright of every man, to whatever state he may belong. There he is, or ought to be, by inalienable right, a co-legislator with all the other members of that community. Conscious of our own want of abilities, we are, alas! but too sensible that every individual is not qualified for assisting in the framing of a Constitution. But that share of common sense which the Almighty has bountifully distributed amongst mankind in general, is sufficient to quicken every one's feeling, and enable him to judge rightly what degree of safety and what advantages he is likely to enjoy, or be deprived of, under any Constitution proposed to him.

For this reason, should a preposterous confidence in the abilities and integrity of our future Delegates delude us into measures which might imply a renunciation of our inalienable right to ratify our laws, we believe that your wisdom, your patriotism, your own interest, nay, your ambition itself, would urge you to exert all the powers of persuasion you possess, and try every method which, in your opinion, would deter us from perpetrating that impious and frantick act of self-destruction; for as it would precipitate us into a state of absolute slavery, the lawful power which till now you have received from your constituents to be exercised over a free people, would be annihilated by that unnatural act. It might probably accelerate our political death; but it must immediately cause your own. . . .

Signed by order of the Committee: MALCOLM MCEUEN, Chairman

4. DELEGATES TO CONGRESS MUST BE ELECTED BY ALL FREEHOLDERS

Instructions to their Representatives, voted by the freemen of a town in Connecticut, at their annual meeting in September 1776.

Gentlemen: Although we repose the highest confidence in your zeal for the publick weal and particular attention to the true interests of your constituents, yet we think it our duty to manifest to you our sentiments respecting a matter which we hope may come under the consideration of the honourable General Assembly of the State of Connecticut the ensuing session, and in our apprehension is of the utmost importance to the people of this State, viz: The mode of electing Delegates to represent this State in the General Congress of America.

The exigency of publick affairs have heretofore seemed to require that they should be nominated and appointed by the General Assembly, which has been done to general satisfaction. America is now declared independent, and is forming into an empire unconnected with any other part of the globe. We think it a duty we owe ourselves and posterity to guard our rights and privileges on every quarter, lest a precedent, founded at first in necessity or accident, should be in time construed to deprive us of one privilege which we deem essential to the preservation of all the rest.

The power of electing Representatives, who, with others, are entrusted with power to declare war and make peace, to form alliances with foreign nations, and to make laws for an extensive empire, (we conceive) can be lodged nowhere in so safe hands as that of the whole body of freeholders in a State. Bribery and corruption, intrigue and undue influence, is much more easily practised upon a few than many; although we have the highest value for our own General Assembly, whose members have heretofore been governed and directed by the most laudable of principles, the love of their country's welfare, yet we are not sure that in all future times the same attention will be paid to the true interest of their constituents, or the same principle be the ruling motive of action; and we must declare to you that we think it a right which unalienably belongs to the freeholders of this State to elect members to represent them in the General Congress of America, and a right and power which posterity cannot be deprived of by any previous or present obligation to others.

We do, therefore, as part of the freeholders of this State, enjoin it upon you as our Representatives in General Assembly, to use your utmost influence that the Assembly do order and direct that such election of Delegates to represent this State in General Congress, be annually made by the freeholders, or freemen at large, and not by their Representatives in General Assembly.

5. "ALL POWER ORIGINATES FROM THE PEOPLE"

To the Freeholders and Inhabitants of New Hampshire.

January 30, 1777

... We proceed to observe that the declaration of independency made the antecedent form of government to be of necessity null and void; and by that act the people of the different colonies slid back into a state of nature, and in that condition they were to begin anew. But has it been so in the government of New Hampshire? I ask how shall we know that independency has been proclaimed, if we only consult the civil economy of this state? In fact, we have no other sign of it but the bare declaration of the Congress. I ask again, what advantage independency has been of to this government, since it had the same legislature before as after the declaration? Think on these matters; and though it is now late, yet that very consideration proves the necessity of dissolving soon the present unconstitutional legislature, and planting the seed anew.

But if it be still asserted that the legislative constitution is founded on independency, it will prove, if anything, that this very constitution established independency itself, before it was proclaimed by the congress. All power originates from the people. A state of independency before a plan of government is formed, supposes the whole right to be vested in them who by a full representation are to rear a new fabric. But it has not been so in the present case; for this very assembly, which was in being before the declaration of independency, has dictated the regulations that took place afterwards. The grossest absurdity, which will appear in one word, [is], viz., the legislature over the people before independency was unconstitutional and deprived them of their rights, yet this very unconstitutional legislature has marked out their liberties for them in the state of independency. As much as to say, an unconstitutional body have made a constitutional one. Would to God that you might carefully weigh these matters, and that every one would measure them by the feelings in his own mind!

There has been for some time a dispute among you as to the right of each incorporated town to a distinct representation. But that it is just seems so plain from the nature of the thing and what has been wrote upon the subject, that there remains but little room for objection. The chief argument now made use of is that if every small incorporated town is represented distinctly, it will be a great expense to the people. The absurdity of this will appear in a few words. . . .

Should any, in the character of a Committee or otherwise, endeavor to compound matters with the people in the aggrieved towns, as an impartial writer I conjure you strenuously to adhere to these two important articles:

1. That you give not up an ace of the rights that the smallest town has to a distinct representation, if incorporated—the bare number of individuals being, in this case, out of the question.

2ndly. That as the present assembly is unconstitutional, being the same, virtually, as before the declaration of independency, they do dissolve themselves, after having notified each corporate town to form a new body that may fix on a plan of government, which can be the only proper seal of your concurrence in independency. Thus you will act a consistent part, and secure your palace from being pilfered within while you are filling up the breaches that are made without.

6. SAMUEL ADAMS EXPLAINS HOW AMERICANS MAKE GOVERNMENT

Marquis de Chastellux' recollections, 1780-1782.

. . . From this subject we passed to a more interesting one: the form of government which should be given to each state; for it is only on account of the future that it is necessary to take a retrospect of the past. The revolution has taken place, and the republic is beginning; it is an infant newly born, the question is how to nourish and rear it to maturity. I expressed to Mr. Adams some anxiety for the foundations on which the new constitutions are formed, and particularly on that of Massachusetts. Every citizen, said I, every man who pays taxes, has a right to vote in the election of representatives who form the legislative body, and who may be called the sovereign power. All this is very well for the present moment, because every citizen is pretty equally at his ease, or may be so in a short time, but the success of commerce, and even of agriculture, will introduce riches amongst you, and riches will produce inequality of fortunes, and of property. Now, wherever this inequality exists, the real force will invariably be on the side of property; for that if the influence in government be not proportioned to that property, there will always be a contrariety, a combat between the form of government and its natural tendency, the right will be on the one side, and the power on the other; the balance then can only exist between the two equally dangerous extremes of aristocracy and anarchy. Besides, the ideal worth of men must ever be comparative: an individual without property is a discontented citizen, when the state is poor; place a rich man near him, he dwindles into a clown. What will result then one day from vesting the right of election in this class of citizens? The source of civil broils, or corruption, perhaps both at the same time.

The following was pretty nearly the answer of Mr. Adams: I am very sensible of the force of your objections; we are not what we should be, we should labour rather for the future than for the present moment. I build a country house, and have infant children; I ought doubtless to construct their apartments with an eye to the time in which they shall be grown up and married: but we have not neglected this precaution.

In the first place, I must inform you that this new constitution was proposed and agreed to in the most legitimate manner of which there is any example since the days of Lycurgus. A committee chosen from the members of the legislative body, then existing, and which might be considered as a provisional government, was named to prepare a new code of laws. As soon as it was prepared, each county or district was required to name a committee to examine this plan: it was recommended to them to send it back at the expiration of a certain time, with their observations. These observations having been discussed by the committee, and the necessary alterations made, the plan was sent back to each particular committee. When they had all approved it, they received orders to communicate it to the people at large, and to demand their suffrages. If two-thirds of the voters approved it, it was to have the force of law, and be regarded as the work of the people themselves; of two and twenty thousand suffrages, a much greater proportion than two-thirds was in favour of the new constitution.

Now these were the principles on which it was established: a state is never free but when each citizen is bound by no law whatever that he has not approved of, either by himself, or by his representatives; but to represent another man, it is necessary to have been elected by him; every citizen therefore should have a part in elections.

On the other hand, it would be in vain for the people to possess the right of electing representatives, were they restrained in the choice of them to a particular class; it is necessary therefore not to require too much property as a qualification for the representative of the people. Accordingly the house of representatives which form the legislative body, and the true sovereign, are the people themselves represented by their delegates.

Thus far the government is purely democratical; but it is the permanent and enlightened will of the people which should constitute law, and not the passions and sallies to which they are too subject. It is necessary to moderate their first emotions, and bring them to the test of enquiry and reflection. This is the important business entrusted with the governor and senate, who represent with us the negative power, vested in England in the upper-house, and even in the crown, with this difference only, that in our new constitution the senate has a right to reject a law, and the governor to suspend the promulgation, and return it for a reconsideration; but these forms complied with, if, after this fresh examination, the people persist in their resolution, and there is then not, as before, a mere majority, but two-thirds of the suffrages in favour of the law, the governor and senate are compelled to give it their sanction. Thus this power moderates without destroying the authority of the people, and such is the organization of our republic as to prevent the springs from breaking by too rapid a movement, without ever stopping them entirely.

Now, it is here we have given all its weight to property. A man must have a pretty considerable property to vote for a member of the senate; he must have a more considerable one to make himself eligible. Thus the democracy is pure and entirely in the assembly, which represents the sovereign; and the aristocracy, or, if you will, the optimacy, is to be found only in the moderating power, where it is the more necessary as men never watch more carefully over the state than when they have a great interest in its destiny.

As to the power of commanding armies, it ought neither to be vested in a great nor even in a small number of men: the governor alone can employ the forces by sea and land according to the necessity; but the land forces will consist only in the militia, which, as it is composed of the people themselves, can never act against the people.

—CHASTELLUX, Travels in North America, I, 268 ff.

II. MASSACHUSETTS REALIZES THE THEORIES OF THE WISEST WRITERS

The period of the American Revolution was remarkably creative, and nowhere more so than in the realm of political institutions. Out of it came the modern federal system, the written constitution, a new colonial system, judicial review and, in a sense, the modern political party. And out of it came the fundamental institution of modern democracy, the constitutional convention. It is the fundamental institution of democracy because it provides a constitutional method for abolishing government and instituting new government on the basis of consent.

Government, Jefferson had said, derives its authority from the consent of the governed, and whenever it becomes destructive of the ends for which it is created it is the right of the people to alter or abolish it and to institute new governments. Congress endorsed and public opinion applauded this argument. But was it not an invitation to perpetual warfare? Jefferson himself was fearful of its logical consequences, and hastened to add that prudence would dictate that governments be not overthrown for light and transient causes. But that did not really meet the problem, for when were men who thought they suffered ever prudent?

The American Revolution itself was a violent revolution. How could men have revolution without violence? How could they legalize revolution? The answer: the constitutional convention.

If an institution is ever the lengthened shadow of one man, then the constitutional convention is the lengthened shadow of John Adams. Yet what he wrote and said, others thought; and resolutions such as those from the towns of Concord and Pittsfield, in Massachusetts, indicate how widespread and deep was the understanding of sound political principles at the time. Yet it was, indubitably, Adams who raised, who agitated, and who worried this question until in the end his colleagues "heard him with more patience" and even began "to ask him civil questions." That he was ready with his answers, he himself testifies; we can forgive his vanity the more easily as we recognize that his were the right answers. In any event Congress followed his lead in advising the states how to go about the business of setting up state governments. And it was in Massachusetts that the process was carried out with the most scrupulous respect to sound political principles.

The process can be followed in some detail. On September 17, 1776, the Massachusetts House asked the towns to vote whether they would authorize it to draw up a new constitution. To this inquiry Concord and Pittsfield replied with statements of the principles that should govern constitution making. The Assembly did not, however, proceed with constitution making, but appointed a committee to draw up a constitution. This committee reported in December 1777, and the next year a convention met, accepted this draft, and submitted it to the towns. It lacked a Bill of Rights, and other necessary features, and was defeated by the resounding vote of 9,972 to 2,083. The next year the General Court, in a chastened mood, took up once again the task of constitution making. Again it asked the people to authorize a convention, which was done. It is worthy of note that all freemen over 21 were entitled to vote on this issue. The convention, which met the following year, had a distinguished membership, including Sam Adams, Hancock, Bowdoin, Parsons and others. Happily John Adams had just come home from France, and was able to guide the deliberations of the convention and, eventually, to draft the constitution. This second try was submitted to the towns and accepted. Thus, said Adams, Massachusetts had "realized the theories of the wisest writers." Thus, wrote Thomas Dawes, "the people of Massachusetts have reduced to practice a wonderful theory. A numerous people have convened in a state of nature, and like our ideas of the patriarchs, have deputed a few fathers of the land to draw up for them a glorious covenant."

New Hampshire speedily adopted the Massachusetts institution of the constitutional convention, and eventually all the other states did the same. From the time of the French and Spanish-American revolutions down to our own day the constitutional convention has spread throughout the globe.

1. HOW TO GLIDE INSENSIBLY FROM AN OLD GOVERNMENT TO A NEW

John Adams to Mercy Warren.

April 16, 1776

. . . I know of no researches in any of the sciences more ingenious than those which have been made after the best forms of government, nor can there be a more agreeable employment to a benevolent heart. The time is now approaching when the Colonies will find themselves under a necessity of engaging in earnest in this great and indispensable work. I have ever thought it the most difficult and dangerous part of the business Americans have to do in this mighty contest, to contrive some method for the Colonies to glide insensibly from under the old government into a peaceable and contented submission to new ones. It is a long time since this opinion was conceived, and it has never been out of my mind. My constant endeavour has been to convince gentlemen of the necessity of turning their thoughts to these subjects. At present, the sense of this necessity seems to be general, and measures are taking which must terminate in a compleat revolution. There is danger of convulsions, but, I hope, not great ones.

The form of government which you admire, when its principles are pure is admirable; indeed, it is productive of every thing which is great and excellent among men. But its principles are as easily destroyed as human nature is corrupted. Such a government is only to be supported by pure religion, or austere morals. Public virtue cannot exist in a nation without private, and public virtue is the only foundation of republics. There must be a positive passion for the public good, the public interest, honour, power and glory, established in the minds of the people, or there can be no republican government, nor any real liberty: and this public passion must be superiour to all private passions. Men must be ready, they must pride themselves and be happy to sacrifice their private pleasures, passions and interests, nay, their private friendships and dearest connections, when they stand in competition with the rights of society.

Is there in the world a nation which deserves this character? There have been several, but they are no more. Our dear Americans perhaps have as much of it as any nation now existing, and New England perhaps has more than the rest of America. But I have seen all along my life such selfishness and littleness even in New England that I sometimes tremble to think that, altho we are engaged in the best cause that ever employed the human heart, yet the prospect of success is doubtful not for want of power or of wisdom but of virtue.

—Warren-Adams Letters, I, 221-222.

2. JOHN ADAMS EXPLAINS HOW TO SET UP STATE GOVERNMENTS

From the Autobiography.

On Friday, June 2d, 1775,

"The President laid before Congress a letter from the Provincial Convention of Massachusetts Bay, dated May 16th, which was read, setting forth the difficulties they labor under for want of a regular form of government, and as they and the other Colonies are now compelled to raise an army to defend themselves from the butcheries and devastations of their implacable enemies, which renders it still more necessary to have a regular established government, requesting the Congress to favor them with explicit advice respecting the taking up and exercising the powers of civil government, and declaring their readiness to submit to such a general plan as the Congress may direct for the Colonies, or make it their great study to establish such a form of government there as shall not only promote their advantage, but the union and interest of all America." (Journals of Congress)

This subject had engaged much of my attention before I left Massachusetts, and had been frequently the subject of conversation between me and many of my friends—Dr. Winthrop, Dr. Cooper, Colonel Otis, the two Warrens, Major Hawley and others, besides my colleagues in Congress—and lay with great weight upon my mind, as the most difficult and dangerous business that we had to do (for from the beginning, I always expected we should have more difficulty and danger in our attempts to govern ourselves, and in our negotiations and connections with foreign powers, than from all the fleets and armies of Great Britain).

It lay, therefore, with great weight upon my mind, and when this letter was read, I embraced the opportunity to open myself in Congress, and most earnestly to entreat the serious attention of all the members, and of all the continent, to the measures which the times demanded. For my part, I thought there was great wisdom in the adage, "When the sword is drawn, throw away the scabbard." Whether we threw it away voluntarily or not, it was useless now, and would be useless forever. The pride of Britain, flushed with late triumphs and conquests, their infinite contempt of all the power of America, with an insolent, arbitrary Scotch faction, with a Bute and Mansfield at their head for a ministry, we might depend upon it, would force us to call forth every energy and resource of the country to seek the friendship of England's enemies, and we had no rational hope but from the Ratio ultima regum et rerum publicarum.

These efforts could not be made without government, and as I supposed no man would think of consolidating this vast continent under one national government, we should probably, after the example of the Greeks, the Dutch and the Swiss, form a confederacy of states, each of which must have a separate government. That the case of Massachusetts was the most urgent, but that it could not be long before every other Colony must follow her example. That with a view to this subject, I had looked into the ancient and modern confederacies for examples, but they all appeared to me to have been huddled up in a hurry by a few chiefs. But we had a people of more intelligence, curiosity and enterprise, who must be all consulted, and we must realize the theories of the wisest writers, and invite the people to erect the whole building with their own hands, upon the broadest foundation. That this could be done only by conventions of representatives chosen by the people in the several colonies, in the most exact proportions. That it was my opinion that Congress ought now to recommend to the people of every Colony to call such conventions immediately, and set up governments of their own, under their own authority; for the people were the source of all authority and original of all power.

These were new, strange and terrible doctrines to the greatest part of the members, but not a very small number heard them with apparent pleasure, and none more than Mr. John Rutledge, of South Carolina, and Mr. John Sullivan, of New Hampshire. . . .

On Wednesday, October 18th, 1775, the delegates from New Hampshire laid before the Congress a part of the instructions delivered to them by their Colony, in these words:

"We would have you immediately use your utmost endeavors to obtain advice and direction of the Congress with respect to a method for our administering justice, and regulating our civil police. We press you not to delay this matter, as its being done speedily will probably prevent the greatest confusion among us."

This instruction might have been obtained by Mr. Langdon or Mr. Whipple, but I always supposed it was General Sullivan who suggested the measures because he left Congress with a stronger impression upon his mind of the importance of it than I ever observed in either of the others. Be this, however, as it may have been, I embraced with joy the opportunity of haranguing on the subject at large and urging Congress to resolve on a general recommendation to all the States to call conventions and institute regular governments. I reasoned from various topics, many of which, perhaps, I could not now recollect. . . .

Although the opposition was still inveterate, many members of Congress began to hear me with more patience, and some began to ask me civil questions. "How can the people institute governments?"

My answer was, "By conventions of representatives, freely, fairly and proportionably chosen."

"When the convention has fabricated a government, or a constitution rather, how do we know the people will submit to it?"

"If there is any doubt of that, the convention may send out their project of a constitution to the people in their several towns, counties or districts, and the people may make the acceptance of it their own act."

"But the people know nothing about constitutions."

"I believe you are much mistaken in that supposition; if you are not, they will not oppose a plan prepared by their own chosen friends; but I believe that in every considerable portion of the people, there will be found some men who will understand the subject as well as their representatives, and these will assist in enlightening the rest."

"But what plan of government would you advise?"

"A plan as nearly resembling the government under which we were born, and have lived, as the circumstances of the country will admit. Kings we never had among us. Nobles we never had. Nothing hereditary ever existed in the country; nor will the country require or admit of any such thing. But governors and councils we have always had, as well as representatives. A legislature in three branches ought to be preserved, and independent judges."

"Where and how will you get your governors and councils?"

"By elections."

"How—who shall elect?"

"The representatives of the people in a convention will be the best qualified to contrive a mode." . . .

Friday, May 10, 1776. Congress resumed the consideration of the resolution reported from the committee of the whole, and the same was agreed as follows:

"Resolved, That it be recommended to the respective assemblies and conventions of the United Colonies, where no government sufficient to the exigencies of their affairs hath been hitherto established, to adopt such government as shall, in the opinion of the representatives of the people, best conduce to the happiness and safety of their constituents in particular, and America in general. . . ."

This resolution I considered as an epocha, a decisive event. It was a measure which I had invariably pursued for a whole year, and contended for, through a scene and a series of anxiety, labor, study, argument and obloquy, which was then little known, and is now forgotten by all but Dr. Rush and a very few who, like him, survive. Millions of curses were poured out upon me for these exertions and for these triumphs over them, by many who, whatever their pretences may have been, have never forgotten, nor cordially forgiven me. By these I mean, not the Tories, for from them I received always more candor, but a class of people who thought proper and convenient to themselves to go along with the public opinion in appearance, though in their hearts they detested it. Although they might think the public opinion was right, in general, in its difference with Great Britain, yet they secretly regretted the separation, and, above all things, the connection with France. Such a party has always existed, and was the final ruin of the federal administration, as will hereafter very plainly appear. . . .

3. STATE MAKING IN MASSACHUSETTS

A. WHO MAY ENACT A CONSTITUTION?

In the House of Representatives, September 17th, 1776.

Resolved, That it be recommended to the male inhabitants of each town in this State, being free and twenty-one years of age or upwards, that they assemble as soon as they can in Town-Meeting, upon reasonable previous warning to be therefore given, according to law; and that in such Meeting, they consider and determine whether they will give their consent that the present House of Representatives of this State of the Massachusetts-Bay in New-England, together with the Council, if they consent in one Body with the House, and by equal voice, should consult, agree on, and enact such a Constitution and form of government for this State, as the said House of Representatives and Council as aforesaid, on the fullest and most mature deliberation, shall judge will most conduce to the safety, peace and happiness of this State, in all after successions and generations; and if they would direct that the same be made public for the inspection and perusal of the inhabitants, before the ratification thereof by the Assembly. . . .

B. "GOD HAS NOW OPENED A DOOR"

Vote of Petersham Town Meeting, on forming a Constitution.

September 27, 1776

The question being put, whether this Town will consent that the present General Court shall form a Constitution of Government agreeable to their resolve of the 17th instant, and it passed in the negative, unanimously. Also unanimously voted, that the following draft be lodged in the Secretary's office, as the sense of this Town respecting that matter, agreeable to the resolve aforesaid.

The inhabitants, in order to express their mind respecting the forming a Constitution of Government for this State, would humbly show, that it is their opinion that it will be of little avail for this people to shed their blood and spend their treasure in opposing foreign tyranny, if, after all, we should fix a basis of Government partial, unsafe, and not fit for the enjoyment of free and virtuous men. We think that God, in his providence, has now opened a door, possibly the only one that this State will ever have, for the laying a foundation for its prosperity, peace and glory. A Constitution of Government, one levied on the laws of the people, cannot easily be altered (especially for the better), as the craftiness of designing men, if any errors are suffered to be fixed in its foundation in their favour, it will be next to impossible to remove them; therefore, in so momentous and important a matter, we would be willing to set out fair, and on the most likely ground to obtain the prize.

If we may be allowed to speak our minds freely, we apprehend that the present General Court of this State are not in a situation most likely to effect this great work to advantage, nor do we believe that when all the towns who have not sent a member, may have sent as many as the late law will allow them, that they will be in a proper situation for so great and important a business; for while the mercantile towns swarm with Representatives, the freehold interest of the country (in which we presume there is the most safety) have neglected to choose such a number as the late regulation entitles them; and the late resolve of Court does not empower any town who have a right to choose a number and have elected but one, to make any addition; and further, a late General Court having taken it upon them in a thin House, uninstructed and without consulting the people, materially to alter the fundamental principles of representation, and as we apprehend much for the worse, most sensibly affects us. . . .

D. NEW SALEM REJECTS THE PROPOSED CONSTITUTION OF 1778

New Salem, May the 19th, 1778

To the Honorable House of Representatives of the State of Massachusetts Bay. Gentlemen agreeable to your Resolve We have meet and Carfully Examianed the New form for a constetution and unanimously Disaproved of it. The No Present at said meeting being, 74 - - - -
Because We conceive that there are some things contained in it that are Injures to the Rights of a free People—

1ly Because there is two Branches Proposed to make the Legaslative authority When we conceive that one Branch will answer all the Porposes of Good Government much Better then two.

2ly Because in said constetution mens worth of money seems to be Pointed out as Qualifycations But we think where the Great Auther of Natur hath furnished a man to the satisfaction of the Electors and he Legaly chosen he aught to have a seat and voice in any socity of men or to serve in any office whatever.

3ly Because said constetution as we conceive admitts of three times to Numeras a house since one third part the Number would Dispatch Business with Greater Briefness and be Less Burdensome to the State.

4ly Because the Eases method for the People Setteling their one civel Cases is Not Pointed out in this Constetution we conceive that it Would be more for the well Being of the People to have authority in Each town to settle their one civel affairs. - - - -

5ly Because said Constetution Deprives the People of their just Rights of chusing their Civel and Military officers (viz) Justices Captains and Sub-boltions etc. - - - - -

6ly Because Said Constetution maks no Provision against Extravagences In Sallarys Pencions and fees we conceive that No Sallary ought to be granted Nor pencion Given or fee seet with a Less Majority then four to one.

4. MASSACHUSETTS FINALLY GETS A CONSTITUTION

A. MILTON WANTS AMENDMENTS

At a Legal Town Meeting Held in Milton on the 22d day of May 1780

The Committee appointed by the Town to take into consideration a Constitution or Frame of Government, Agreed upon by the Delegates of the People of the State of Massachusetts-Bay, Reported as follows Viz.

Gentlemen, we your Constituents having thoroughly considered the Constitution, or Frame of Government offered by the Convention, to the People of this State; are of opinion that it is in General exceedingly well calculated to promote the Peace, Freedom, and Prosperity of this State.

—Notwithstanding we would submit a few amendments to the consideration of the Convention.

In the 16th Art. in the Declaration of Rights after “the Liberty of the Press” we would have inserted these words, Viz, and the Liberty of Speech as it respects Publick men in their Publick conduct,

For unless this Liberty of Speech is granted, we are apprehensive it may be dangerous in some future time, even in Publick Town Meetings, to speak the truth of weak, or wicked Rulers—and thus the most regular, peaceable and effectual method of calling the servants of the People to account, and of reducing them to private life, may be in a great measure prevented,

And in the 7th Art. in the 2d Chap. we would have a clause inserted giving power to the Governor, in the recess of the General Court, to order the Militia or Navy to the Assistance of any Neighbouring State invaded, or threatened with immediate invasion.

Many reasons might be offered to support this amendment, but it is sufficient to say that the 3d Art. in the Confederation oblieges us to afford such assistance, and in the recess of the General Court, it cannot be done, but by the Governor.

And in the 2d Chapter, 4th Sec. and 1st Art. we would have the service of the Commissary General limited to five years.

For we apprehend every person largely entrusted with Publick property, ought to be often shifted—by that means their accounts will be much likelier to be critically examined and fairly adjusted, and the property of the People be better ascertained and secured.

In the 4th Chapt. we propose that no person shall be chosen a member of Congress unless he be an Inhabitant of this State, and possessed of a considerable real Property—the Estate adequate to the important trust, we mean not precisely to determine, but have the same to be affixed by the convention as their wisdom shall dictate.

In the 7th Art. in the 6th Chapt. we propose that the Writ of Habeas corpus shall never be suspended but in times of war, or threatned Invasion, and then for a time not exceeding six months, for we cannot conceive of any possible advantage arising to the Community by the Legislature suspending this Writ in times of publick Tranquility, But Injury may accrue to individuals, by a suspension thereof. And in times of War, or threatned Invasion six months is fully sufficient for any Legislature to ascertain the precise crime, and to procure the evidence against any Individual, in order to bring him for Trial.

Then the following Questions were put, and Voted as follows, Viz.

Question. If you will accept of the said Constitution as proposed to be amended, and do direct your Delegates to move in Convention for the same be pleased to manifest it, yeas 111 nays 0

Question. If your Delegates cannot obtain all, or any of the aforesaid alterations, will you accept of said Constitution as reported by the Convention; if you will be pleased to manifest it. yeas 110 nays 1

Question. Should any other amendments or propositions be made, that appear agreeable to two thirds of the Voters throughout the State, Do you instruct your Delegates to join in confirming the same, If you do be pleased to manifest it, yeas 110 nays 1

Question. Should the Constitution be made agreeable to two thirds of the Voters, as aforesaid, do you empower your Delegates to use their discretion in Convention in fixing the time when this Constitution, or Frame of Government shall take place, If you do be pleased to manifest it yeas 111 nays 0

B. WEST SPRINGFIELD IS CONTENT WITH ONE AMENDMENT

West Springfield, June 2, 1780

Gentlemen

The Town of Wt. Springfield having convened in a legal Meeting to consider the Constitution or Frame of Government, agreed upon by the Convention of this State and by them proposed to the People for their Approbation, Rejection, or Amendment, having had the same repeatedly read, proceeded to a Discussion of the several Articles therein contained, and have unanimously voted to approve of all the several Articles except these following, viz. the third Article in the Bill of Rights. . . . The Meeting then voted to choose a Committee to state Objections. The Committee took the Matter under Consideration and reported as follows, viz.

1st Because we conceive Religion or the Worship of God to be an unalienable Right inherent in every Individual, that we of Right cannot invest The Legislature with Authority to institute the Worship of God at stated Times and Seasons this being at all Times a Matter between God and Individuals and must be a Matter of our Choice. 2. Because we conceive that if the Legislature may be impowered to oblige all the Citizens to attend on the public Worship of God at stated Times and Seasons they may prohibit the Worship of God at any other Time. If the Legislature may institute publick Worship they may also define what that Worship shall be and so the Right of private Judgment will be at an End. 3. Because we conceive the Religion of the Gospel was fully instituted by it's Divine Author; (it is therefore repugnant to the Rules of Christianity for the Legislature to interfere otherwise than to defend the Citizens in the free Exercise of their own religious Professions and Sentiments) And consequently the Interposition of the Civil Authority is not necessary to the Religion of the Gospel which has always flourished most without it and therefore the Good of Society would be promoted by leaving the Christian Religion to the Care of the Great Head of the Church who has promised his Presence with it to the End of the World. Instead of promoting Religion and the consequent Good of Society we fear it will produce Law Suits, Bitterness and Ill-Will among the citizens of of the Commonwealth.

C. JOHN ADAMS' TOWN ACCEPTS—WITH RESERVATIONS

The Comtee of the Town of Braintree, "for taking into Consideration the Form of Government" etc., having attended that Service, Report the following alterations, and additions, as being, in their opinion, of considerable importance, They also observed Several others, such as may, instead of shall; Judge, instead of Justice, etc, which being of smaller moment, are not particularly mentioned. Tho' the following are, in the Opinion of your Comtee, of great importance, and such as they wish to take place, yet, being impressed with the necessity of having a new, and better, form of Governmt than the present; they also Report, as their Opinion, that 'tis better to accept the new Constitution, without any alteration, than to remain any longer under the present; Provided, there be possitive provision made, for having another Convention within a short space of time, and so from time to time, at regular and reasonable distances from each other, for Revision of the then Constitution.

Preamble

- a. instead of, "safety and tranquility, their natural rights, and the blessing of life": say in greater safety and tranquility, all those rights, properties, and blessings of life, for the secure enjoyment of which, they enter into civil society.

The Reason. Men, when they enter into civil society, relinquish some of their natural rights, in order to their more secure enjoyment of the remainder.

At a Meeting of the Town of Braintree, on adjournment, on the 5th of June 1780. Then Voted, that the new Constitution, with the alterations and amendments made by their Comtee, be accepted. Ninety-five voted in favor of it, but none appeared against it.

III. TWO BILLS OF RIGHTS

Americans had long been familiar with bills of rights. They took for granted that they enjoyed all the rights and privileges of Englishmen, and assumed that these included the rights asserted in Magna Charta, the Petition of Right and the great Bill of Rights of 1689. More to the point, they had long been accustomed to their own bills of rights, though not under that precise name: thus the Maryland Act for the Liberties of the People of 1639; the Massachusetts Body of Liberties of 1641; the Plantation Agreement of the Narragansett Plantations; the Fundamental Laws of West Jersey of 1676; and the Pennsylvania Charter of Privileges of 1701. In the light of this long experience it was not surprising that when Americans came to draw up the constitutions for their states they included bills of rights. The most famous of the American bills of rights are doubtless those of Virginia and Massachusetts. The first was drafted almost entirely by George Mason of Gunston Hall, a leading figure in the Virginia enlightenment; the second by John Adams. The Virginia bill of rights served as a model for those of other American states, and had some influence abroad, especially in France.

1. THE VIRGINIA DECLARATION OF RIGHTS

May 15, 1776

A declaration of rights made by the representatives of the good people of Virginia, assembled in full and free convention; which rights do pertain to them and their posterity, as the basis and foundation of government.

SECTION 1. That all men are by nature equally free and independent and have certain inherent rights, of which, when they enter into a state of society, they cannot, by any compact, deprive or divest their posterity; namely, the enjoyment of life and liberty, with the means of acquiring and possessing property, and pursuing and obtaining happiness and safety.

SEC. 2. That all power is vested in, and consequently derived from, the people; that magistrates are their trustees and servants and at all times amenable to them.

SEC. 3. That government is or ought to be instituted for the common benefit, protection, and security of the people, nation, or community; of all the various modes and forms of government, that is best which is capable of producing the greatest degree of happiness and safety and is most effectually secured against the danger of maladministration; and that, when any government shall be found inadequate or contrary to these purposes, a majority of the community hath an indubitable, inalienable, and indefeasible right to reform, alter, or abolish it, in such manner as shall be judged most conducive to the public weal.

SEC. 4. That no man, or set of men, are entitled to exclusive or separate emoluments or privileges from the community, but in consideration of public services; which, not being descendible, neither ought the offices of magistrate, legislator, or judge to be hereditary.

SEC. 5. That the legislative and executive powers of the state should be separate and distinct from the judiciary; and that the members of the two first may be restrained from oppression, by feeling and participating the burdens of the people, they should, at fixed periods, be reduced to a private station, return into that body from which they were originally taken, and the vacancies be supplied by frequent, certain, and regular elections, in which all, or any part, of the former members, to be again eligible, or ineligible, as the laws shall direct.

SEC. 6. That elections of members to serve as representatives of the people, in assembly, ought to be free; and that all men, having sufficient evidence of permanent common interest with, and attachment to, the community, have the right of suffrage and cannot be taxed or deprived of their property for public uses without their own consent, or that of their representatives so elected, nor bound by any law to which they have not, in like manner, assented for the public good.

SEC. 7. That all power of suspending laws, or the execution of laws, by any authority, without consent of the representatives of the people, is injurious to their rights and ought not to be exercised.

SEC. 8. That in all capital or criminal prosecutions a man hath a right to demand the cause and nature of his accusation, to be confronted with the accusers and witnesses, to call for evidence in his favor, and to a speedy trial by an impartial jury of twelve men of his vicinage, without whose unanimous consent he cannot be found guilty; nor can he be compelled to give evidence against himself; that no man be deprived of his liberty, except by the law of the land or the judgment of his peers.

SEC. 9. That excessive bail ought not to be required, nor excessive fines imposed, nor cruel and unusual punishments inflicted.

SEC. 10. That general warrants, whereby an officer or messenger may be commanded to search suspected places without evidence of a fact committed, or to seize any person or persons not named, or whose offense is not particularly described and supported by evidence, are grievous and oppressive and ought not to be granted.

SEC. 11. That in controversies respecting property, and in suits between man and man, the ancient trial by jury is preferable to any other and ought to be held sacred.

SEC. 12. That the freedom of the press is one of the great bulwarks of liberty and can never be restrained but by despotic governments.

SEC. 13. That a well-regulated militia, composed of the body of the people, trained to arms, is the proper, natural, and safe defense of a free state; that standing armies, in time of peace, should be avoided as dangerous to liberty; and that in all cases the military should be under strict subordination to, and governed by, the civil power.

SEC. 14. That the people have a right to uniform government; and, therefore, that no government separate from or independent of the government of Virginia ought to be erected or established within the limits thereof.

SEC. 15. That no free government, or the blessings of liberty, can be preserved to any people, but by a firm adherence to justice, moderation, temperance, frugality, and virtue, and by frequent recurrence to fundamental principles.

SEC. 16. That religion, or the duty which we owe to our Creator and the manner of discharging it, can be directed only by reason and conviction, not by force or violence; and therefore all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion, according to the dictates of conscience; and that it is the mutual duty of all to practice Christian forbearance, love, and charity toward each other.

—HENING, Statutes at Large of Virginia, IX, 110.

1780

The end of the institution, maintenance, and administration of government, is to secure the existence of the body-politic, to protect it, and to furnish the individuals who compose it with the power of enjoying in safety and tranquillity their natural rights, and the blessings of life: and whenever these great objects are not obtained, the people have a right to alter the government, and to take measures necessary for their safety, prosperity and happiness.

The body-politic is formed by a voluntary association of individuals; it is a social compact by which the whole people covenants with each citizen and each citizen with the whole people that all shall be governed by certain laws for the common good. It is the duty of the people, therefore, in framing a constitution of government, to provide for an equitable mode of making laws, as well as for an impartial interpretation and a faithful execution of them; that every man may, at all times, find his security in them.

We, therefore, the people of Massachusetts, acknowledging, with grateful hearts, the goodness of the great Legislator of the universe, in affording us, in the course of His Providence, an opportunity, deliberately and peaceably, without fraud, violence, or surprise, of entering into an original, explicit, and solemn compact with each other; and of forming a new constitution of civil government, for ourselves and posterity; and devoutly imploring His direction in so interesting a design, do agree upon, ordain, and establish, the following Declaration of Rights, and Frame of Government, as the Constitution of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts.

Part the First

A Declaration of the Rights of the Inhabitants of the Commonwealth of Massachusetts

ARTICLE I. All men are born free and equal, and have certain natural, essential, and unalienable rights; among which may be reckoned the right of enjoying and defending their lives and liberties; that of acquiring, possessing, and protecting property; in fine, that of seeking and obtaining their safety and happiness.

II. It is the right as well as the duty of all men in society, publicly, and at stated seasons, to worship the Supreme Being, the great Creator and Preserver of the universe. And no subject shall be hurt, molested, or restrained, in his person, liberty, or estate, for worshipping God in the manner and season most agreeable to the dictates of his own conscience; or for his religious profession of sentiments; provided he doth not disturb the public peace, or obstruct others in their religious worship. . . .

As the happiness of a people and the good order and preservation of civil government essentially depend upon piety, religion, and morality, and as these cannot be generally diffused through a community but by the institution of the public worship of God and of public instructions, in piety, religion, and morality. Therefore to promote their happiness and secure the good order and preservation of their government, the people of this commonwealth have a right to invest their legislature with power to authorize and require, and the legislature shall from time to time authorize and require, the several towns . . . and other bodies-politic or religious societies, to make suitable provision, at their own expense, for the institution of the public worship of God and the support and maintenance of public Protestant teachers of piety, religion, and morality. . . .

And the people of this commonwealth . . . do invest their legislature with authority to enjoin upon all the subjects an attendance upon the instructions of the public teachers aforesaid. . . .

And every denomination of Christians, demeaning themselves peaceably and as good subjects of the commonwealth, shall be equally under the protection of the law; and no subordination of any one sect or denomination to another shall ever be established by law.

IV. The people of this commonwealth have the sole and exclusive right of governing themselves, as a free, sovereign, and independent State, and do, and forever hereafter shall, exercise and enjoy every power, jurisdiction, and right, which is not, or may not hereafter be, by them expressly delegated to the United States of America, in Congress assembled.

V. All power residing originally in the people, and being derived from them, the several magistrates and officers of government, vested with authority, whether legislative, executive, or judicial, are their substitutes and agents, and are at all times accountable to them. . . .

VII. Government is instituted for the common good, for the protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness of the people and not for the profit, honor or private interest of any one man, family, or class of men: therefore the people alone have an incontestible unalienable, and indefeasible right to institute government; and to reform, alter, or totally change the same, when their protection, safety, prosperity, and happiness require it.

VIII. In order to prevent those who are vested with authority from becoming oppressors, the people have a right, at such periods and in such manner as they shall establish by their frame of government, to cause their public officers to return to private life; and to fill up vacant places by certain and regular elections and appointments. . . .

X. Each individual of the society has a right to be protected by it in the enjoyment of his life, liberty, and property. . . . No part of the property of any individual can, with justice, be taken from him, or applied to public uses, without his own consent, or that of the representative body of the people. . . . And whenever the public exigencies require that the property of any individual should be appropriated to public uses, he shall receive a reasonable compensation therefor. . . .

XII. No subject shall be held to answer for any crimes or offence, until the same is fully and plainly . . . described to him; or be compelled to accuse, or furnish evidence against himself. And every subject shall have a right to produce all proofs that may be favorable to him; to meet the witnesses against him face to face, and to be fully heard in his defence by himself, or his counsel, at his election. And no subject shall be arrested, . . . or deprived of his life, liberty or estate, but by the judgment of his peers, or the law of the land.

And the legislature shall not make any law that shall subject any person to a capital or infamous punishment, excepting for the government of the army and navy, without trial by jury. . . .

XIV. Every subject has a right to be secure from all unreasonable searches, and seizures, of his person, his houses, his papers, and all his possessions. . . . And no warrant ought to be issued but in cases, and with the formalities prescribed by the laws.

XV. In all controversies concerning property, and in all suits between two or more persons, . . . the parties have a right to a trial by jury; and this method of procedure shall be held sacred. . . .

XVI. The liberty of the press is essential to the security of freedom in a state it ought not, therefore, to be restricted in this commonwealth.

XVII. The people have a right to keep and to bear arms for the common defence. And as, in time of peace, armies are dangerous to liberty, they ought not to be maintained without the consent of the legislature; and the military power shall always be held in an exact subordination to the civil authority, and be governed by it.

XVIII. A frequent recurrence to the fundamental principles of the constitution, and a constant adherence to those of piety, justice, moderation, temperance, industry and frugality, are absolutely necessary to preserve the advantages of liberty, and to maintain a free government. The people ought, consequently, to have a particular attention to all those principles, in the choice of their officers and representatives: and they have a right to require of their lawgivers and magistrates an exact and constant observance of them, in the formation and execution of the laws necessary for the good administration of the commonwealth.

XIX. The people have a right, in an orderly and peaceable manner to assemble to consult upon the common good; give instructions to their representatives, and to request of the legislative body, by the way of addresses, petitions, or remonstrances, redress of the wrongs done them, and of the grievances they suffer. . . .

XXIV. Laws made to punish for actions done before the existence of such laws, and which have not been declared crimes by preceding laws, are unjust, oppressive, and inconsistent with the fundamental principles of a free government. . . .

XXIX. It is essential to the preservation of the rights of every individual, his life, liberty, property, and character, that there be an impartial interpretation of the laws, and administration of justice. It is the right of every citizen to be tried by judges as free, impartial, and independent as the lot of humanity will admit. It is, therefore, not only the best policy, but for the security of the rights of the people, and of every citizen, that the judges of the supreme judicial court should hold their offices as long as they behave themselves well; and that they should have honorable salaries ascertained and established by standing laws.

XXX. In the government of this commonwealth, the legislative department shall never exercise the executive and judicial powers, or either of them: the executive shall never exercise the legislative and judicial powers, or either of them: the judicial shall never exercise the legislative and executive powers, or either of them: to the end it may be the government of laws and not of men.

—THORPE, Federal and State Constitutions, III, 1888-1893.

IV. FREEDOM EMBRACES RELIGION AS WELL AS POLITICS

When the Revolution broke out, the Anglican Church was the established church in every colony from Maryland south; the Congregational Church enjoyed special privileges in Massachusetts, Connecticut and New Hampshire, and the Anglican and the Dutch Reformed in parts of New York. In all of these colonies the dissenters—in the South perhaps a majority of the population—were discriminated against in various ways. The Revolution wrecked the establishment in Maryland and North Carolina, and jolted it badly in South Carolina and Georgia. It was in Virginia that the issue of religious freedom and an establishment was debated and fought out most thoroughly. Here the establishment was thoroughly entrenched, and here even some of the dissenters had no objection to state support of religion as long as their denominations enjoyed some of the support. The Constitution of 1776 declared that "all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion," but not until 1779 was the Church disestablished, and it required another seven years before the legislature was prepared to enact Jefferson's Statute for Religious Freedom. Jefferson characterized this fight—with some exaggeration—as "the severest contest in which I have ever been engaged," and regarded its successful outcome as one of the three most important achievements of his life.

The new constitutions of the Middle States embodied the principle of religious freedom and equality as a matter of course—though even in liberal Pennsylvania members of the Assembly were required to take an oath that they were orthodox Protestant Christians. Religious liberty and equality already obtained in Vermont and Rhode Island; elsewhere in New England the privileged position of the Congregational Church was strengthened by the Revolution. These states instituted, or continued, a sort of quasi establishment according to which everyone had to pay a religious tax either to the Congregational Church of the parish where he resided, or to some other recognized and organized church. Quakers and Baptists protested against this illiberal arrangement even before independence, and we give here John Adams' account of a meeting with prominent Quakers—one which clearly embarrassed him—and a petition of Massachusetts Baptists for exemption from what they considered illiberal and illegal taxation.

1. QUAKERS PROTEST THE ILLIBERALITY OF MASSACHUSETTS

John Adams' account of a Philadelphia conference.

October 1774

Governor Hopkins and Governor Ward, of Rhode Island, came to our lodgings and said to us that President Manning, of Rhode Island College, and Mr. Backus, of Massachusetts, were in town, and had conversed with some gentlemen in Philadelphia who wished to communicate to us a little business, and wished we would meet them at six in the evening at Carpenters' Hall. Whether they explained their affairs more particularly to any of my colleagues, I know not; but I had no idea of the design. We all went at the hour, and to my great surprise found the hall almost full of people, and a great number of Quakers seated at a long table with their broad brimmed beavers on their heads. We were invited to seats among them, and informed that they had received complaints from some Anabaptists and some Friends in Massachusetts against certain laws of that province, restrictive of the liberty of conscience, and some instances were mentioned in the General Court, and in the courts of justice, in which Friends and Baptists had been grievously oppressed. I know not how my colleagues felt, but I own I was greatly surprised and somewhat indignant, being, like my friend Chase, of a temper naturally quick and warm, at seeing our State and her delegates thus summoned before a self-created tribunal, which was neither legal nor constitutional.

Israel Pemberton, a Quaker of large property and more intrigue, began to speak, and said that Congress were here endeavoring to form a union of the Colonies; but there were difficulties in the way, and none of more importance than liberty of conscience. The laws of New England, and particularly of Massachusetts, were inconsistent with it, for they not only compelled men to pay to the building of churches and support of ministers, but to go to some known religious assembly on first days, etc., and that he and his friends were desirous of engaging us to assure them that our State would repeal all those laws, and place things as they were in Pennsylvania.

A suspicion instantly arose in my mind, which I have ever believed to have been well founded, that this artful Jesuit, for I had been apprised before of his character, was endeavoring to avail himself of this opportunity to break up the Congress, or at least to withdraw the Quakers and the governing part of Pennsylvania from us; for, at that time, by means of a most unequal representation, the Quakers had a majority in their House of Assembly, and, by consequence, the whole power of the State in their hands. I arose and spoke in answer to him. The substance of what I said was that we had no authority to bind our constituents to any such proposals; that the laws of Massachusetts were the most mild and equitable establishment of religion that was known in the world; if indeed they could be called an establishment; that it would be in vain for us to enter into any conferences on such a subject, for we knew beforehand our constituents would disavow all we could do or say for the satisfaction of those who invited us to this meeting. That the people of Massachusetts were as religious and conscientious as the people of Pennsylvania; that their conscience dictated to them that it was their duty to support those laws, and therefore the very liberty of conscience, which Mr. Pemberton invoked, would demand indulgence for the tender consciences of the people of Massachusetts, and allow them to preserve their laws; that, it might be depended on, this was a point that could not be carried; that I would not deceive them by insinuating the faintest hope, for I knew they might as well turn the heavenly bodies out of their annual and diurnal courses, as the people of Massachusetts at the present day from their meeting-house and Sunday laws.

Pemberton made no reply but this: "Oh! sir, pray don't urge liberty of conscience in favor of such laws!"

If I had known the particular complaints which were to be alleged, and if Pemberton had not broken irregularly into the midst of things, it might have been better, perhaps, to have postponed this declaration. However, the gentlemen proceeded and stated the particular cases of oppression, which were alleged in our general and executive courts. It happened that Mr. Cushing and Mr. Samuel Adams had been present in the General Court when the petitions had been under deliberation, and they explained the whole so clearly that every reasonable man must have been satisfied. Mr. Paine and I had been concerned at the bar in every action in the executive courts which was complained of, and we explained them all to the entire satisfaction of impartial men, and showed that there had been no oppression or injustice in any of them.

—HOVEY, Memoir of Life and Times of the Rev. Isaac Backus, pp. 349-351.

2. BAY STATE BAPTISTS CLAIM EXEMPTION FROM ILLEGAL TAXATION

To the honorable Congress of the Massachusetts province, convened at Cambridge, November 22, 1774.

Honored Gentlemen: At a time when all America are alarmed at the open and violent attempts that have been made against their liberties, it affords great cause of joy and thankfulness to see the colonies so happily united to defend their rights; and particularly that their late Continental Congress have been directed into measures so wise and salutary for obtaining relief and securing our future liberties; and who have wisely extended their regards to the rights and freedom of the poor Africans. Since then the law of equity has prevailed so far, we hope that it will move this honorable assembly to pay a just regard to their English neighbors and brethren at home.

It seems that the two main rights which all America are contending for at this day, are—Not to be taxed where they are not represented, and—To have their causes tried by unbiased judges. And the Baptist churches in this province as heartily unite with their countrymen in this cause as any denomination in the land; and are as ready to exert all their abilities to defend it. Yet only because they have thought it to be their duty to claim an equal title to these rights with their neighbors, they have repeatedly been accused of evil attempts against the general welfare of the colony; therefore, we have thought it expedient to lay a brief statement of the case before this assembly.

. . . When our churches understood that the Congress at Philadelphia was designed, not only to seek present relief, but also to lay a foundation for the future welfare of our country, they desired me to repair to that city and, with the best advice I could obtain, to try if something could not be done to obtain and secure full religious liberty to our denomination with others. I proceeded accordingly and, with a number of gentlemen and friends, had a conference with the honored delegates of this province upon this subject; but one of them repeatedly declared that he believed this attempt proceeded from the enemies of America; the injustice of which inflection, let facts declare.

The Baptists at Montague took advice of a lawyer, and endeavored to comply with your law, according to his direction; yet they were taxed and strained upon; they sued for relief in your courts, which was so far from helping them that it took away one hundred and fifteen dollars more. The Baptists in Haverhill took the same method; but the case was turned against them, which cost them about three hundred dollars. . . . The Baptists in Warwick complied with your law, yet were taxed to the parish minister; and for it eighteen of them were imprisoned about forty miles from home, in the extremity of last winter; and when our General Court were addressed upon it, they afforded no help. The Baptists in Chelmsford complied with your law, yet they were taxed; and three of them were imprisoned in January, 1773; and when they sued for recompense, their case was shifted off from court to court, till it has cost them above a hundred dollars; and when the Superior Court, at Charlestown, last April, were constrained to give Nathan Crosby his case, as having been taxed and imprisoned unlawfully, yet they gave him but three pounds damages and costs of court; and at the same time judged that the constable who carried him to prison should recover costs of Crosby for his so doing. If this is unbiased judgment, we know not what bias means. Must we be blamed for not lying still, and thus let our countrymen trample upon our rights, and deny us that very liberty that they are ready to take up arms to defend for themselves? You profess to exempt us from taxes to your worship, and yet tax us every year. Great complaints have been made about a tax which the British Parliament laid upon paper; but you require a paper tax of us annually.

That which has made the greatest noise is a tax of three pence a pound upon tea; but your law of last June laid a tax of the same sum every year upon the Baptists in each parish, as they would expect to defend themselves against a greater one. And only because the Baptists in Middleboro' have refused to pay that little tax, we hear that the first parish in said town have this fall voted to lay a greater tax upon us. All America are alarmed at the tea tax; though, if they please, they can avoid it by not buying the tea; but we have no such liberty. We must either pay the little tax, or else your people appear, even in this time of extremity, determined to lay the great one upon us. But these lines are to let you know that we are determined not to pay either of them; not only upon your principle of not being taxed where we are not represented, but also because we dare not render that homage to any earthly power which I and many of my brethren are fully convinced belongs only to God. We cannot give in the certificates you require without implicitly allowing to men that authority which we believe in our consciences belongs only to God. Here, therefore, we claim charter rights, liberty of conscience. And if any still deny it to us, they must answer it to Him who has said, "With what measure ye mete, it shall be measured to you again."

If any ask what we would have, we answer: Only allow us freely to enjoy the religious liberty that they do in Boston, and we ask no more.

We remain hearty friends to our country, and ready to do all in our power for its general welfare.

3. "REMOVE ALL RELIGIOUS AS WELL AS CIVIL BONDAGE"

October 24, 1776

To the Honourable the General Assembly of Virginia

The Memorial of the Presbytery of Hanover humbly represents:

. . . It is well known that in the frontier counties, which are justly supposed to contain a fifth part of the inhabitants of Virginia, the dissenters have borne the heavy burdens of purchasing glebes, building churches, and supporting the established clergy where there are very few Episcopalians, either to assist in bearing the expense, or to reap the advantage; and that throughout the other parts of the country, there are also many thousands of zealous friends and defenders of our State, who, besides the invidious and disadvantageous restrictions to which they have been subjected, annually pay large taxes to support an establishment from which their consciences and principles oblige them to dissent: all of which are confessedly so many violations of their natural rights; and in their consequences, a restraint upon freedom of inquiry and private judgment.

In this enlightened age, and in a land where all, of every denomination, are united in the most strenuous efforts to be free, we hope and expect that our representatives will cheerfully concur in removing every species of religious, as well as civil bondage. Certain it is that every argument for civil liberty gains additional strength when applied to liberty in the concerns of religion; and there is no argument in favour of establishing the Christian religion but what may be pleaded, with equal propriety, for establishing the tenets of Mahomed by those who believe the Alcoran; or, if this be not true, it is at least impossible for the magistrate to adjudge the right of preference among the various sects that profess the Christian faith without erecting a chair of infallibility, which would lead us back to the church of Rome.

4. VIRGINIA DISSENTERS ARE FREED FROM THE ESTABLISHMENT

The Reverend Caleb Wallace to the Reverend James Caldwell.

April 8, 1777

Our Bill of Rights declares that all men are equally entitled to the free exercise of religion according to the dictates of conscience, etc. Yet in some subsequent Acts it is manifest that our Assembly designed to continue the old Church Establishment. This, and some petitions which were circulated through various parts of the country in behalf of dignified Episcopacy, gave a general alarm to the people of dissenting principles, and the common cry was, if this is continued, what great advantage shall we derive from being independent of Great Britain? And is it not as bad for our Assembly to violate their own Declaration of Rights as for the British Parliament to break our Charter? The Baptists circulated a counter petition which was signed by above 10,000, chiefly freeholders. Our Transalpine Presbyterians were much chagrined with what they understood was like to be publicly done, and with what was said and done in a more private way against dissenters; and indeed many dissenters in every part of the country were unwilling any longer to bear the burden of an establishment.

These circumstances induced our Presbytery to take the lead and prepare a memorial on the subject to be presented to our House at the session last fall, and as none of the members who were older in the ministry and better qualified could undertake it, the Presbytery appointed me their deputy, which obliged me to make the case a popular study, which indeed I had done for some time before, and to attend the General Assembly 6 or 8 weeks. The result was the Assembly passed an act exempting dissenters for all time to come from supporting the Church of England, declaring all penal and persecuting laws against any mode of worship, etc., null and void, for the present left all denominations to support their clergy by voluntary contributions, reserving the consideration of a general assessment for the support of religion (as they phrase it) to a future session. . . .

5. VIRGINIA STATUTE OF RELIGIOUS FREEDOM

An Act for establishing Religious Freedom, January 16, 1786

I. WHEREAS Almighty God hath created the mind free; that all attempts to influence it by temporal punishments or burthens, or by civil incapacitations, tend only to beget habits of hypocrisy and meanness, and are a departure from the plan of the Holy author of our religion, who being Lord both of body and mind, yet chose not to propagate it by coercions on either, as was in his Almighty power to do; that the impious presumption of legislators and rulers, civil as well as ecclesiastical, who being themselves but fallible and uninspired men, have assumed dominion over the faith of others, setting up their own opinions and modes of thinking as the only true and infallible, and as such endeavouring to impose them on others, hath established and maintained false religions over the greatest part of the world, and through all time; that to compel a man to furnish contributions of money for the propagation of opinions which he disbelieves, is sinful and tyrannical; that even the forcing him to support this or that teacher of his own religious persuasion, is depriving him of the comfortable liberty of giving his contributions to the particular pastor whose morals he would make his pattern, and whose powers he feels most persuasive to righteousness, and is withdrawing from the ministry those temporary rewards, which proceeding from an approbation of their personal conduct, are an additional incitement to earnest and unremitting labours for the instruction of mankind; that our civil rights have no dependence on our religious opinions, any more than our opinions in physics or geometry; that therefore the proscribing any citizen as unworthy the public confidence by laying upon him an incapacity of being called to offices of trust and emolument, unless he profess or renounce this or that religious opinion, is depriving him injuriously of those privileges and advantages to which in common with his fellow-citizens he has a natural right; that it tends only to corrupt the principles of that religion it is meant to encourage, by bribing with a monopoly of worldly honours and emoluments, those who will externally profess and conform to it; that though indeed these are criminal who do not withstand such temptation, yet neither are those innocent who lay the bait in their way; that to suffer the civil magistrate to intrude his powers into the field of opinion, and to restrain the profession or propagation of principles on supposition of their ill tendency, is a dangerous fallacy, which at once destroys all religious liberty, because he being of course judge of that tendency will make his opinions the rule of judgment, and approve or condemn the sentiments of others only as they shall square with or differ from his own; that it is time enough for the rightful purposes of civil government, for its officers to interfere when principles break out into overt acts against peace and good order; and finally, that truth is great and will prevail if left to herself, that she is the proper and sufficient antagonist to error, and has nothing to fear from the conflict, unless by human interposition disarmed of her natural weapons, free argument and debate, errors ceasing to be dangerous when it is permitted freely to contradict them.

II. Be it enacted by the General Assembly, that no man shall be compelled to frequent or support any religious worship, place or ministry whatsoever, nor shall be enforced, restrained, molested, or burthened in his body or goods, nor shall otherwise suffer on account of his religious opinions or belief; but that all men shall be free to profess, and by argument to maintain, their opinion in matters of religion, and that the same shall in no wise diminish, enlarge or affect their civil capacities.

III. And though we well know that this assembly, elected by the people for the ordinary purposes of legislation only, have no power to restrain the acts of succeeding assemblies, constituted with powers equal to our own, and that therefore to declare this act to be irrevocable would be of no effect in law; yet as we are free to declare, and do declare, that the rights hereby asserted are of the natural rights of mankind, and that if any act shall hereafter be passed to repeal the present, or to narrow its operation, such act will be an infringement of natural right.

—HENING, ed., Statutes at Large of Virginia, XII, 84 ff.

V. HOW RECONCILE FREEDOM TO SLAVERY?

When the ill-tempered Dr. Johnson had jeered at American "slave-drivers" prating of "liberty," the thrust had struck home, for the paradox to which he referred was indeed an embarrassing one. "All men are created equal," wrote Jefferson—who was himself a slaveholder—and slaveholders from almost every state in the new nation had endorsed the sentiment. Did it mean that they recognized slavery as a wrong, as in violent conflict with the ideals of the Declaration and the objectives of the Revolution? If so, what did they propose to do to resolve the paradox?

There can be little doubt that when Jefferson wrote that all men were created equal he was thinking of white men. Yet there were those in the American states who were prepared to apply the principle to blacks as well as whites. As early as 1774 Rhode Island provided that hereafter all slaves brought into the colony should be free, and related this decision to the larger struggle for liberty:

Whereas [so read the resolution] the inhabitants of America are generally engaged in the preservation of their own rights and liberties, among which that of personal freedom must be considered as the greatest, and as those who are desirous of enjoying all the advantages of liberty themselves should be willing to extend personal liberty to others . . .

The Constitution of Vermont (not admitted as a state until 1791) abolished slavery outright. In Massachusetts the Supreme Court held that the provision of the Constitution declaring all men free and equal meant just what it said. Pennsylvania provided for gradual emancipation after 1780, and Connecticut and Rhode Island for gradual emancipation after 1784.

The problem was incomparably more difficult in the South, where slaves constituted a large part of the population: probably 200,000 in Virginia, and 100,000 in South Carolina. Yet even here the leaders did what they could to mitigate slavery, and some of them, at least, confessed their awareness that slavery was irreconcilable with professions of freedom. The Continental Congress had tried to outlaw the slave trade in 1774; Delaware prohibited it in 1776, Virginia in 1778, and Maryland in 1783, while North and South Carolina placed somewhat ineffective restrictions upon it.

Emancipation was far more difficult, especially in the South. Here proposals for even gradual emancipation were defeated, and manumission laws adopted in a most gingerly fashion. Jefferson's original proposal of 1784 to outlaw slavery in the western territory—from the Great Lakes to the Gulf—was defeated by the close vote of 7 to 6, but the Northwest Ordinance of 1787 did decree freedom in the territory north of the Ohio.

1. "A TIME WILL COME TO ABOLISH THIS LAMENTABLE EVIL"

Patrick Henry to Robert Pleasants.

Hanover, January 18, 1773

Dear Sir: I take this opportunity to acknowledge the receipt of Anthony Benezet's book against the slave trade. I thank you for it. It is not a little surprising that the professors of Christianity, whose chief excellence consists in softening the human heart and in cherishing and improving its finer feelings, should encourage a practice so totally repugnant to the first impressions of right and wrong. What adds to the wonder is that this abominable practice has been introduced in the most enlightened ages. Times that seem to have pretensions to boast of high improvements in the arts and sciences, and refined morality, have brought into general use, and guarded by many laws, a species of violence and tyranny which our more rude and barbarous, but more honest ancestors detested. Is it not amazing that at a time when the rights of humanity are defined and understood with precision, in a country, above all others, fond of liberty, that in such an age and in such a country we find men professing a religion the most humane, mild, gentle and generous, adopting a principle as repugnant to humanity as it is inconsistent with the Bible, and destructive to liberty? Every thinking, honest man rejects it in speculation; how few in practice from conscientious motives!

Would anyone believe I am the master of slaves of my own purchase! I am drawn along by the general inconvenience of living here without them. I will not, I cannot justify it. However culpable my conduct, I will so far pay my devoir to virtue as to own the excellence and rectitude of her precepts, and lament my want of conformity to them.

I believe a time will come when an opportunity will be offered to abolish this lamentable evil. Everything we do is to improve it, if it happens in our day; if not, let us transmit to our descendents, together with our slaves, a pity for their unhappy lot and an abhorrence of slavery. If we cannot reduce this wished-for reformation to practice, let us treat the unhappy victims with lenity. It is the furthest advance we can make toward justice. It is a debt we owe to the purity of our religion, to show that it is at variance with that law which warrants slavery.

I know not when to stop. I could say many things on the subject, a serious view of which gives a gloomy perspective to future times.

—WIRT, Life of Henry, I, 152-153.

2. TO VINDICATE SLAVERY IS TO CONDEMN THE AMERICAN CAUSE

Robert Pleasants to Patrick Henry.

Curles, 3rd mo. 28, 1777

Respected Friend; A knowledge of thy sentiments, a remembrance of former favors, and thy present exalted station induceth me to offer a few hints to thy consideration, which being, I apprehend, of great importance, may not be unworthy a serious thought at some leisure moment. It is in respect to slavery, of which thou art not altogether a stranger to mine, as well as some others of our friends sentiments, and perhaps too thou may have been informed that some of us from a full conviction of the injustice, and an apprehension of duty, have been induced to embrace the present favorable juncture, when the representatives of the people have nobly declared all men equally free, to manumit divers of our Negroes; and propose, without any desire to offend or thereby to injure any person, to invest more of them with the same inestimable privilege. . . .

Indeed few, very few, are now so insensible of the injustice of holding our fellow men in bondage as to undertake to vindicate it; nor can it be done, in my apprehension, without condemning the present measures in America; for if less injury offered to ourselves from the mother country can justify the expense of so much blood and treasure, how can we impose with propriety absolute slavery on others? It hath often appeared to me as if this very matter was one, if not the principal cause of our present troubles, and that we ought first to have cleansed our own hands before we could consistently oppose the measures of others tending to the same purpose; and I firmly believe the doing this justice to the injured Africans would be an acceptable offering to him who "rules in the Kingdoms of men," and "giveth wisdom to the wise, and knowledge to those who have understanding," and for a purpose too of His own glory; and happy will it be for us if we apply our talents accordingly; for such it is that are often made a blessing to themselves, to their posterity, and to mankind in general. But if on the contrary we seek our own glory and present interest by forbidden means, how can we expect peace here, or happiness hereafter? O may we, therefore, "break off our sins by righteousness, and our iniquities by showing mercy to the poor, if haply it may be a lengthening of our tranquillity!"

The Declaration of Rights is indeed noble, and I can but wish and hope thy great abilities and interest may be exerted towards a full and clear explanation and confirmation thereof; for, without that, the present struggle for liberty, if successful, would be but partial, and instead of abolishing, might lay the foundation of greater imposition and tyranny to our posterity than any we have yet known; and considering the uncertainty of future events, and all human foresight, the immediate posterity of those now in power might be effected by such partiality, as well as others whose grievances might remain unredressed.

It would therefore become the interest, as well as duty, of a wise and virtuous legislature, in forming a government, to establish a general, uniform and constant liberty, as well civil as religious; for this end, I just propose to drop a hint, which hath appeared to me as likely to accomplish the great and wise end of a general freedom, without the dangers and inconveniences which some apprehend from a present total abolition of slavery, as any thing that hath occurred to me, and perhaps might be as generally approved; which is to enact that all children of slaves to be born in future be absolutely free at the usual ages of 18 and 21, and that such who are convinced of the injustice of keeping slaves, and willing to give up the property which the law hath invested them with, may under certain regulations (so as not at an age to become chargeable, or from other impediments obnoxious to the community) have free liberty to do it.

By such a law I apprehend the children would be educated with proper notions of freedom, and be better fitted for the enjoyment of it than many now are; the state secured from intestine enemies and convulsions (which some think would attend a total immediate discharge), its true interest promoted, in proportion to the number of free-men interested in its peace and prosperity, and, above all, to do that justice to others which we contend for and claim as the unalterable birthright of every man.

—WIRT, Life of Henry, III, 49-51.

3. TOM PAINE CALLS FOR AN END TO SLAVERY

From the Pennsylvania Journal and The Weekly Advertiser.

March 8, 1775

The chief design of this paper is not to disprove [slavery], which many have sufficiently done; but to entreat Americans to consider:

1. With what consistency or decency they complain so loudly of attempts to enslave them, while they hold so many hundred thousands in slavery; and annually enslave many thousands more, without any pretence of authority, or claim upon them?

2. How just, how suitable to our crime is the punishment with which providence threatens us? We have enslaved multitudes, and shed much innocent blood in doing it; and now we are threatened with the same. And while other evils are confessed and bewailed, why not this especially, and publicly; than which no other vice has brought so much guilt on the land?

3. Whether, then, all ought not immediately to discontinue and renounce it, with grief and abhorrence? Should not every society bear testimony against it, and account obstinate persisters in it bad men, enemies to their country, and exclude them from fellowship; as they often do for much lesser faults?

4. The great question may be—what should be done with those who are enslaved already? To turn the old and infirm free would be injustice and cruelty; they who enjoyed the labors of their better days should keep and treat them humanely. As to the rest, let prudent men, with the assistance of legislatures, determine what is practicable for masters, and best for them. Perhaps some could give them lands upon reasonable rent; some, employing them in their labor still, might give them some reasonable allowances for it; so as all may have some property, and fruits of their labors at their own disposal, and be encouraged to industry; the family may live together, and enjoy the natural satisfaction of exercising relative affections and duties, with civil protection and other advantages, like fellow men. Perhaps they may sometime form useful barrier settlements on the frontiers. Then they may become interested in the public welfare, and assist in promoting it; instead of being dangerous, as now they are, should any enemy promise them a better condition. . . .

These are the sentiments of JUSTICE AND HUMANITY

—CONWAY, ed., The Writings of Paine, I, 7-9.

4. HENRY LAURENS CONFESSES HIS HATRED OF SLAVERY

Henry Laurens to John Laurens.

Charleston, S. C., 14th August, 1776

My Negroes, all to a man, are strongly attached to me; hitherto not one of them has attempted to desert; on the contrary, those who are more exposed hold themselves always ready to fly from the enemy in case of a sudden descent. Many hundreds of that colour have been stolen and decoyed by the servants of King George the Third. Captains of British ships of war and noble lords have busied themselves in such inglorious pilferage, to the disgrace of their master and disgrace of their cause. These Negroes were first enslaved by the English; acts of parliament have established the slave trade in favour of the home-residing English, and almost totally prohibited the Americans from reaping any share of it. Men of war, forts, castles, governors, companies and committees are employed and authorized by the English parliament to protect, regulate and extend the slave trade. Negroes are brought by Englishmen and sold as slaves to Americans. Bristol, Liverpool, Manchester, Birmingham, etc., etc., live upon the slave trade. The British parliament now employ their men-of-war to steal those Negroes from the Americans to whom they had sold them, pretending to set the poor wretches free, but basely trepan and sell them into tenfold worse slavery in the West Indies, where probably they will become the property of Englishmen again, and of some who sit in parliament. What meanness! What complicated wickedness appears in this scene! O England, how changed! How fallen!

You know, my dear son, I abhor slavery. I was born in a country where slavery had been established by British kings and parliaments, as well as by the laws of that country ages before my existence. I found the Christian religion and slavery growing under the same authority and cultivation. I nevertheless disliked it. In former days there was no combating the prejudices of men supported by interest; the day I hope is approaching when, from principles of gratitude as well as justice, every man will strive to be foremost in showing his readiness to comply with the golden rule.

Not less than twenty thousand pounds sterling would all my Negroes produce if sold at public auction tomorrow. I am not the man who enslaved them; they are indebted to Englishmen for that favour; nevertheless I am devising means for manumitting many of them, and for cutting off the entail of slavery. Great powers oppose me—the laws and customs of my country, my own and the avarice of my countrymen. What will my children say if I deprive them of so much estate? These are difficulties, but not insuperable. I will do as much as I can in my time, and leave the rest to a better hand.

5. EMANCIPATION IN PENNSYLVANIA—1780

Preamble to the act passed by the Pennsylvania Assembly, March 1, 1780.

When we contemplate our abhorrence of that condition to which the arms and tyranny of Great Britain were exerted to reduce us, when we look back on the variety of dangers to which we have been exposed, and how miraculously our wants in many instances have been supplied, and our deliverances wrought, when even hope and human fortitude have become unequal to the conflict, we are unavoidably led to a serious and grateful sense of the manifold blessings which we have undeservedly received from the hand of that Being from whom every good and perfect gift cometh.

Impressed with these ideas, we conceive that it is our duty, and we rejoice that it is in our power, to extend a portion of that freedom to others which has been extended to us, and release them from the state of thralldom to which we ourselves were tyrannically doomed, and from which we have now every prospect of being delivered. It is not for us to inquire why, in the creation of mankind, the inhabitants of the several parts of the earth were distinguished by a difference in feature or complexion. It is sufficient to know that all are the work of the Almighty Hand. We find in the distribution of the human species, that the most fertile as well as the most barren parts of the earth are inhabited by men of complexions different from ours, and from each other; from whence we may reasonably as well as religiously infer that He who placed them in their various situations has extended equally his care and protection to all, and that it becomes not us to counteract His mercies.

We esteem it a peculiar blessing granted to us that we are enabled this day to add one more step to universal civilization by removing, as much as possible, the sorrows of those who have lived in undeserved bondage, and from which, by the assumed authority of the kings of Great Britain, no effectual legal relief could be obtained. Weaned, by a long course of experience, from those narrow prejudices and partialities we had imbibed, we find our hearts enlarged with kindness and benevolence toward men of all conditions and nations, and we conceive ourselves at this particular period particularly called upon by the blessings which we have received, to manifest the sincerity of our profession, and to give a substantial proof of our gratitude. . . .

—MITCHELL and FLANDERS, Statutes at Large of Pennsylvania, X, 67-68.

6. MASSACHUSETTS PUTS AN END TO SLAVERY—1783

The position of slavery in Massachusetts had been a dubious one for some time even before the Revolution; the Revolution itself dealt a deathblow to slavery. In 1776 the clause of the Body of Liberties allowing enslavement of "lawful captives taken in just wars" was repealed as far as concerned Negroes taken on the high seas. The first article of the Bill of Rights of the Massachusetts Constitution of 1780 provided that "All men are born free and equal." In 1783 the case of Commonwealth v. Nathaniel Jennison came before the court. Jennison, indicted for assault on Quock Walker, defended his behavior on the ground that Walker was his slave. The court, speaking through the Chief Justice who was soon to be appointed to the first United States Supreme Court, ruled that under the provision of the Constitution of Massachusetts slavery was abolished in Massachusetts.

CUSHING, C. J.: As to the doctrine of slavery and the right of Christians to hold Africans in perpetual servitude, and sell and treat them as we do our horses and cattle, that (it is true) has been heretofore countenanced by the Province Laws formerly, but nowhere is it expressly enacted or established. It has been a usage—a usage which took its origin from the practice of some of the European nations, and the regulations of the British government respecting the then Colonies, for the benefit of trade and wealth. But whatever sentiments have formerly prevailed in this particular or slid in upon us by the example of others, a different idea has taken place with the people of America, more favorable to the natural rights of mankind, and to that natural, innate desire of Liberty, which the Heaven (without regard to color, complexion, or shape of noses-features) has inspired all the human race. And upon this ground our Constitution of Government, by which the people of this Commonwealth have solemnly bound themselves, sets out with declaring that all men are born free and equal—and that every subject is entitled to liberty, and to have it guarded by the laws, as well as life and property—and in short is totally repugnant to the idea of being born slaves. This being the case, I think the idea of slavery is inconsistent with our own conduct and Constitution; and that there can be no such thing as perpetual servitude of a rational creature, unless his liberty is forfeited by some criminal conduct or given up by personal consent or contract. . . .

—Mass. Hist. Soc., Proceedings (1873-75), p. 293.

VI. AUSTERITY, MORALITY AND EQUALITY

In part because the Revolution was fought against a King, a Court, an aristocracy, and in part because its ultimate success demanded sacrifice, it was accompanied by appeals for simplicity, virtue and morality. Such appeals, to be sure, accompany every war, and more often than not are purely verbal gestures that need not be taken seriously by the historian. We give here a few examples of the attempt to encourage, or to legislate, virtue: a Virginia resolution against gambling and profanity; a letter from the Spartan Sam Adams warning against levity; and an early tirade against titles from the pen of that indefatigable leveler, Tom Paine. It would be naïve to suppose that Americans generally accommodated themselves to the views expressed here, but not to conclude that these were widely accepted.

1. VIRGINIA SEEKS TO OUTLAW GAMING AND SWEARING

Resolution of the Virginia Convention.

June 25, 1776

WHEREAS gaming, at best, is but an idle amusement, when carried to excess is the parent of avarice, dissipation, profaneness, and every other passion which can debase the human mind, and is therefore forbidden by the Continental Association, as more peculiarly improper at this time, when our important struggle for liberty and freedom renders the practice of the most rigid virtue necessary to sustain us under and carry us through the conflict; that this pernicious and destructive vice may not prevail among the officers and soldiers of our Army, the morals of the youth therein preserved from corruption, and they restored, untainted, to their worthy parents, who have cheerfully spared them from their domestick endearments to the assistance and protection of their country:

Resolved, unanimously, That it be earnestly recommended to the General or Commanding officer of the Continental Troops in this Colony, to take such steps as to him shall appear most proper for preventing profane swearing, all manner of gaming, as well as every other vice and immorality among the officers and soldiers under his command; and that it be, and is, hereby declared to all who are or may be candidates for offices, civil or military, in the pay of this Colony, that the practice of gaming and profane swearing will ever be considered as an exclusion from all publick offices or employments. . . .

2. MAY WE NEVER BE GIVEN TO THE FOLLY OF PARADE!

Samuel Adams to Elbridge Gerry.

Philadelphia, November 27, 1780

More, in my opinion, is to be done than conquering our British enemies, in order to establish the liberties of our country on a solid basis. Human nature, I am afraid, is too much debased to relish the republican principles in which the new government of the commonwealth of Massachusetts appears to be founded. Mankind is prone enough to political idolatry; and may it not be added that the former government—I mean the last charter—being calculated to make servile men rather than free citizens, the minds of many of our countrymen have been inured to a cringing obsequiousness, too deeply wrought into habit to be easily eradicated? Such a temper is widely different from that just reverence which every virtuous citizen will show to the upright magistrate. If my fears on this head are ill grounded, I hope I shall be excused. They proceed from a cordial affection for that country, to the service of which I have devoted the greatest part of my life.

May Heaven inspire the present rulers with wisdom and sound understanding! In all probability they will stamp the character of the people. It is natural for a sensible observer to form an estimate of the people from an opinion of the men whom they set up for their legislators and magistrates. And besides, if we look into the history of governours, we shall find that their principles and manners have always had a mighty influence on the people. Should vanity and foppery ever be the ruling taste among the great, the body of the people would be in danger of catching the distemper, and the ridiculous maxims of the one would become fashionable among the other.

I pray God, we may never be addicted to levity and the folly of parade. Pomp and show serve very well to promote the purposes of European and Asiatic grandeur, in countries where the mystery of iniquity is carried to the highest pitch, and millions are tame enough to believe that they are born only to be subservient to the capricious will of a single great man, or a few! It requires council and sound judgement to render our country secure in a flourishing condition. If men of wisdom and knowledge, of moderation and temperance, of patience, fortitude and perseverance; of sobriety and true republican simplicity of manners, of zeal for the honour of the Supreme Being and the welfare of the commonwealth; if men possessed of these and other excellent qualities are chosen to fill the seats of government, we may expect that our affairs will rest on a solid and permanent foundation.

—AUSTIN, Life of Elbridge Gerry, pp. 361-362.

3. TOM PAINE: "THE FREEMAN SEES THROUGH THE MAGIC OF A TITLE"

From Pennsylvania Magazine, May 1775.

When I reflect on the pompous titles bestowed on unworthy men, I feel an indignity that instructs me to despise the absurdity. The Honorable plunderer of his country, or the Right Honorable murderer of mankind, create such a contrast of ideas as exhibit a monster rather than a man. Virtue is inflamed at the violation, and sober reason calls it nonsense.

Dignities and high sounding names have different effects on different beholders. The lustre of the Star and the title of My Lord overawe the superstitious vulgar, and forbid them to inquire into the character of the possessor: Nay more, they are, as it were, bewitched to admire in the great the vices they would honestly condemn in themselves. This sacrifice of common sense is the certain badge which distinguishes slavery from freedom; for when men yield up the privilege of thinking, the last shadow of liberty quits the horizon.

But the reasonable freeman sees through the magic of a title, and examines the man before he approves him. To him the honors of the worthless serve to write their masters' vices in capitals, and their stars shine to no other end than to read them by. The possessors of undue honors are themselves sensible of this; for when their repeated guilt renders their persons unsafe, they disown their rank, and, like glowworms, extinguish themselves into common reptiles, to avoid discovery. Thus Jeffries sunk into a fisherman, and his master escaped in the habit of a peasant.

Modesty forbids men, separately or collectively, to assume titles. But as all honors, even that of kings, originated from the public, the public may justly be called the fountain of true honor. And it is with much pleasure I have heard the title of Honorable applied to a body of men, who, nobly disregarding private ease and interest for public welfare, have justly merited the address of the The Honorable Continental Congress.

VII. EDUCATION FOR A FREE PEOPLE

War brought the notion that political independence should be accompanied by intellectual. "America must be as independent in literature as she is in politics," declaimed Noah Webster and, a short time later, he called upon Americans to "unshackle your minds, and act like independent beings. You have an empire to raise and support by your exertions and a national character to establish and extend by your wisdom and virtue."

During the Revolution the constitutions of Massachusetts, Pennsylvania, North Carolina, Georgia and Vermont specifically recognized public responsibility for the education of the young. A number of academies and colleges were established, at least on paper: the Phillips Andover and Exeter academies in 1778 and 1781; Hampden Sydney College in 1782; and Dickinson College in 1783; half a dozen others came in the years of the Confederation. Yet on the whole, of course, education suffered during the war; schools were closed, teachers lost to the profession; libraries and scientific apparatus scattered; young people drawn off to warlike or other pursuits.

Perhaps the most interesting developments in the realm of education during the war years are of opinion or principle. Thus the recognition of an obligation to provide schools for all the young; the emphasis on the practical and the suspicion of classical education; hostility to study abroad and readiness to provide substitutes at home; and the feeble beginnings of American grammars, histories and other textbooks supposedly suitable for American youth.

We give here Jefferson's plan for education in Virginia embodied in a bill presented to the Virginia legislature in 1779, but not acted on; the Georgia provision for the creation of a state university; and Jefferson's touching reminder to the great scientist Rittenhouse that the community of learning and science takes precedence over the demands of politics.

1. JEFFERSON PROPOSES A REVOLUTION IN EDUCATION FOR VIRGINIA

... This bill proposes to lay off every county into small districts of five or six miles square, called hundreds, and in each of them to establish a school for teaching reading, writing and arithmetic. The tutor to be supported by the hundred, and every person in it entitled to send their children three years gratis, and as much longer as they please, paying for it. These schools to be under a visitor who is annually to choose the boy, of best genius in the school, of those whose parents are too poor to give them further education, and to send him forward to one of the grammar schools, of which twenty are proposed to be erected in different parts of the country, for teaching Greek, Latin, Geography, and the higher branches of numerical arithmetic. Of the boys thus sent in one year, trial is to be made at the grammar schools one or two years, and the best genius of the whole selected, and continued six years, and the residue dismissed. By this means twenty of the best geniusses will be raked from the rubbish annually, and be instructed, at the public expense, so far as the grammar schools go. At the end of six years' instruction, one half are to be discontinued (from among whom the grammar schools will probably be supplied with future masters); and the other half, who are to be chosen for the superiority of their parts and disposition, are to be sent and continued three years in the study of such sciences as they shall choose, at William and Mary college, the plan of which is proposed to be enlarged, as will be hereafter explained, and extended to all the useful sciences. The ultimate result of the whole scheme of education would be the teaching all the children of the state reading, writing, and common arithmetic; turning out ten annually of superior genius, well taught in Greek, Latin, Geography, and the higher branches of arithmetic; turning out ten others annually, of still superior parts, who to those branches of learning shall have added such of the sciences as their genius shall have led them to; the furnishing to the wealthier part of the people convenient schools at which their children may be educated at their own expense. The general objects of this law are to provide an education adapted to the years, to the capacity, and the condition of every one, and directed to their freedom and happiness. . . .

Every government degenerates when trusted to the rulers of the people alone. The people themselves therefore are its only safe depositories; and to render even them safe, their minds must be improved to a certain degree. This indeed is not all that is necessary, though it be essentially necessary. An amendment of our constitution must here come in aid of the public education. The influence over government must be shared among all the people. If every individual which composes their mass participates of the ultimate authority, the government will be safe; because the corrupting the whole mass will exceed any private sources of wealth; and public ones cannot be provided but by levies on the people. . . .

Lastly, it is proposed by a bill . . . to begin a public library and gallery, by laying out a certain sum annually in books, paintings, and statues.

—JEFFERSON, Notes on Virginia, answer to Query XIV.

2. GEORGIA PROVIDES FOR A STATE UNIVERSITY

January 27, 1785

An Act for the more full and complete establishment of a public seat of learning in this State

As it is the distinguishing happiness of free governments that civil order should be the result of choice, and not necessity, and the common wishes of the people become the laws of the land, their public property, and even existence, very much depends upon suitably forming the minds and morals of their citizens. Where the minds of the people in general are viciously disposed and unprincipled, and their conduct disorderly, a free government will be attended with greater confusion, and with evils more horrid than the wild uncultivated state of nature: It can only be happy where the public principles and opinions are properly directed, and their manners regulated. This is an influence beyond the sketch of laws and punishments, and can be claimed only by religion and education. It should therefore be among the first objects of those who wish well to the national prosperity, to encourage and support the principles of religion and morality, and early to place the youth under the forming hand of society, that by instruction they may be moulded to the love of virtue and good order. Sending them abroad to other countries for their education will not answer these purposes, is too humiliating an acknowledgment of the ignorance or inferiority of our own, and will always be the cause of so great foreign attachments that upon principles of policy it is not admissible.

This country in times of our common danger and distress found such security in the principles and abilities which wise regulations had before established in the minds of our countrymen, that our present happiness, joined to pleasing prospects, should conspire to make us feel ourselves under the strongest obligation to form the youth, the rising hope of our land, to render the glorious and essential services to our country. . . .

3. "THE WORLD HAS NEVER HAD A RYTTHENHOUSE BEFORE"

Jefferson to David Rittenhouse.

Monticello in Albemarle, Virginia, July 19, 1778

Writing to a philosopher, I may hope to be pardoned for intruding some thoughts of my own, tho' they relate to him personally. Your time for two years past has, I believe, been principally employed in the civil government of your country. Tho' I have been aware of the authority our cause would acquire with the world from it's being known that yourself and Doctr. Franklin were zealous friends to it, and am myself duly impressed with a sense of the arduousness of government, and the obligation those are under who are able to conduct it, yet I am also satisfied there is an order of geniusses above that obligation, and therefore exempted from it. No body can conceive that nature ever intended to throw away a Newton upon the occupations of a crown. It would have been a prodigality for which even the conduct of providence might have been arraigned, had he been by birth annexed to what was so far below him. Cooperating with nature in her ordinary oeconomy, we should dispose of and employ the geniusses of men according to their several orders and degrees. I doubt not there are in your country many persons equal to the task of conducting government: but you should consider that the world has but one Rytthenhouse, and that it never had one before. The amazing mechanical representation of the solar system which you conceived and executed, has never been surpassed by any but the work of which it is a copy. Are those powers then, which being intended for the erudition of the world, like air and light, the world's common property, to be taken from their proper pursuit to do the commonplace drudgery of governing a single state, a work which may be executed by men of an ordinary stature, such as are always and every where to be found? Without having ascended mount Sina for inspiration, I can pronounce that the precept, in the decalogue of the vulgar, that they shall not make to themselves "the likeness of any thing that is in the heavens above" is reversed for you, and that you will fulfill the highest purposes of your creation by employing yourself in the perpetual breach of that inhibition. For my own country in particular you must remember something like a promise that it should be adorned with one of them. The taking of your city by the enemy has hitherto prevented the proposition from being made and approved by our legislature.

The zeal of a true Whig in science must excuse the hazarding these free thoughts, which flow from a desire of promoting the diffusion of knowledge and of your fame, and from one who can assure you truly that he is with much sincerity & esteem Your most obedt. & most humble servt.,

VIII. WILL THE REVOLUTION WIPE OUT CLASS DISTINCTIONS?

After the Civil War it was commonly said, in the South, that the bottom rail was on the top. The Revolution was not a social revolution in which the upper classes were swept away, their places and their property taken by the lower; indeed in the America of the 1770's the very term "upper" and "lower" class are misleading. Yet there was class consciousness: merchants, clergy, planters did constitute a class of "betters," and workingmen, fishermen, indentured servants and others—men like John Adams' horsejockey—did belong to the "lower orders." All of this was in a state of change, and the Revolution speeded up the process. Some respectable folks lamented the change, others merely its speed. Conservatives, who were often quite as ardent Patriots as the radicals, looked with misgivings on some manifestations of the leveling which accompanied the war; others on some of the political experiments, a unicameral legislature, for example, or manhood suffrage. The reaction of the Loyalists to the social pretensions of some of the Patriots can be read in the sentiments which John Trumbull puts into the mouth of his Loyalist caricature, Squire M'Fingal. Of our commentators, William Hooper, a leader of the Revolutionary movement in North Carolina and a signer of the Declaration was fundamentally conservative; the same might be said for John Adams, and even for young John Trumbull.

In no state was the internal revolution carried further than in Pennsylvania where a radical-dominated Convention wrote a democratic constitution, giving the vote to every freeman twenty-one years of age who paid public taxes, and providing for a unicameral legislature. Torn by dissension, religious differences, and opposing interests, the Whig aristocracy had yielded their leadership of the Revolutionary movement to the radicals. The latter, instead of submitting the Constitution to the people for ratification, imposed upon the voters as a condition of voting an oath to support the new constitution. The conservatives were highly critical of the behavior of the radicals. To them it was a portent of social leveling. Robert Proud, historian of Pennsylvania, castigated the Convention in verse which is included in this section.

1. "IS THE REVOLUTION FOUGHT FOR THE BENEFIT OF DEBTORS?"

From the Diary of John Adams.

[The fall of 1775]

An event of the most trifling nature in appearance, and fit only to excite laughter in other times, struck me into a profound reverie, if not a fit of melancholy. I met a man who had sometimes been my client, and sometimes I had been against him. He, though a common horse-jockey, was sometimes in the right, and I had commonly been successful in his favor in our courts of law. He was always in the law, and had been sued in many actions at almost every court.

As soon as he saw me, he came up to me, and his first salutation to me was: "Oh, Mr. Adams, what great things have you and your colleagues done for us! We can never be grateful enough to you. There are no Courts of Justice now in this Province, and I hope there never will be another."

Is this the object for which I have been contending? said I to myself, for I rode along without any answer to this wretch. Are these the sentiments of such people, and how many of them are there in the country? Half the nation, for what I know; for half the nation are debtors, if not more, and these have been, in all countries, the sentiments of debtors. If the power of the country should get into such hands, and there is great danger that it will, to what purpose have we sacrificed our time, health, and every thing else? Surely we must guard against this spirit and these principles, or we shall repent of all our conduct. . . .

—ADAMS, ed., Works of John Adams, II, 420-421.

2. A PENNSYLVANIAN WARNS OF THE CRUELTY OF THE "SERVILE SWAY"

Robert Proud, [1776]

Of all the plagues that scourge the human race,
None can be worse than upstarts, when in place;
Their pow'r to shew, no action they forbear,
They tyrannize o'er all, while all they fear.
No savage rage, no rav'nous beast of prey Exceeds the cruelty of Servile Sway!

As if the foot to be the head inclined,
Or body should aspire to rule the mind;
As when the power of fire, of air and flood,
In proper bounds, support the common good;
But when they break the bound to them assigned,
They most pernicious are to human kind;
So are those men, whose duty's to obey,
When they usurp the rule, and bear the sway.

In order God has wisely ranged the whole,
And animates that order, as the Soul;
In due gradation ev'ry rank must be,
Some high, some low, but all in their degree:
This law in ev'ry flock and herd we find,
In ev'ry living thing of ev'ry kind;
Their Chief precedes, as in the fields they stray,
The rest in order follow and obey.

Much more in men this order ought to dwell,
As they in rank and reason do excel;
A state the nearest to the Bless'd above,
Where all degrees in beauteous order move:
Which those who violate are sure to be
The tools of woeful infelicity!

Ev'n so are men, far worse than beasts of prey
When those usurp the rule, who should obey;
In self-security weak mortals find
The will of God is thus to scourge mankind.

3. THE TYRANNY OF A UNICAMERAL LEGISLATURE

William Hooper, delegate from North Carolina to the Continental Congress, to the Congress at Halifax.

Philadelphia, October 26, 1776

Honoured Sir:

... A single branch of legislation is a many headed monster which without any check must soon defeat the very purposes for which it was created, and its members become a tyranny dreadful in proportion to the numbers which compose it; and, possessed of power uncontrolled, would soon exercise it to put themselves free from the restraint of those who made them, and to make their own political existence perpetual. The consultations of large bodies are likewise less correct and perfect than those where a few only are concerned. The people at large have generally just objects in their pursuit but often fall short in the means made use of to obtain them. A warmth of zeal may lead them into errors which a more cool, dispassionate enquiry may discover and rectify.

This points out the necessity of another branch of legislation at least, which may be a refinement of the first choice of the people at large, selected for their wisdom, remarkable integrity, or that weight which arises from property and gives independence and impartiality to the human mind. For my own part I once thought it would be wise to adopt a double check as in the British Constitution, but from the abuses which power in the hand of an individual is liable to, and the unreasonableness that an individual should abrogate at pleasure the acts of the Representatives of the people, refined by a second body whom we may call, for fashion's sake, Counsellors, and as they are a kind of barrier for the people's rights against the encroachment of their delegates, I am now convinced that a third branch of legislation is at least unnecessary. But for the sake of execution we must have a magistrate solely executive, and with aid of his Council (I mean a Privy Council) let him have such executive powers as may give energy to government.

Pennsylvania adopted the visionary system of a single branch. The people soon saw the monster the Convention had framed for them with horror, and with one accord stifled it in its cradle before it had begun its outrages. . . .

4. TOO MUCH REVOLUTION IN GEORGIA

John Wereat to Henry Laurens.

Savannah, August 30th, 1777

My Dear Sir:

... I now begin to tremble for the fate that awaits this devoted country; honesty, integrity and love of justice, being the declared and avowed principles of any man, are crimes sufficient to secure him the hateful name of tory, and to hold him up to the resentment of the people as an enemy to his country. I think I told you some time ago that I thought the augmentation of the present representation under our present circumstances a great evil; every day's experience convinces me that it is so, and it requires no great degree of prescience to declare that Georgia cannot exist as a separate state twelve months longer, without the immediate interposition of Congress.

I told you in a former letter how the laws that this country are to be ruled by were framed and agreed upon at a nightly meeting in a tavern. This, though dangerous in its consequences, is but a part of the evil. We have now another nocturnal society established, who have arrogated to themselves the name of The Liberty Society. The business of this cabal, as far as I am capable of judging, seems to be principally intended to poison the minds of the people throughout the state, and to set them at enmity with every man who is not of their party. They, or the leaders of them, seem to be void of every sentiment of honour, and truth is a stranger to their proceedings; they bellow liberty, but take every method in their power to deprive the best part of the community of even the shadow of it. Those wretches appear to me to have a manifest intention to destroy the reputation of their neighbours, in order to raise themselves fortunes and political fame upon the ruins of the real friends of their country, and the American cause. . . .

5. M'FINGAL JEERS AT THE PRETENSIONS OF THE PATRIOTS

While every clown that tills the plains,
Though bankrupt in estate and brains,
By this new light transformed to traitor,
Forsakes his plough to turn dictator,
Starts an haranguing chief of Whigs,
And drags you by the ears, like pigs,
All bluster, armed with factious licence,
New-born at once to politicians.
Each leather-aproned dunce, grown wise,
Presents his forward face t'advise,
And tattered legislators meet,
From every workshop through the street.
His goose the tailor finds new use in,
To patch and turn the Constitution;
The blacksmith comes with sledge and grate
To iron-bind the wheels of state;
The quack forbears his patients' souse,
To purge the Council and the House;
The tinker quits his moulds and doxies,
To cast assembly-men and proxies.
From dunghills deep of blackest hue,
Your dirt-bred patriots spring to view,
To wealth and power and honors rise,
Like new-winged maggots changed to flies,
And fluttering round in high parade,
Strut in the robe, or gay cockade.

—JOHN TRUMBULL, M'Fingal.

CHAPTER ELEVEN

The Battle for New York

WITH THE FAILURE to put down the rebellion in New England the British determined to strike at two centers of loyalism, South Carolina and New York. Defeated in their expectations of quick victory in the South in an abbreviated campaign which will be treated subsequently, the government for a time concentrated its strategic operations in the Middle States.

New York City was the first center of such operations. Its magnificent harbor could accommodate the British fleet. He who controlled the Hudson could divide the colonies. The British strategic plan provided that General Howe was to move his heavily reinforced army from Halifax and, after occupying the city, spread control northward along the Hudson. A Canadian expedition under Carleton would push southward and join Howe at Albany. Having driven a wedge between New England and the South, the former region could be proceeded against at leisure and the back of insurgency would be broken. But the New York campaign failed, in part as a result of bad over-all planning and miscalculation, in part from military incompetence, in part from the politico-military character of the mission of the brothers Howe, the admiral and the general. Coming over in the dual role of conquerors and conciliators, the Howes, originally sympathetic to the colonial cause, hoped to persuade the Patriots to lay down their arms despite the adoption of the Declaration of Independence. By the fall of '76 they were disabused of the likelihood of a negotiated settlement, but they had lost precious time.

In addition to the brothers Howe the action around New York propels to the center of the stage such notable military personages as the cautious and suspicious Sir Henry Clinton; the dashing Major General Charles, Lord Cornwallis; and the able Lieutenant General Baron Wilhelm von Knyphausen, the sixty-year-old commander of the Hessians. On the Patriot side it throws the spotlight on that colorful if incompetent veteran Indian fighter from Connecticut, Israel Putnam; the hard-drinking and hard-fighting Jerseyite, General William Alexander, who as Lord Stirling claimed a lapsed Scottish earldom; and the controversial fighting Irishman from New Hampshire, John Sullivan.

The excerpts in this chapter relate the story of the preparation for war in New York, the arrival of the British naval and military forces, the great amphibious landing on Long Island and the ensuing battle, Washington's withdrawal to New York, the battle for Manhattan, the retreat to White Plains, and the fall of Fort Mifflin, the last Patriot stronghold on Manhattan Island.

I. THE REDCOATS BRING WAR TO THE MIDDLE STATES

In the spring of '76 no Patriot leader could have confidently predicted just where the British would strike and what, if any, general plan of campaign they would soon divulge. Nevertheless, after the British evacuated Boston, Washington considered New York vital to any successful defense against invasion. William Alexander, Lord Stirling, was for a time in command of New York after General Charles Lee's departure for the South early in 1776. Control of New York City and the Hudson River would, according to Washington, give the British "an easy pass to Canada." Impressing on Stirling the "vast importance" of holding the city, Washington began to dispatch troops there on March 18. Heath's, Sullivan's, Greene's and Spencer's brigades were sent, with Israel Putnam in general command. When the army assembled, the Virginians were properly shocked at the democratic practices among the New England militia, the existence of nepotism and the poor morale. So deep was the spirit of sectionalism within the army that Washington was impelled to issue a general order appealing for unity in the ranks. Meantime, the manpower of the city was called up to build fortifications, the woodlands of the rich Loyalists were leveled, and the city's mansions used as barracks. "Oh, the houses of New York, if you could see the insides of them!" lamented a New York resident. As always, the huge army attracted prostitutes along with the usual variety of camp followers.

1. "FOR GOD'S SAKE DO NOT DELAY!" STIRLING PLEADS

Lord Stirling to Samuel Tucker, President of the Committee of Safety of the Province of New Jersey.

Elizabeth Town, March 23, 1776

I have just received the enclosed letters from General Washington and Brigadier General Thompson. From them you will see the necessity of every province contiguous to New York exerting themselves in sending troops to that place [to] assist in fortifying and defending it, and also fortifying and defending such parts of this province as are most liable and likely to be invaded, with an attention to the latter.

I came over from New York yesterday in order to view the grounds on the Heights [of] Bergen Neck and the Kills Van Kull, and Staten Island; I was prevented by the bad weather in proceeding [as] far in this work as I could have wished; but on the whole I think that the militia of the counties of Bergen and Middlesex should be immediately employed in fortifying Amboy, Elizabeth Town Point, the Kills and Bergen Neck with Poules Hook. I shall communicate my plan to Brigadier General Livingston and shall return to New York tomorrow morning. I will be here again in a day or two, and bring some assistant [eng]ineer's with me in order to lay out such works as General Thompson on my report approves of.

In the mean time I hope your Committee of Safety will without delay direct the militia before mentioned to be employed in the way above suggested, and also to direct the militia of the interior counties to march either to the succour of New York or of the most exposed parts of this province as may be found necessary. There is a resolution of Congress passed a few days ago that such militia of this province as are called upon for the service of fortifying and defending New York shall receive pay agreeable to the establishment [of] the Continental troops of the Middle Departments and as these works proposed in New Jersey are with view to the same point, I make not the least [doubt] but the troops employed on them will be put on the same footing. . . . But for Gods sake do not at this critical moment suffer any delay in your directions for the m[ovement] of the militia from the interiour counties, nor [for] the employment of the others in the works of defence which may be found necessary.

—STIRLING PAPERS, New York Hist. Soc., IV, No. 85.

2. THE CHARACTER OF THE AMERICAN ARMY

Memoirs of Captain Alexander Graydon.

A considerable portion of our motley army had already assembled in New York and its vicinity. The troops were chiefly from the eastern provinces; those from the southern, with the exception of Hand's, Magaw's and our regiment, had not yet come on. The appearance of things was not much calculated to excite sanguine expectations in the mind of a sober observer. Great numbers of people were indeed to be seen, and those who are not accustomed to the sight of bodies under arms are always prone to exaggerate them. But this propensity to swell the mass had not an equal tendency to convert it into soldiery; and the irregularity, want of discipline, bad arms and defective equipment in all respects of this multitudinous assemblage gave no favourable impression of its prowess.

The materials of which the eastern battalions were composed were apparently the same as those of which I had seen so unpromising a specimen at Lake George. I speak particularly of the officers, who were in no single respect distinguishable from their men, other than in the coloured cockades, which, for this very purpose, had been prescribed in general orders; a different colour being assigned to the officers of each grade. So far from aiming at a deportment which might raise them above their privates, and thence prompt them to due respect and obedience to their commands, the object was, by humility, to preserve the existing blessing of equality: an illustrious instance of which was given by Colonel Putnam, the chief engineer of the army, and no less a personage than the nephew of the major-general of that name.

"What," says a person meeting him one day with a piece of meat in his hand, "carrying home your rations yourself, Colonel?"

"Yes," says he, "and I do it to set the officers a good example."

But if any aristocratic tendencies had been really discovered by the colonel among his countrymen, requiring this wholesome example, they must have been of recent origin, and the effects of southern contamination, since I have been credibly informed that it was no unusual thing in the army before Boston for a colonel to make drummers and fifers of his sons, thereby not only being enabled to form a very snug, economical mess, but to aid also considerably the revenue of the family chest. In short, it appeared that the sordid spirit of gain was the vital principle of this greater part of the army.

—GRAYDON, Memoirs of His Own Time, pp. 147-148.

3. "LET ALL DISTINCTIONS OF NATIONS AND PROVINCES BE LOST"

General Orders from George Washington.

Head Quarters, New York, August 1, 1776

It is with great concern, the General understands, that Jealousies &c. are arisen among the troops from the different Provinces, of reflections frequently thrown out, which can only tend to irritate each other, and injure the noble cause in which we are engaged, and which we ought to support with one hand and one heart. The General most earnestly entreats the officers, and soldiers, to consider the consequences; that they can no way assist our cruel enemies more effectually, than making division among ourselves; That the Honor and Success of the army, and the safety of our bleeding Country, depends upon harmony and good agreement with each other; That the Provinces are all United to oppose the common enemy, and all distinctions sunk in the name of an American; to make this honorable, and preserve the Liberty of our Country, ought to be our only emulation, and he will be the best Soldier, and the best Patriot, who contributes most to this glorious work, whatever his Station, or from whatever part of the Continent, he may come.

Let all distinctions of Nations, Countries, and Provinces, therefore be lost in the generous contest, who shall behave with the most Courage against the enemy, and the most kindness and good humour to each other—If there are any officers, or soldiers, so lost to virtue and a love of their Country as to continue in such practices after this order; The General assures them, and is directed by Congress to declare, to the whole Army, that such persons shall be severely punished and dismissed the service with disgrace.

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, V, 361-362.

4. HELL'S WORK AND THE PROBLEM OF WHORES

Colonel Loammi Baldwin to his wife, Mary, of Woburn, Massachusetts.

North River, New York, June 12, 1776

My Dear: This are with my warmest affections and sincere love to you, duty and regards to your honored parents, love to brothers and sisters. Hoping this will find you all in good health as they leave me. A better note of health I never enjoyed, blessed be God for it! I want much to see you but do not expect to enjoy that pleasure and Happiness unless you should come to York where, General Heath says, it is probable we shall remain during the sumer and the army have augmented to 25,000 men.

We are in dayly expectation of the enimy. Our works go on well. His Excellency returned from Congress about five days ago, but nothing very material of his business has transpired.

The army continues healthy. The inhabitants of the holy ground has brought some of the officers and a number of the soldiers into difficulty. The whores (by information) continue their imploy which is become very lucrative. Their unparalleled conduct is a sufficient antidote against any desires that a person can have that has one spark of modesty or virtue left in him and the last attum [sic] must certainly be lost before he can associate himself with these bitchfoxy jades, jills, haggis, strums, prostitutes and all these multiplied into one another and then their full character not displayed.

Perhaps you will call me censorious and exclaim too much upon bare reports when I say that I was never within the doors of nor 'changed a word with any of them except in the execution of my duty as officer of the day in going the grand round with my guard of escort, have broke up the knots of men and women fighting, pulling caps, swearing, crying "Murder" etc—hurried them off to the Provost dungeon by half dozens, there let them lay mixed till next day. Then some are punished and sum get off clear—Hell's work.

—BALDWIN PAPERS, Houghton Library, Harvard University.

II. THE EVE OF BATTLE

The arrival of British men-of-war in lower New York Bay toward the end of June put the American army on the alert. General William Howe disembarked some 10,000 men on Staten Island, a landing that was unopposed. His brother, Admiral Lord Richard Howe, followed with a strong fleet and some 150 transports on July 12. Throughout the summer reinforcements continued to reach Staten Island. Admiral Sir Peter Parker's battered fleet brought Generals Henry Clinton and Lord Cornwallis, after their defeat at Charleston, and Commodore Hotham brought Guards and Hessians on August 12. In all, the invading army numbered 32,000, about 9,000 of whom were German mercenaries.

1. THE BRITISH FLEET HAS ARRIVED—"HURRY ON THE MILITIA!"

Journal of Samuel Blachley Webb, aide-de-camp to Washington.

29 June [1776].—This morning at 9 o'clock, we discovered our signals hoisted on Staten Island, signifying the appearance of a fleet. At 2 o'clock P.M. an express arrived, informing a fleet of more than one hundred square rigged vessels had arrived and anchored in the Hook. This is the fleet which we forced to evacuate Boston, and went on to Halifax last March, where they have been waiting for reinforcements, and have now arrived here with a view of putting their cursed plans into execution. But Heaven, we hope and trust, will frustrate their cruel designs. A warm and bloody campaign is the least we may expect. May God grant us victory and success over them is our most fervent prayer. Expresses are this day gone to Connecticut, the Jerseys, etc., to hurry on the militia.

July 1st.—By express from Long Island, we are informed that the whole fleet weighed anchor and came from Sandy Hook, over under the Long Island shore, and anchored about half a mile from the shore—which leads us to think they mean a descent upon the island this night. A reinforcement of 500 men were sent over at 9 o'clock this evening to reinforce the troops on Long Island under General Green. We have also received intelligence that our cruisers on the back of Long Island have taken and carried in one of the enemy's fleet laden with intrenching tools.

New York, July 2d.—At 9 o'clock this morning the whole army was under arms at their several alarm posts, occasioned by five large men of war coursing up through the narrows. We supposed them coursing on to attack our forts. Never did I see men more chearfull; they seem to wish the enemies approach. They came up to the watering place, about five miles above the narrows, and came to. Their tenders took three or four of our small craft plying between this and the Jersey shore. Att 6 o'clock P.M. about 50 of the fleet followed and anchored with the others. Orders that the whole army lie on their arms and be at their alarm posts before the dawning of the day. A warm campaign, in all probability, will soon ensue. Relying on the justice of our cause, and putting our confidence in the Supreme Being, at the same time exerting our every nerve, we trust the design of our enemies will be frustrated.

2. BRITISH TROOPS LAND UNOPPOSED ON STATEN ISLAND

Diary of Archibald Robertson, captain-lieutenant in the Royal Engineers.

July 2nd [1776]

Weighed anchor at 10 morning and stood for the Narrows, the tide just on the turn against us and a light breeze. At 11 the tide turned and becoming allmost calm and the wind ahead the transports fell into great confusion, all dropping upon one another without steerage way which obliged us to come to an anchor. Some of the ships within 7 or 800 yards of Long Island. We observed a good many of the Rebels in motion on shore. They fired musquetry at the nearest ships without effect. About 12 the ships nearest were ordered to drop down with the tide. Lucky for us the Rebels had no cannon here or we must have suffered a good deal. The Phoenix, Greyhound and Rose men of war got about 4 or 5 miles ahead and brought too. About $\frac{1}{4}$ past one the Phoenix made the signal for preparing to land. It rained smartly, and the 1st division of transports got under way with the first of the flood tide, and about 9 we got up to the watering place on Staaten Island where the 3 men of war had hauled close inshore, the General on board the Greyhound, and the Grenadiers and Light Infantry under Earl Percy. Generals Robertson and Leslie landed immediately without opposition, the inhabitants well-coming them ashore. They lay near the landing place all night.

3. NEW YORK BOMBARDED

Diary of the Reverend Mr. Shewkirk of the Moravian Church of New York.

Friday [July] 12th [1776]

A few more ships came in through the Narrows, and it was reported that the great fleet from England began to arrive. In the afternoon about 3 o'clock there was unexpectedly a smart firing. Two men of war, with some tenders, came up. They fired from all the batteries, but did little execution. The wind and tide being in their favor, the ships sailed fast up the North River, and soon were out of sight. When they came this side of Trinity Church, they began to fire smartly. The balls and bullets went through several houses between here and Greenwich. Six men were killed, either some or all by ill-managing the cannons, though it is said that a couple were killed by the ship's firing; one man's leg was broke, etc. The six were put this evening into one grave on the Bowling Green. The smoke of the firing drew over our street like a cloud, and the air was filled with the smell of the powder.

This affair caused a great fright in the city. Women and children and some with their bundles came from the lower parts, and walked to the Bowery, which was lined with people. Mother Bosler had been brought down into their cellar. Phil. Sypher's, with their child, which was sick, came again to our house. Not long after this affair was over, the fleet below fired a salute, Admiral Howe coming in from England.

4. "THE VILLAINY AND MADNESS OF THESE DELUDED PEOPLE"

Journal of Ambrose Serle, secretary to Lord Richard Howe.

Friday, July 12th, 1776

This morning, the sun shining bright, we had a beautiful prospect of the coast of New Jersey at about 5 or 6 miles distance. The land was cleared in many places, and the woods were interspersed with houses, which being covered with white shingles appeared very plainly all along the shore. We passed Sandy Hook in the afternoon, and about 6 o'clock arrived safe off the east side of Staten Island. The country on both sides was highly picturesque and agreeable.

Nothing could exceed the joy that appeared throughout the fleet and army upon our arrival. We were saluted by all the ships of war in the harbour, by the cheers of the sailors all along the ships, and by those of the soldiers on the shore. A finer scene could not be exhibited, both of country, ships and men, all heightened by one of the brightest days that can be imagined. What added to their pleasure was that this very day about noon the Phoenix of 40 guns and the Rose of 20, with three tenders, forced their passage up the river in defiance of all their vaunted batteries, and got safe above the town, which will much intercept the provisions of the Rebels. We heard the canonade, and saw the smoke at a distance.

As soon as we came to anchor, Admiral Shulldham came on board, and soon after Genl. Howe, with several officers of their respective departments. By them we learnt the deplorable situation of His Majesty's faithful subjects; that they were hunted after and shot at in the woods and swamps, to which they had fled for these four months to avoid the savage fury of the Rebels; that many of them were forced to take up arms and join their forces; and that deserters and others flocked to the King's army continually. We also heard that the Congress had now announced the Colonies to be INDEPENDENT STATES, with several other articles of intelligence that proclaim the villainy and the madness of these deluded people. Where we anchored was in full view of New York, and of the Rebels' head quarters under Washington, who is now made their generalissimo with full powers.

5. "FAIR NYMPHS OF THIS ISLE ARE IN WONDERFUL TRIBULATION"

Francis, Lord Rawdon, to Francis, tenth Earl of Huntingdon.

Staten Island, near New York, August 5, 1776

We are just arrived here, my dearest Lord, after a very pleasant passage.

my letter from Virginia found you in is certainly the pleasantest in the world. Though I have neither a yellow damask drawing-room nor Constantia cape, I cultivate the acquaintance in a tent with Madeira, and after all there is but little difference.

The fair nymphs of this isle are in wonderful tribulation, as the fresh meat our men have got here has made them as riotous as satyrs. A girl cannot step into the bushes to pluck a rose without running the most imminent risk of being ravished, and they are so little accustomed to these vigorous methods that they don't bear them with the proper resignation, and of consequence we have most entertaining courts-martial every day.

To the southward they behaved much better in these cases, if I may judge from a woman who having been forced by seven of our men, [came] to make a complaint to me "not of their usage," she said; "No, thank God, she despised that," but of their having taken an old prayer book for which she had a particular affection.

A girl on this island made a complaint the other day to Lord Percy of her being deflowered, as she said, by some grenadiers. Lord Percy asked her how she knew them to be grenadiers, as it happened in the dark. "Oh, good God," cried she, "they could be nothing else, and if your Lordship will examine I am sure you will find it so."

All the English troops are encamped, or in cantonment, upon this island, as healthy and spirited a body of men as ever took the field. Several transports with Highlanders have been taken by the rebel privateers; the rest are all arrived, and are so enraged against the Yankees for some insults offered to their captive comrades that I think the first corps of psalm-singers who come in the way of their broad swords will be in a very awkward situation. Should my grandmother want any cherubins to adorn a new chapel, I dare say the Highlander would supply her with heads of the elect for that purpose at a cheap rate; but my grandmother will probably change sides when she hears that the Hessians sing hymns as loud as the Yankees, though it must be owned they have not the godly twang through the nose which distinguishes the faithful.

Some of the Hessians are arrived and long much to have a brush with the rebels, of whom they have a most despicable opinion. They are good troops but in point of men nothing equal to ours.

Some of the Guards are arrived, but not yet landed. Everybody seems to have formed a most favourable opinion of them. The desire they have shown to come upon service has pleased the line exceedingly and it will be their own faults if they do not keep this tide of applause in their favour.

I imagine that we shall very soon come to action, and I do not doubt but the consequence will be fatal to the rebels. An army composed as theirs is cannot bear the frown of adversity. General Carlton's successes in Canada have dispirited them exceedingly: their situation is critical, with his victorious army in their rear whilst they have such a force as ours in front. They have mustered all their troops to meet us and have entrenched themselves every where, but they will not be trifling obstacles that will stop a body of men so keen for service as ours are. I speak always with due submission to the goddess Nemesis, but I think she owes the Americans a croc-en-jambe, and when she pays it, I flatter myself she will do it effectually. Every measure, indeed, which can ensure success seems to have been taken on our side, and though I do not by any means deny the powerful influence of your deity, Fortune, upon all human affairs, I think there are certain precautions which have wonderful efficacy in deciding the event of every undertaking.

I am still with General Clinton. . . .

6. GENERAL PUTNAM CLAMPS THE CORK DOWN ON THE MADEIRA

Narrative of a Continental private, thought to be James Sullivan Martin.

The soldiers at New-York had an idea that the enemy, when they took possession of the town, would make a general seizure of all property that could be of use to them as military or commissary stores. Hence they imagined that it was no injury to supply themselves when they thought they could do so with impunity, which was the cause of my having any hand in the transaction I am going to relate. Whether the reader will attribute it to levity, necessity or roguery, I am not able to say; perhaps to one or the other of them; it may be, to all.

I was stationed in Stone-Street, near the southwest angle of the city. Directly opposite to my quarters was a wine cellar; there were in the cellar at this time several pipes of Madeira wine. By some means the soldiers had "smelt it out." Some of them had, at mid-day, taken the iron grating from a window in the back yard, and one had entered the cellar and, by means of a powder-horn divested of its bottom, had supplied himself with wine, and was helping his comrades through the window with a "delicious draught," when the owner of the wine, having discovered what they were about, very wisely, as it seemed, came into the street and opened an outer door to the cellar in open view of every passenger. The soldiers quickly filled the cellar, when he, to save his property, proposed to sell it at what he called a cheap rate—I think, a dollar a gallon. In one corner of the cellar lay a large pile of oil flasks, holding from half a gallon to a gallon each; they were empty and not very savory neither, as they had lain there till the oil which adhered to the sides and bottoms had become quite rancid. While the owner was drawing for his purchasers on one side of the cellar, behind him on the other side another set of purchasers were drawing for themselves, filling those flasks. As it appeared to have a brisk sale, especially in the latter case, I concluded I would take a flask amongst the rest, which I accordingly did, and conveyed it in safety to my room, and went back into the street to see the end.

The owner of the wine soon found out what was going forward on his premises, and began remonstrating, but he preached to the wind. Finding that he could effect nothing with them, he went to Gen. Putnam's quarters, which was not more than three or four rods off. The General immediately repaired in person to the field of action. The soldiers getting word of his approach hurried out into the street, when he, mounting himself upon the doorsteps of my quarters, began "haranguing the multitude," threatening to hang every say; but I took every word he said for gospel, and expected nothing else but to be hanged before the morrow night. I sincerely wished him hanged and out of the way, for fixing himself upon the steps of our door; but he soon ended his discourse and came down from his rostrum, and the soldiers dispersed, no doubt much edified.

I got home as soon as the General had left the coast clear, took a draught of the wine, and then flung the flask and the remainder of the wine out of my window, from the third story, into the water cistern in the back yard, where it remains to this day for aught I know. However, I might have kept it if I had not been in too much haste to free myself from being hanged by General Putnam, or by his order. I never heard any thing further about the wine or being hanged about it; he doubtless forgot it.

III. THE HOWES' FIRST ATTEMPTS AT CONCILIATION

Before coming to America the Howe brothers had been named by King George as peace commissioners acting under authority of Parliament. They were empowered to pardon and protect those Americans who returned to their allegiance, but had no authority to negotiate with any colony until all the revolutionary armies and congresses had been dissolved. Members of the opposition Whig bloc and friendly to the colonies, the Howes put out preliminary feelers to Washington. The American commander designated Colonels Henry Knox and Joseph Reed and Lieutenant Colonel Samuel Webb, an aide, to meet the officer coming into the harbor under a flag of truce, but not to accept any letter which was not properly addressed to him as commander in chief of the American forces. Were it not that the issues were so portentous, the negotiations might have been more suited to opéra bouffe. Colonel Reed, Washington's confidant, had been untiring in his efforts to bring about conciliation with the mother country.

1. "GEORGE WASHINGTON, ESQ." IS NOT AT HOME

Colonel Henry Knox to his wife Lucy.

July 15, 1776

Lord Howe yesterday sent a flag of truce up to the city. They came within about four miles of the city and were met by some of Colonel Tupper's people, who detained them until his Excellency's pleasure should be known. Accordingly, Colonel Reed and myself went down in the barge to receive the message. When we came to them, the officer, who was, I believe, captain of the Eagle man-of-war, rose up and bowed, keeping his hat off: "I have a letter, sir, from Lord Howe to Mr. Washington."

"Sir," says Colonel Reed, "we have no person in our army with that address."

"Sir," says the officer, "will you look at the address?" He took out of his pocket a letter which was thus addressed:

"George Washington, Esq., New York
"Howe."

"No, sir," says Colonel Reed, "I cannot receive that letter."

"I am very sorry," says the officer, "and so will be Lord Howe, that any error in the superscription should prevent the letter being received by General Washington."

"Why, sir," says Colonel Reed, "I must obey orders."

"Oh, yes, sir, you must obey orders, to be sure."

Then, after giving him a letter from Colonel Campbell to General Howe, and some other letters from prisoners to their friends, we stood off, having saluted and bowed to each other. After we had got a little way, the officer put about his barge and stood for us and asked by what particular title he chose to be addressed.

Colonel Reed said, "You are sensible, sir, of the rank of General Washington in our army?"

"Yes, sir, we are. I am sure my Lord Howe will lament exceedingly this affair, as the letter is quite of a civil nature, and not a military one. He laments exceedingly that he was not here a little sooner"; which we suppose to allude to the Declaration of Independence; upon which we bowed and parted in the most genteel terms imaginable.

2. WASHINGTON REFUSES TO NEGOTIATE

Colonel Henry Knox to his wife Lucy.

July 22, 1776

On Saturday I wrote you we had a capital flag of truce, no less than the adjutant-general of General Howe's army. He had an interview with General Washington at our house. The purport of his message was, in very elegant, polite strains, to endeavour to persuade General Washington to receive a letter directed to George Washington, Esq., etc., etc. In the course of his talk every other word was, "May it please your Excellency," "If your Excellency so pleases"; in short, no person could pay more respect than the said adjutant-general, whose name is Colonel Paterson, a person we do not know. He said the "etc., etc." implied everything. "It does so," said the General, "and anything." He said Lord and General Howe lamented exceedingly that any errors in the direction should interrupt that frequent intercourse between the two armies which might be necessary in the course of the service. That Lord Howe had come out with great powers. The General said he had heard that Lord Howe had come out with very great powers to pardon, but he had come to the wrong place; the Americans had not offended, therefore they needed no pardon. This confused him.

After a considerable deal of talk about the good disposition of Lord and General Howe, he asked, "Has your Excellency no particular commands with which you would please to honour me to Lord and General Howe?"

"Nothing, sir, but my particular compliments to both"—a good answer.

General Washington was very handsomely dressed and made a most elegant appearance. Colonel Paterson appeared awe-struck, as if he was before something supernatural. Indeed I don't wonder at it. He was before a very great man indeed. We had a cold collation provided, in which I lamented most exceedingly the absence of my Lucy. The General's servants did it tolerably well, though Mr. Adjutant-general disappointed us. As it grew late, he even excused himself from drinking one glass of wine. He said Lord Howe and General Howe would wait for him, as they were to dine on board the Eagle man-of-war; he took his leave and went off.

IV. THE BATTLE OF LONG ISLAND BEGINS

As the crucial hour approached, both sides seemed singularly optimistic about the outcome. The British were in a holiday mood despite their late humiliation in Boston and their more recent repulse at Charleston. Writing from his headquarters in New York to the officers and soldiers of the Pennsylvania Associators, Washington declared on August 8: "The fate of our country depends in all human probability on the exertion of a few weeks." This was a strange miscalculation by Washington, who normally took a realistic view of military matters.

There was a great storm the night of August 21. As soon as it was over the British amphibious operation pushed ahead efficiently. On the morning of August 22, Howe's forces under cover of the guns of the British ships disembarked on Long Island in the vicinity of the Narrows. In a few hours 15,000 troops were landed without opposition, and were reinforced three days later by General Philip von Heister's German division.

Opposing the 20,000 invading troops was an army of under 8,000, mostly raw militia and about half of them outside the defense works in Brooklyn. Because of his illness General Nathanael Greene turned his command over to General John Sullivan, a strenuous but vain and certainly inferior officer who was in hot water throughout the war. On the twenty-third Sullivan reported success in a minor skirmish, adding: "These things argue well for us, and I hope are so many preludes to a general victory." The next day Washington superseded him in the command by Israel Putnam, whose courage was matched by his stupidity and inexperience. In fact, Putnam never really exercised the command conferred on him. Our first chronicler, one of the best-known diarists of the period, died of dysentery six weeks after recording the entry below.

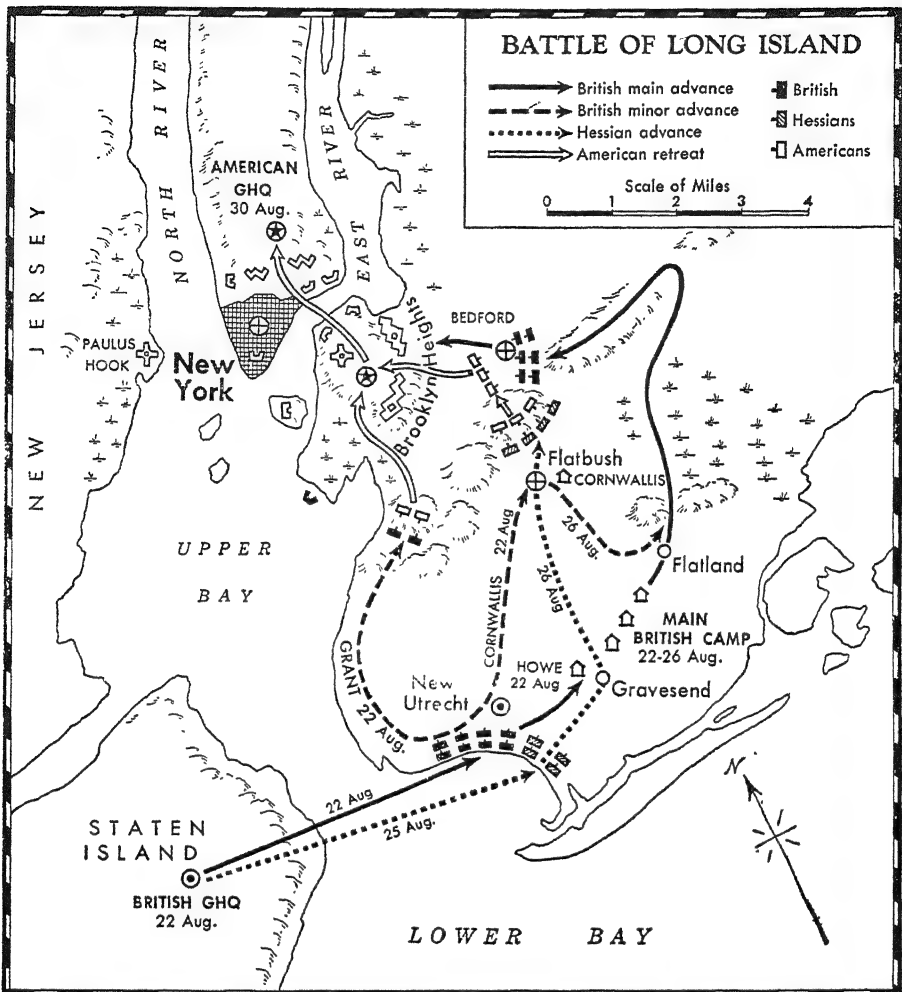

1. STORM AND ALARM AS THE BRITISH LAND

Journal of Philip Vickers Fithian, chaplain with the New Jersey militia.

August 22, 1776

We had last night a most terrible storm of wind, thunder and lightening! So violent as I have not seen since about this time in August 1773. We expect it must have damaged the shipping. It has done a little injury in the harbour tho not so much as from a most furious sudden wind, lasting an hour and a half, might be expected! These two days past many of the ships have gone out. And this morning, before seven, thirteen weighed and went out. It is said by express those which went yesterday were fitted with troupes.

Several hundred men are making a breastwork still along the river only as a defence from musquetry. It runs close by our lodging so that we shall have only to step into the trench, load, fire, etc!

Crack! Crack! An alarm from Red-Hook. Crack! Crack! Crack! The alarm repeated from Cobble-Hill. Orders are given for the drums to beat to arms. The enemy have been landing for some time down at the Narrows, and, it is said, have now ashore several thousand. The battalions of rifle-men stationed there, on the enemy's landing, left their camp and came up the island, setting on fire, all the way, the stacks of grain; this is the first degree of ravage occasioned by this unworthy and unchristian assault of our enemies that I have been witness to.

Every battalion, for the present, was ordered to repair to its proper alarm-post. Ours, however, soon had orders to enter Fort-Box. I equipt myself for an action with my gun, canteen, knapsack, blanket, and with the regiment entered the fort and waited for further orders.

Three battalions were ordered off immediately to intercept them and annoy their march.

The alarm guns were fired a little before twelve o'clock.

Before four two brigades were over from New-York, the greater number of which marched on to meet the enemy. Generals Sullivan and Green rode on to gain some intelligence of their place and numbers. Word soon came back that they are within a few miles.

Our battalion all turned out and made a formidable piquet round our little fortification, in order to retard the approach of the enemy and hinder their surrounding us, especially their horse. The men work with vigor; a sense of necessity and the security of life are strong springs to industry.

About eight in the evening the generals returned into camp, and inform that the enemy have made a halt at Flat-Bush, about four miles distance—that the several battalions advanced are in ambush and otherways arranged to annoy them—and that our battalions, after the guards are taken out, may repair to quarters til two in the morning, when all without fail are to be at their post. No officer or soldier is to take off his clothes, and all are to lye on their arms.

2. THE BRITISH DISEMBARK IN A HOLIDAY MOOD

Journal of Ambrose Serle, secretary to Lord Richard Howe.

Thursday, [August] 22d, 1776

Early this morning the English troops, the Highlanders and Preston's Light Horse, landed on Long Island. The disembarkation was effected upon the flat shore, near Gravesend, without the least resistance; the inhuman Rebels contenting themselves with burning as much of the people's corn as they could (tho' the great rains which fell last night very happily prevented much of their design), with driving off their cattle as far as their time would permit, and doing as much injury to the inhabitants, who are generally well disposed, as they possibly could. The soldiers and sailors seemed as merry as in a holiday, and regaled themselves with the fine apples, which hung every where upon the trees in a great abundance. After the landing was pretty well effected, I went with two or three gentlemen on shore to Mr. De Nuys's house, opposite the Narrows, whose family were rejoiced at the deliverance from the tyranny they had so long undergone from the Rebels. It was really diverting to see sailors and apples tumbling from the trees together.

The General pushed on to his post, and was joined by great numbers of the people. Every thing relative to the disembarkation was conducted in admirable order, and succeeded beyond our most sanguine wishes.

The island seems extremely fertile, and the country rather flat. There were some fine cattle still remaining; and proper precautions were taken to prevent our people from plundering. . . .

In a word, the disembarkation of about 15,000 troops, upon a fine beach, their forming upon the adjacent plain, a fleet of above 300 ships and vessels with their sails spread open to dry, the sun shining clear upon them, the green hills and meadows after the rain, and the calm surface of the water upon the contiguous sea and up the sound, exhibited one of the finest and most picturesque scenes that the imagination can fancy or the eye behold. Add to all this the vast importance of the business and of the motions of the day, and the mind feels itself wonderfully engaged by the variety and greatness of the objects; but finds, or should find, in the midst of all, that there is no assurance or dependence in these things, but in Him only who saveth by many or by few, and who giveth the victory when and where and how He pleaseth. In this frame a man may be disappointed of his present wish, but not of his hope or future expectation. He may err in his judgment, but he is right in his heart.

3. "LET THEM COME ON AS SOON AS THEY DARE!"

Colonel William Douglas of Connecticut to his wife.

New York, August 23, 1776

I have only time to acquaint you that I am well, as I hope this may find you. The enemy landed yesterday at Gravesend about nine miles from our lines. Our flying parties are anoying of them all the while. We have reinforced our selves and I hope will be able to make a good stand. We expect the fleet up every tide if the wind serves. Our fire ships in the North River behaved manfully, have burnt one of their tenders. The rest of the enemy left the river the first opportunity afterward. Our Connecticut Militia have come in bravely. Twelve regiments were on the Grand Parade at one time yesterday. Almost one half of this grand army now consists of Connecticut troops. The Militia are a fine set of men. I'm fully of the opinion that if the enemy attempt to carry this citty by storm it will cost them very deer. They may burn it, but they cant take it, and it is of no service to them to destroy it.

Night before last we had a most terrible thunderstorm. One capt., two lieuts. of the first battalion of York troops were killed with lightning in one place. Also two men in two different places. The wind and wether has been remarkeable in our favour for this sometime past, has brought on our troops and kept back the enemy and we begin to shew like a formadable army and I hope that the same kind Providence that has wonderfully carried us thus far will shew his power in bringing us off victorious, and take to himself the glory.

Satterday the 24th. Our men had yesterday two small brushes with the enemy on Long Island. Have repulsed them both times. As yet things look well on our side. A few days now will detirmine the work is begun. Our troops are rally in high sperits and it is a general voice, Let them come on as soon as they can, or dare! There has been a heavey clashing of arms on Long Island this morning but I have not yet heard the consequence.

—DOUGLAS, "Letters," N. Y. Hist. Soc. Quarterly Bulletin, XIII, 81.

V. SULLIVAN LEAVES THE BACK DOOR OPEN

Gravesend to attack the defender's right wing under Stirling, and Von Heister was ordered to bombard the center of the line held by Colonel Edward Hand. But the main move was a night flanking march to get around in the rear of Sullivan's left. Guided by a Tory farmer, Sir Henry Clinton moved up from Flatlands during the night of the twenty-sixth, arrived at the strategic Jamaica Pass which he found undefended, and swung down the Jamaica Road toward Bedford. The Americans were outflanked. In view of the lack of clear intelligence of the British moves during the confusing night and day that followed, it might be unfair to place all the blame on Sullivan, but his subordinate, the Pennsylvanian, Colonel Samuel Miles, was the immediate scapegoat. The debacle was followed by the customary military post-mortems.

1. GENERAL PARSONS BLAMES IT ON COLONEL MILES

Brigadier General Samuel Parsons to John Adams.

Morrisania, October 8, 1776

... To give you a clear idea of the matter [the Battle of Long Island], I must trouble you with a description of that part of the country where the enemy landed and encamped, and the intervening lands between that and our lines.

From the point of land which forms the east side of the Narrows, runs a ridge of hills about N. E. in length about 5 or 6 miles, covered with a thick wood, which terminate in a small rising land near Jamaica; through these hills are three passes only, one near the Narrows, one on the road called the Flatbush Road and one called the Bedford Road, being a cross road from Bedford to Flatbush which lies on the southerly side of these hills; these passes are through the mountains or hills, easily defensible, being very narrow and the lands high and mountainous on each side. These are the only roads which can be passed from the south side the hill to our lines, except a road leading around the easterly end of the hills to Jamaica. On each of these roads were placed a guard of 800 men, and east of them in the wood was placed Col Miles with his battalion to watch the motion of the enemy on that part, with orders to keep a party constantly reconnoitering to and across the Jamaica Road. The sentinels were so placed as to keep a constant communication between the three guards on the three roads. South of these hills lies a large plain extending from the North River easterly to Rockaway Bay perhaps 5 miles and southerly to the sound bounded on the south by the Sound and on the north by the hills. Those hills were from two or three miles and a half from our lines. The enemy landed on this plain and extended their camp from the river to Flatbush perhaps 3 or 4 miles.

On the day of the surprise I was on duty, and at the first dawn of the day the guards from the west road near the Narrows came to my quarters and informed me the enemy were advancing in great numbers by that road. I soon found it true and that the whole guard had fled without firing a gun; these (by way of retaliation I must tell you) were all New Yorkers and Pennsylvanians; I found by fair daylight the enemy were through the woods and descending the hill on the north side, on which with 20 of my fugitive guard, being all I could collect, I took post on a height in their front at about half a mile's distance—which halted their column and gave time for Lord Sterling with his forces to come up; thus much for the west road.

On the east next Jamaica Col. Miles suffered the enemy to march not less than 6 miles till they came near two miles in rear of the guards before he discovered and gave notice of their approach. This also was in the night and the guard kept by Pennsylvanians altogether—the New England and New Jersey troops being in the other two roads through which the enemy did not attempt to pass.

We were surprised—our principal barrier lost by that surprise, but as far as the cover of the night is an excuse we have it. The landing of the troops could not be prevented at the distance of 6 or 7 miles from our lines; on a plain under the cannon of the ships, just in view of the shore. Our unequal numbers would not admit attacking them on the plain when landed.

—JOHNSTON, Campaign of 1776, II, 35-36.

2. COLONEL MILES BLAMES IT ON SULLIVAN

On the landing of the British army on Long Island, I was ordered over with my rifle regiment to watch their motions. I marched near to the village of Flat Bush, where the Highlanders then lay, but they moved the next day to Gen'l Howe's camp, and their place was supplied by the Hessians. I lay here within cannon shot of the Hessian camp for four days without receiving a single order from Gen'l Sullivan, who commanded on Long Island, out of the lines. The day before the action he came to the camp, and I then told him the situation of the British army; that Gen'l Howe, with the main body, lay on my left, about a mile and a half or two miles, and I was convinced when the army moved that Gen'l Howe would fall into the Jamaica road, and I hoped there were troops there to watch them.

Notwithstanding this information, which indeed he might have obtained from his own observation, if he had attended to his duty as a general ought to have done, no steps were taken, but there was a small redoubt in front of the village which seemed to take up the whole of his attention, and where he stayed until the principal part of the British army had gotten between him and the lines, by which means he was made prisoner as well as myself. If Gen'l Sullivan had taken the requisite precaution, and given his orders agreeably to the attention of the Commander-in-Chief, there would have been few if any prisoners taken on the 27th of August, 1776.

. . . I will here state my position and conduct. I lay directly in front of the village of Flat Bush, but on the left of the road leading to New York, where the Hessians were encamped. We were so near each other that their shells they sometimes fired went many rods beyond my camp.

The main body of the enemy, under the immediate command of Gen'l Howe, lay about 2 miles to my left, and General Grant, with another body of British troops, lay about four miles on my right. There were several small bodies of Americans dispersed to my right, but not a man to my left, although the main body of the enemy lay to my left, of which I had given General Sullivan notice. This was our situation on the 26th of August.

About one o'clock at night Gen. Grant, on the right, and Gen. Howe, on my left, began their march, and by daylight Grant had got within a mile of our entrenchments, and Gen. Howe had got into the Jamaica road about two miles from our lines. The Hessians kept their position until 7 in the morning. As soon as they moved the firing began at our redoubt. I immediately marched towards where firing was, but had not proceeded more than 1 or 200 yards until I was stopped by Colonel Wylls, who told me that I could not pass on; that we were to defend a road that lead from Flatbush road to the Jamaica road. Col. Wylls being a Continental, and I a State commission, he was considered a senior officer and I was obliged to submit; but I told him I was convinced the main body of the enemy would take the Jamaica road, that there was no probability of their coming along the road he was then guarding, and if he would not let me proceed to where the firing was, I would return and endeavor to get into the Jamaica road before Gen. Howe. To this he consented, and I immediately made a retrograde march, and after marching nearly two miles, the whole distance through woods, I arrived within sight of the Jamaica road, and to my great mortification I saw the main body of the enemy in full march between me and our lines, and the baggage guard just coming into the road.

A thought struck me of attacking the baggage guard, and, if possible, to cut my way through them and proceed to Hell Gate to cross the Sound. I, however, ordered the men to remain quite still (I had then but the first battalion with me, for, the second being some distance in the rear, I directed Major Williams, who was on horseback, to return and order Lt. Col. Brodhead to push on by the left of the enemy and endeavor get into our lines that way, and happily they succeeded, but had to wade a mill dam by which a few were drowned) and I took the adjutant with me and crept as near the road as I thought prudent, to try and ascertain the number of the baggage guard, and I saw a grenadier stepping into the woods. I got a tree between him and me until he came near, and I took him prisoner and examined him. I found that there was a whole brigade with the baggage, commanded by a general officer.

I immediately returned to the battalion and called a council of the officers and laid three propositions before them: 1st, to attack the baggage guard and endeavor to cut our way through them and proceed to Hell Gate and so cross the Sound; 2nd, to lay where we were until the whole had passed us and then proceed to Hell Gate; or, 3d, to endeavor to force our way through the enemy's flank guards into our line at Brooklyn. The first was thought a dangerous and useless attempt as the enemy was so superior in force. The 2nd I thought the most eligible, for it was evident that adopting either of the other propositions we must lose a number of men without affecting the enemy materially, as we had so small a force, not more than 230 men. This was, however, objected to, under the idea that we should be blamed for not fighting at all, and perhaps charged with cowardice, which would be worse than death itself.

The 3d proposition was therefore adopted, and we immediately began our march, but had not proceeded more than half a mile until we fell in with a body of 7 or 800 light infantry, which we attacked without any hesitation, but their superiority of numbers encouraged them to march up with their bayonets, which we could not withstand, having none ourselves. I therefore ordered the troops to push on towards our lines. I remained on the ground myself until they had all passed me (the enemy were then within less than 20 yards of us), and by this means I came into the rear instead of the front of my command.

We had proceeded but a short distance before we were again engaged with a superior body of the enemy, and here we lost a number of men, but took Major Moncrieffe, their commanding officer, prisoner, but he was a Scotch prize, for Ensign Brodhead, who took him and had him in possession for some hours, was obliged to surrender himself. Finding that the enemy had possession of the ground between us and our lines, and that it was impossible to cut our way through as a body, I directed the men to make the best of their way as well as they could; some few got in safe, but there were 159 taken prisoners. I was myself entirely cut off from our lines and therefore endeavored to conceal myself, with a few men who would not leave me. I hoped to remain until night, when I intended to try to get to Hell Gate and cross the Sound; but about 3 o'clock in the afternoon was discovered by a party of Hessians and obliged to surrender. Thus ended the career of that day.

VI. STIRLING MAKES A GALLANT STAND

Fragments of Sullivan's forces broke through the enemy's lines, but a large portion were killed, wounded or taken prisoner. To occupy the Americans during the main British move on the left, General Grant attacked Stirling on the American right. There a gallant defense was put up by Smallwood's Marylands and Haslet's Delawares. Colonel John Haslet of the Delaware battalion reported how the Delaware men drew up on the side of a hill, standing more than four hours "in close array, their colours flying, the enemy's artillery playing on them all the while, not daring to advance and attack them, though six times their number and nearly surrounding them." They finally on orders retreated through a marsh and over a creek, bringing off twenty-three prisoners. In the course of the fierce attack and counterattack Grant was killed and Lord Stirling made prisoner.

1. THE ATTACK ON CORNWALLIS FAILS

Lord Stirling to George Washington.

Eagle, August 29, 1776

I have now an opportunity of informing you of what has happened to me since I had last the pleasure of seeing you. About three o'clock in the morning of the 27th, I was called up and informed by General Putnam that the enemy were advancing by the road from Flatbush to the Red Lion, and ordered me to march with the two regiments nearest at hand to meet them;

these happened to be Haslet's and Smallwood's, with which I accordingly marched, and was on the road to the Narrows just as daylight began to appear.

We proceeded to within half a mile of the Red Lion, and there met Colonel Atlee, with his regiment, who informed me that the enemy were in sight; indeed, I then saw their front between us and the Red Lion. I desired Colonel Atlee to place his regiment on the left of the road, and to wait their coming up, when I went to form the two regiments I had brought with me, along a ridge from the road up to a piece of wood on the top of the hill. This was done instantly, upon very advantageous ground. Our opponents advanced and were fired upon in the road by Atlee's, who, after two or three rounds, retreated to the wood on my left and there formed. By this time Kichline's riflemen arrived; part of them I placed along a hedge, under the front of the hill, and the rest in the front of the wood.

The troops opposed to me were two brigades of four regiments each, under the command of General Grant, who advanced their light troops to within one hundred and fifty yards of our right front and took possession of an orchard there, and some hedges that extended towards our left; this brought on an exchange of fire between those troops and our riflemen, which continued for about two hours, and then ceased by those light troops retiring to their main body.

In the mean time, Captain Carpenter brought up two field-pieces, which were placed on the side of the hill, so as to command the road and the only approach for some hundred yards. On the part of General Grant there were two field-pieces: one howitz advanced to within three hundred yards of the front of our right, and a like detachment of artillery to the front of our left, on a rising ground, at about six hundred yards' distance. One of their brigades formed in two lines opposite to our right, and the others extended in one line to top of the hills in front of our left.

In this position we stood, cannonading one another, till near eleven o'clock, when I found that General Howe, with the main body of the army, was between me and our lines, and saw that the only chance of escaping being all made prisoners was to pass the creek near the Yellow Mills; and in order to render this the more practicable, I found it absolutely necessary to attack a body of troops commanded by Lord Cornwallis, posted at the house near the Upper Mills. This I instantly did, with about half of Smallwood's, first ordering all the other troops to make the best of their way through the creek. We continued the attack a considerable time, the men having been rallied and the attack renewed five or six several times, and were on the point of driving Lord Cornwallis from his station, but large succors arriving rendered it impossible to do more than provide for safety. I endeavored to get in between that house and Fort Box, but on attempting it, I found a considerable body of troops in my front, and several in pursuit of me on the right and left, and a constant firing on me. I immediately turned the point of a hill which covered me from their fire, and I was soon out of the reach of my pursuers. I soon found it would be in vain to attempt to make my escape, and therefore went to surrender myself to General de Heister, commander-in-chief of the Hessians.

2. THE AMERICAN STAND ON STIRLING'S LEFT

August 27, 1776

... I then received orders from Lord Stirling to advance with my battalion and oppose the enemy's passing a morass or swamp at the foot of a fine rising ground, upon which they were first discovered, and thereby give time to our brigade to form upon the heights. This order I immediately obeyed, notwithstanding we must be exposed, without any kind of cover, to the great fire of the enemy's musketry and field pieces, charged with round and grape shot, and finely situated upon the eminence above mentioned, having the entire command of the ground I was ordered to occupy. My battalion, although new and never before having the opportunity of facing an enemy, sustained their fire until the brigade had formed; but finding we could not possibly prevent their crossing the swamp, I ordered my detachment to file off to the left and take post in a wood upon the left of the brigade. Here I looked upon myself advantageously situated and might be enabled, upon the advance of the enemy, to give him a warm reception. In this affair I lost but one soldier, shot with a grape shot through his throat. I had not taken post in the above mentioned wood but a few minutes when I received a reinforcement of two companies of the Delawares, under Captain Stedman, with orders from Lord Stirling to file off further to the left and prevent, if possible, a body of the enemy observed advancing to flank the brigade.

The enemy's troops by this time had passed the swamp and formed in line of battle opposite ours. A heavy fire, as well from small arms as artillery, ensued, with very little damage on our side; what the enemy sustained we could not judge. Upon filing off to the left, according to the orders I had received, I espied at the distance of about three hundred yards a hill of clear ground, which I judged to be a proper situation to oppose the troops ordered to flank us, and which I determined, if possible, to gain before them. At the foot of this hill a few of Huntington's Connecticut Regiment, that had been upon the picket, joined me. In order to gain and secure the hill, I ordered the troops to wheel to the right and march up the hill abreast. When within about forty yards of the summit, we very unexpectedly received a very heavy fire from the enemy taken post there before us, notwithstanding the forced march I made.

The enemy's situation was so very advantageous, the back of the hill where they had taken post being formed by nature into a breast-work, that, had they directed their fire properly or been marksmen, they must have cut off the greatest part of my detachment, I having, before I advanced [up] the hill, posted a part of my small number along the skirt of a wood upon my right, and left a guard at the foot of the hill to prevent my being surrounded and my retreat to the brigade in case of necessity being cut off, the enemy being vastly superior in numbers, their detachment consisting of the Twenty-Third and Forty-Fourth Regiments and part of the Seventeenth.

Upon receiving the above heavy fire, which continued very warm and they secure behind the hill, a small halt was made, and the detachment fell back a few paces. Here Capt. Stedman, with all the Delawares except the Lieutenants Stewart and Harney with about sixteen privates, left me and drew after them some of my own. The remainder, after recovering a little from this, their first shock, I ordered to advance, at the same time desiring them to preserve their fire and aim aright. They immediately, with the resolution of veteran soldiers, obeyed the order. The enemy, finding their opponents fast advancing and determined to dispute the ground with them, fled with precipitation, leaving behind them twelve killed upon the spot and a lieutenant and four privates wounded. In this engagement I lost my worthy friend and Lieutenant-Colonel (Parry) shot through the head, who fell without a groan, fighting in defence of his much injured country. In the midst of the action I ordered four soldiers to carry him as speedily as possible within the lines at Brookline. . . .

I fully expected, as did most of my officers, that the strength of the British army was advancing in this quarter to our lines. But how greatly were we deceived when intelligence was received by some scattering soldiers that the right wing and centre of the army, amongst which were the Hessians, were advancing to surround us. This we were soon convinced of by an exceeding heavy fire in our rear. No troops having been posted to oppose the march of this grand body of the enemy's army but Colonel Miles's two battalions of rifles, Colonel Willis's battalion of Connecticut, and a part of Lutz and Kiechli's battalions of the Pennsylvania Flying-Camp, I once more sent my adjutant to Lord Stirling, to acquaint him with the last success obtained by my party, and to request his further orders; but receiving no answer, the adjutant not returning, and waiting near three quarters of an hour for the enemy, they not approaching in front but those in the rear drawing near, I thought it most prudent to join the brigade, where I might be of more advantage than in my present situation. . . .

How great was my surprise I leave any one to judge when, upon coming to the ground occupied by our troops, to find it evacuated and the troops gone off without my receiving the least intelligence of the movement or order what to do, although I had so shortly before sent my adjutant to the general for that purpose. The general must have known, by my continuing in my post at the hill, I must, with all my party, inevitably fall a sacrifice to the enemy. An opportunity yet afforded, with risking the lives of some of us, of getting off. But perceiving a body of the enemy advancing, which proved to be the English Grenadiers, under Lieutenant-Colonel Monckton, to fall upon the rear of our brigade, which I could see at a distance, I ordered my party once more to advance and support a few brave fellows, endeavoring to prevent, but without success, the destruction of their countrymen. The timely assistance of a number often tried, and as often victorious, encouraged those already engaged and obliged the enemy to quit the ground they had gained and retire to a fence lined with trees. Here we kept up a close fire, until the brigade had retreated out of our sight, when, not being able, through the weakness of my party already greatly fatigued and once more destitute of ammunition, to break through the enemy, and finding my retreat after the brigade cut off, I filed off to the right, to endeavour, if possible, to escape through that quarter. . . .

After marching about half a mile to the right, I fell in with General Parsons and a small number by him collected. In consultation with the general it was determined to break through the enemy, who were here within a little way of us, and endeavour to make up the island. I then pushed off, with such of the officers and soldiers that were willing to run this hazard. What became of General Parsons I know not, never having seen him since. . . .

I imagined that if I could cross the Flatbush road, I could then make my escape by Hell-Gate, but coming to the road found it everywhere strictly guarded. After trying the road in several places, both to the right and left, and finding no passage, we retired to an eminence about sixty perches from the road, to consult whether best to conceal ourselves in the adjacent swamps or divide into small parties, when we espied a party of Hessians who had discovered and were endeavouring to surround us. The opinion we had formed of these troops determined us to run any risk rather than fall into their hands; and finding after all our struggles no prospect of escaping, we determined to throw ourselves into the mercy of a battalion of Highlanders posted upon an eminence near the Flatbush road, not far from where we had last sat. This we did about five o'clock in the afternoon to the number of twenty-three, thereby escaping the pursuit of a party of Hessians who came to the Highlanders immediately after our surrender. . . .

Thus ended this most unfortunate 27th of August, 1776, during which myself and my detachment underwent great fatigue and escaped death in a variety of instances. And I am happy to reflect that during the whole of this perilous day, one and all, to the utmost of their powers and abilities, exerted themselves in performing their several duties, for which I shall ever retain a grateful sense, and do, for and in behalf of my country, return to them my sincere acknowledgments, as I flatter myself, under God, they were the means of twice preserving the brigade from being cut to pieces: first in preventing the troops in which Grant bore a command from falling upon the left flank; and lastly, in so bravely attacking the Grenadiers, where Monckton commanded, and thereby preventing the destruction of the rear. In the first Grant fell, in the latter was Monckton wounded.

3. "GOOD GOD! WHAT BRAVE FELLOWS I MUST THIS DAY LOSE!"

Letter of an unknown Patriot soldier.

New York, September 1, 1776

Last Monday we went over to L. I., and about midnight were alarmed by some of our scouting parties, who advised us that the enemy were coming up the island with several field-pieces. Upon which near 3,000 men were ordered out, chiefly of Marylanders and Pennsylvanians, to attack them on their march. About sunrise we came up with a large body of them. The Delaware and Maryland battalions made one part. Col. Atlee, with his battalion, a little before us, had taken post in an orchard and behind a barn; and on the approach of the enemy, he gave them a very severe fire for a considerable time, till they were near surrounding him, when he retreated to the woods. The enemy then advanced to us, when Lord Stirling, who commanded, immediately drew up in a line and offered them battle in the true English taste. The British then advanced within about 300 yards of us and began a very heavy fire from their cannon and mortars: for both the balls and shells flew very fast, now and then taking off a head.

Our men stood it amazingly well, not even one showed a disposition to shrink. Our orders were not to fire till the enemy came within 50 yards of us; but when they perceived we stood their fire so coolly and resolutely, they declined coming any nearer, though treble our number.

In this situation we stood from sunrise till 12 o'clock, the enemy firing on us the chief part of the time, when the main body of British, by a route we never dreamed of, had surrounded us and driven within the lines, or scattered in the woods, all our men except the Delaware and Maryland battalions, who were standing at bay with double their number. Thus situated, we were ordered to attempt a retreat by fighting our way through the enemy, who had posted themselves and nearly filled every road and field between us and our lines. We had not retreated a quarter of a mile before we were fired on by an advanced party of the enemy and those in the rear playing their artillery on us.

Our men fought with more than Roman valor. We forced the advanced party which first attacked us to give way, through which opening we got a passage down to the side of a marsh, seldom before waded over, which we passed, and then swam a narrow river, all the while exposed to the enemy's fire. Capts. Ramsay's and Scott's companies were in front and sustained the first fire of the enemy, when hardly a man fell. The whole of the right wing of our battalion, thinking it impossible to march through the marsh, attempted to force their way through the woods, where they, almost to a man, were killed or taken.

... Most of our generals, on a high hill in the lines, viewed us with glasses as we were retreating, and saw the enemy we had to pass through, though we could not. Many thought we would surrender in a body without firing. When we began the attack, Gen. Washington wrung his hands and cried out, "Good God! what brave fellows I must this day lose!" Major Guest commanded the Maryland battalion (the col. and lt. col. being both at York). Capts. Adams and Lucas were sick. The Major, Capt. Ramsay and Lt. Plunket were foremost and within 100 yards of the enemy's muzzles when they were fired on by the enemy, who were chiefly under cover of an orchard, save a few that showed themselves and pretended to give up, clubbing their firelocks till we came within 40 yards, when they immediately presented and blazed in our faces; they entirely overshot us and killed some men away behind in the rear.

I had the satisfaction of dropping one the first fire. I was so near I could not miss. I discharged my rifle 7 times that day.

4. A COMMON SOLDIER HAS A SNUFF OF GUNPOWDER

Narrative of a Continental private.

I remained in New-York two or three months, in which time several things occurred, but so trifling that I shall not mention them. When, sometime in the latter part of August, I was ordered upon a fatigue party, we had scarcely reached the grand parade when I saw our sergeant-major directing his course up Broadway toward us in rather an unusual step for him. He soon arrived and informed us, and then the commanding officer of the party, that he had orders to take off all belonging to our regiment and march us to our quarters, as the regiment was ordered to Long-Island, the British having landed in force there. Although this was not unexpected to me, yet it gave me rather a disagreeable feeling, as I was pretty well assured I should have to snuff a little gunpowder. However I kept my cogitations to myself, went to my quarters, packed up my clothes, and got myself in readiness for the expedition as soon as possible. I then went to the top of the house where I had a full view of that part of the island; I distinctly saw the smoke of the field-artillery, but the distance and the unfavorableness of the wind prevented my hearing their report, at least but faintly.

The horrors of battle there presented themselves to my mind in all their hideousness. I must come to it now, thought I—well, I will endeavor to do my duty as well as I am able and leave the event with Providence. We were soon ordered to our regimental parade, from which, as soon as the regiment was formed, we were marched off for the ferry. At the lower end of the street were placed several casks of sea-bread, made, I believe, of canel and peas-meal, nearly hard enough for musket flints; the casks were unheaded and each man was allowed to take as many as he could as he marched by. As my good luck would have it, there was a momentary halt made; I improved the opportunity thus offered me, as every good soldier should upon all important occasions, to get as many of the biscuit as I possibly could. No one said any thing to me, and I filled my bosom, and took as many as I could hold in my hand, a dozen or more in all, and when we arrived at the ferry-stairs I stowed them away in my knapsack.

We quickly embarked on board of the boats. As each boat started, three cheers were given by those on board, which was returned by the numerous spectators who thronged the wharves; they all wished us good luck apparently; although it was, with most of them, perhaps nothing more than ceremony. We soon landed at Brooklyn, upon the island, marched up the ascent from the ferry to the plain.

We now began to meet the wounded men, another sight I was unacquainted with, some with broken legs and some with broken heads. The sight of these a little daunted me and made me think of home, but the sight and thought vanished together. We marched a short distance when we halted to refresh ourselves. Whether we had any other victuals besides the hard bread I do not remember, but I remember my gnawing at them; they were hard enough to break the teeth of a rat. One of the soldiers complaining of thirst to his officer, "Look at that man," said he, pointing to me; "he is not thirsty,

I will warrant it." I felt a little elevated to be stiled a man. While resting here, which was not more than twenty minutes or half an hour, the Americans and British were warmly engaged within sight of us.

What were the feelings of most or all the young soldiers at this time I know not, but I know what were mine; but let mine or theirs be what they might, I saw a lieutenant who appeared to have feelings not very enviable. Whether he was actuated by fear or the canteen I cannot determine now; I thought it fear at the time, for he ran round among the men of his company, snivelling and blubbering, praying each one if he had aught against him, or if he had injured any one, that they would forgive him, declaring at the same time that he, from his heart, forgave them if they had offended him, and I gave him full credit for his assertion, for had he been at the gallows with a halter about his neck, he could not have shown more fear or penitence. A fine soldier you are, I thought, a fine officer, an exemplary man for young soldiers! I would have then suffered anything short of death rather than have made such an exhibition of myself; but, as the poet says,

"Fear does things so like a witch
'Tis hard to distinguish which is which."

The officers of the new levies wore cockades of different colours to distinguish them from the standing forces, as they were called; the field officers wore red, the captains white, and the subaltern officers green. While we were resting here our lieutenant-colonel and major (our colonel not being with us) took their cockades from their hats; being asked the reason, the lieutenant-colonel replied that he was willing to risk his life in the cause of his country, but was unwilling to stand a particular mark for the enemy to fire at. He was a fine officer and a brave soldier.

We were called upon to fall in and proceed. We had not gone far, about half a mile, when I heard one in the rear ask another where his musket was. I looked around and saw one of the soldiers stemming off without his gun, having left it where we last halted; he was inspecting his side as if undetermined whether he had it or not; he then fell out of the ranks to go in search of it. One of the company, who had brought it on (wishing to see how far he would go before he missed it), gave it to him. The reader will naturally enough conclude that he was a brave soldier. Well, he was a brave fellow for all this accident, and received two severe wounds by musket balls while fearlessly fighting for his country at the battle of White Plains. So true is the proverb, "A singed cat may make a good mouser." Stranger things may happen.

We overtook a small party of the artillery here dragging a heavy twelve-pounder upon a field carriage, sinking half way to the naves in the sandy soil. They plead hard for some of us to assist them to get in their piece; our officers, however, paid no attention to their entreaties, but pressed forward towards a creek, where a large party of Americans and British were engaged. By the time we arrived, the enemy had driven our men into the creek, or rather mill-pond (the tide being up), where such as could swim got across; those that could not swim, and could not procure anything to buoy them up, sunk. The British, having several fieldpieces stationed by a brick house, were pouring the cannister and grape upon the Americans like a shower of hail. They would doubtless have done them much more damage than they did but for the twelve-pounder mentioned above; the men, having gotten it within sufficient distance to reach them, and opening a fire upon them, soon obliged them to shift their quarters.

There was in this action a regiment of Maryland troops (volunteers), all young gentlemen. When they came out of the water and mud to us, looking like water rats, it was a truly pitiful sight. Many of them were killed in the pond, and more were drowned. Some of us went into the water after the fall of the tide and took out a number of corpses and a great many arms that were sunk in the pond and creek.

5. "WE HAVE GIVEN THE REBELS A D—D CRUSH"

Extract of a letter from an officer in General Frazier's battalion.

September 3, 1776

Rejoice, my friend, that we have given the Rebels a d—d crush. We landed on Long-Island the 22d ult., without opposition. On the 27th we had a very warm action, in which the Scots regiments behaved with the greatest bravery and carried the day after an obstinate resistance on the Rebel side. But we flanked and overpowered them with numbers. The Hessians and our brave Highlanders gave no quarters; and it was a fine sight to see with what alacrity they despatched the Rebels with their bayonets after we had surrounded them so that they could not resist. Multitudes were drowned and suffocated in morasses—a proper punishment for all Rebels. Our battalion outmarched all the rest, and was always first up with the Rebel fugitives. A fellow they call Lord Stirling, one of their generals, with two others, is prisoner, and a great many of their officers, men, artillery, and stores. It was a glorious achievement, my friend, and will immortalize us and crush Rebel colonies. Our loss was nothing. We took care to tell the Hessians that the Rebels had resolved to give no quarters to them in particular, which made them fight desperately and put all to death that fell into their hands. You know all stratagems are lawful in war, especially against such vile enemies to their King and country. The island is all ours, and we shall soon take New-York, for the Rebels dare not look us in the face. I expect the affair will be over this campaign, and we shall all return covered with American laurels and have the cream of American lands allotted us for our services.

VII. THE WITHDRAWAL TO NEW YORK

After the rout of Sullivan's forces and the capture of Lord Stirling, Howe, with a caution and deliberation that were to become legendary, failed to press his advantage and assault the Brooklyn entrenchments forthwith. He waited until the next day, and thereby threw away the victory. The next day it was too late. Having placed a goodly portion of the main American army on an island where they could be completely sealed off by the British fleet, Washington became alert to the peril and during the night of August 29-30 he managed a masterly withdrawal of Putnam's entire force to New York City. The British victory on Long Island however, though sweeping was indecisive. The Americans suffered some 1,500 casualties at a cost to Howe of only 400 of his own men. But the main American army was still a fighting force.

1. THE AMERICAN FORCES MUST BE MOVED ACROSS THE EAST RIVER

John Morin Scott, Brigadier General from New York, to John Jay, member of the Congress from New York.

New York, September 6, 1776

I shall begin with our retreat from Long Island. For previous to that event the convention was so near the scene of action that they must have been acquainted with every occurrence. I was summoned to a council of war at Mr. Philip Livingston's house on Thursday, 29th ult., never having had reason to expect a proposition for a retreat till it was mentioned. Upon my arrival at the lines on the Tuesday morning before, and just after the enemy, by beating General Sullivan and Lord Stirling, had gained the Heights which in their nature appear to have been more defensible than the lines were, it was obvious to me we could not maintain them for any long time, should the enemy approach us regularly. They were unfinished in several places when I arrived there, and we were obliged hastily to finish them, and you may imagine with very little perfection, particularly across the main road, the most likely for the approach of the enemys heavy artillery.

In this place three of my battalions were placed, the centre of the line in ground so low that the rising ground immediately without it would have put it in the power of a man at 40 yards distance to fire under my horse's belly whenever he pleased. You may judge of our situation, subject to almost incessant rains, without baggage or tents and almost without victuals or drink; and in some part of the lines the men standing up to their middles in water. The enemy were evidently incircling us from water to water with intent to hem us in upon a small neck of land. In this situation they had as perfect a command of the island except the small neck on which we were posted as they now have.

Thus things stood when the retreat was suddenly proposed. I as suddenly objected to it from an aversion to giving the enemy a single inch of ground. But [I] was soon convinced by the unanswerable reasons for it. They were these: Invested by an enemy of about double our number from water to water, scant in almost every necessary of life and without covering and liable every moment to have the communication between us and the city cut off by the entrance of the frigates into the East River between (late) Governor's Island and Long Island; which General McDougall assured us from his own nautic experience was very feasible. In such a situation, we should have been reduced to the alternative of desperately attempting to cut our way [through] a vastly superior enemy with the certain loss of a valuable stock of artiller[y] and artillery stores which the government had been collecting with great pains, or by famine and fatigue been made an easy prey to the enemy. In either case the campaign would have ended in the total ruin of our army. The resolution therefore to retreat was unanimous and tho formed late in the day was executed the following night with unexpected success.

2. COLONEL TALLMADGE RECALLS THE ANXIOUS NIGHT OF AUGUST 29

Account by Benjamin Tallmadge of Connecticut.

This was the first time in my life that I had witnessed the awful scene of a battle [Long Island], when man was engaged to destroy his fellow-man. I well remember my sensations on the occasion, for they were solemn beyond description, and very hardly could I bring my mind to be willing to attempt the life of a fellow-creature. Our army having retired behind their intrenchment, which extended from Vanbrunt's Mills on the west to the East River, flanked occasionally by redoubts, the British army took their position, in full array, directly in front of our position. Our intrenchment was so weak that it is most wonderful the British general did not attempt to storm it soon after the battle in which his troops had been victorious.

Gen. Washington was so fully aware of the perilous situation of this division of his army that he immediately convened a council of war, at which the propriety of retiring to New York was decided on. After sustaining incessant fatigue and constant watchfulness for two days and nights, attended by heavy rain, exposed every moment to an attack from a vastly superior force in front, and to be cut off from the possibility of a retreat to New York by the fleet which might enter the East River, on the night of the 29th of August Gen. Washington commenced recrossing his troops from Brooklyn to New York.

To move so large a body of troops, with all their necessary appendages, across a river a full mile wide, with a rapid current, in the face of a victorious, well disciplined army nearly three times as numerous as his own, and a fleet capable of stopping the navigation so that not one boat could have passed over, seemed to present most formidable obstacles. But in face of these difficulties, the Commander-in-Chief so arranged his business that on the evening of the 29th, by 10 o'clock, the troops began to retire from the lines in such a manner that no chasm was made in the lines, but as one regiment left their station on guard, the remaining troops moved to the right and left and filled up the vacancies, while Gen. Washington took his station at the ferry and superintended the embarkation of the troops.

It was one of the most anxious, busy nights that I ever recollect, and being the third in which hardly any of us had closed our eyes in sleep, we were all greatly fatigued. As the dawn of the next day approached, those of us who remained in the trenches became very anxious for our own safety, and when the dawn appeared there were several regiments still on duty. At this time a very dense fog began to rise, and it seemed to settle in a peculiar manner over both encampments. I recollect this peculiar providential occurrence perfectly well; and so very dense was the atmosphere that I could scarcely discern a man at six yards' distance.

When the sun rose we had just received orders to leave the lines, but before we reached the ferry, the Commander-in-Chief sent one of his aids to order the regiment to repair again to their former station on the lines. Col. Chester immediately faced to the right about and returned, where we tarried until the sun had risen, but the fog remained as dense as ever. Finally, the second order arrived for the regiment to retire, and we very joyfully bid those trenches a long adieu. When we reached Brooklyn ferry, the boats had not returned from their last trip, but they very soon appeared and took the whole regiment over to New York; and I think I saw Gen. Washington on the ferry stairs when I stepped into one of the last boats that received the troops. I left my horse tied to a post at the ferry.

The troops having now all safely reached New York, and the fog continuing as thick as ever, I began to think of my favorite horse and requested leave of volunteers to go with me, and guiding the boat myself, I obtained my horse and got off some distance into the river before the enemy appeared in Brooklyn.

As soon as they reached the ferry we were saluted merrily from their musketry, and finally by their field pieces; but we returned in safety. In the history of warfare I do not recollect a more fortunate retreat. After all, the providential appearance of the fog saved a part of our army from being captured, and certainly myself, among others who formed the rear guard. Gen. Washington has never received the credit which was due to him for this wise and most fortunate measure.

3. "GOOD GOD! GENERAL MIFFLIN, I AM AFRAID YOU HAVE RUINED US"

Account by General Edward Hand.

In the evening of the 29th of August, 1776, with several other commanding officers of corps, I received orders to attend Major-General Mifflin. When assembled, General Mifflin informed us that in consequence of the determination of a board of general officers, the evacuation of Long Island, where we then were, was to be attempted that night; that the commander-in-chief had honored him with the command of the covering party, and that our corps were to be employed in that service. He then assigned us our several stations, which we were to occupy as soon as it was dark, and pointed out Brooklyn Church as an alarm-post to which the whole were to repair and unitedly oppose the enemy in case they discovered our movements and made an attack in consequence. My regiment was posted in a redoubt on the left and in the lines on the right of the great road below Brooklyn Church. Captain Henry Miller commanded in the redoubt. Part of a regiment of the flying camp of the State of New York were, in the beginning of the night, posted near me; they showed so much uneasiness at their situation that I petitioned General Mifflin to suffer them to march off, lest they might communicate the panic with which they were seized to my people. The general granted my request, and they marched off accordingly.

After that, nothing remarkable happened at my post till about two o'clock in the morning, when Alexander Scammell, since adjutant general, who that day acted as aid-de-camp to the commander-in-chief, came from the left, inquiring for General Mifflin, who happened to be with me at the time. Scammell told him that the boats were waiting, and the commander-in-chief anxious for the arrival of the troops at the ferry. General Mifflin said he thought he must be mistaken, that he did not imagine the General could mean the troops he immediately commanded. Scammell replied he was not mistaken, adding that he came from the extreme left, had ordered all the troops he had met to march; that in consequence they were then in motion, and that he would go on and give the same orders. General Mifflin then ordered me to call my advance picquets and sentinels, to collect and form my regiment, and to march as soon as possible, and quitted me.

Having marched into the great road leading to the church, I fell in with the troops returning from the left of the lines. Having arrived at the church, I halted to take up my camp equipage, which, in the course of the night, I had carried there by a small party. General Mifflin came up at the instant and asked the reason of the halt. I told him, and he seemed very much displeased, and exclaimed: "D—n your pots and kettles! I wish the devil had them! March on!"

I obeyed, but had not gone far before I perceived the front had halted, and hastening to inquire the cause, I met the commander-in-chief, who perceived me and said: "Is not that Colonel Hand?" I answered in the affirmative. His Excellency said he was surprised at me in particular; that he did not expect I would have abandoned my post. I answered that I had not abandoned it; that I had marched by order of my immediate commanding officer. He said it was impossible. I told him I hoped, if I could satisfy him I had the orders of General Mifflin, he would not think me particularly to blame. He said he undoubtedly would not.

General Mifflin just then coming up, and asking what the matter was, His Excellency said: "Good God! General Mifflin, I am afraid you have ruined us by so unseasonably withdrawing the troops from the lines."

General Mifflin replied with some warmth: "I did it by your order."

His Excellency declared it could not be.

General Mifflin swore: "By God, I did," and asked: "Did Scammell act as an aid-de-camp for the day, or did he not?"

His Excellency acknowledged he did.

"Then," said Mifflin, "I had orders through him."

The General replied it was a dreadful mistake, and informed him that matters were in much confusion at the ferry, and, unless we could resume our posts before the enemy discovered we had left them, in all probability the most disagreeable consequences would follow. We immediately returned, and had the good fortune to recover our former stations and keep them for some hours longer without the enemy perceiving what was going forward.

4. THE BRITISH LOOK ACROSS AT THE PROMISED LAND

Journal of Sir George Collier, Commander of the Rainbow.

The enemy's loss in killed and wounded, in the different skirmishes on Long Island, was about 4,000 men. Amongst the prisoners were two of their generals—one named Sullivan, who had been bred a lawyer; the other calling himself Lord Stirling. About 6,000 rebels, commanded by old Gates, fled across the water, who might all have been taken prisoners, had our troops been suffered to push on, or even if the men-of-war had proceeded to attack the batteries, as by getting into the East River they would have prevented boats from passing. Washington's army, with this reinforcement, amounted to 11,000 men; ours was at least double that number. As fresh reinforcements from Staten Island had joined the general, the men-of-war had moved gradually up as the troops advanced, and when the latter got to the margin of the East River (which was about half a mile across), the ships anchored just out of gunshot of the batteries of New York.

The having to deal with a generous, merciful, forbearing enemy, who would take no unfair advantages, must surely have been highly satisfactory to General Washington, and he was certainly very deficient in not expressing his gratitude to General Howe for his kind behaviour towards him. Far from taking the rash resolution of hastily passing over the East River after Gates and crushing at once a frightened, trembling enemy, he generously gave them time to recover from their panic, to throw up fresh works, to make new arrangements, and to recover from the torpid state the rebellion appeared in from its late shock.

For many succeeding days did our brave veterans, consisting of twenty-two thousand men, stand on the banks of the East River, like Moses on Mount Pisgah, looking at their promised land, little more than half a mile distant. The rebel's standards waved insolently in the air from many different quarters of New York. The British troops could scarcely contain their indignation at the sight and at their own inactivity; the officers were displeased and amazed, not being able to account for the strange delay. Gates fled across the river on the 29th August. The Rainbow (with Sir George Collier) went to sea from thence on another service on the 8th September, at which time the royal army still remained on the same spot inactive, and without making any motions whatever. . . .

VIII. THE FUTILE MISSION OF THE HOWES: THE NEGOTIATIONS WITH MEMBERS OF CONGRESS

In his unpublished memoirs Allen McLane, a dashing American cavalry officer, observed that "if independence had not been declared before the battle of the 27th, it is the opinion of the writer that it would not have been declared." This opinion was obviously held by Sir William Howe, who felt that the Americans after the rout on Long Island might now be ready to sit down at the table and adjust their grievances, and who, in the order of priorities, placed conciliation ahead of decisive victory on the field of battle.

Delaying precious weeks before crossing over to Manhattan in pursuit of Washington, Sir William and his brother, Lord Richard, sought out members of the rebel Congress. That their efforts were foredoomed to failure should have been apparent from Benjamin Franklin's crushing reply on July 20. Nevertheless, Congress felt that the possibility of conciliation should at least be explored. It dispatched three committeemen—Franklin, John Adams and Rutledge—to Staten Island, who, after hearing out Lord Howe, reported to Congress that the admiral's authority did not go beyond extending pardons and making recommendations to the Ministry. "We apprehended any expectation from the effects of such a power would have been too uncertain and precarious to be relied on by America, had she still continued in her state of dependence," they concluded.

1. "INJURIES HAVE EXTINGUISHED EVERY SPARK OF AFFECTION"

Benjamin Franklin to Lord Howe.

Philadelphia, 20 July, 1776

My Lord:—I received safe the letters your lordship so kindly forwarded to me, and beg you to accept my thanks.

The official despatches, to which you refer me, contain nothing more than what we had seen in the act of Parliament, viz., offers of pardon upon submission, which I am sorry to find, as it must give your lordship pain to be sent so far on so hopeless a business. Directing pardons to be offered the colonies, who are the very parties injured, expresses indeed that opinion of our ignorance, baseness, and insensibility, which your uninformed and proud nation has long been pleased to entertain of us; but it can have no other effect than that of increasing our resentment.

It is impossible we should think of submission to a government that has with the most wanton barbarity and cruelty burnt our defenceless towns in the midst of winter, excited the savages to massacre our farmers, and our slaves to murder their masters, and is even now bringing foreign mercenaries to deluge our settlements with blood. These atrocious injuries have extinguished every remaining spark of affection for that parent country we once held so dear; but, were it possible for us to forget and forgive them, it is not possible for you (I mean the British nation) to forgive the people you have so heavily injured. You can never confide again in those as fellow-subjects, and permit them to enjoy equal freedom, to whom you know you have given such just cause of lasting enmity. And this must impel you, were we again under your government, to endeavor the breaking of our spirit by the severest tyranny, and obstructing, by every means in your power, our growing strength and prosperity.

But your lordship mentions "the king's paternal solicitude for promoting the establishment of lasting peace and union with the colonies." If by peace is here meant a peace to be entered into between Britain and America, as distinct states now at war, and his Majesty has given your lordship powers to treat with us of such a peace, I may venture to say, though without authority, that I think a treaty for that purpose not yet quite impracticable, before we enter into foreign alliances. But I am persuaded you have no such powers. Your nation, though, by punishing those American governors who have created and fomented the discord, rebuilding our burnt towns, and repairing as far as possible the mischiefs done us, might yet recover a great share of our regard and the greatest part of our growing commerce, with all the advantage of that additional strength to be derived from a friendship with us; but I know too well her abounding pride and deficient wisdom, to believe she will ever take such salutary measures. Her fondness for conquest, as a warlike nation, her lust of dominion as an ambitious one, and her thirst for a gainful monopoly as a commercial one (none of them legitimate causes of war), will all join to hide from her eyes every view of her true interests, and continually goad her on in those ruinous distant expeditions, as destructive both of lives and treasure, that must prove as pernicious to her in the end as the crusades formerly were to most of the nations of Europe.

I have not the vanity, my lord, to think of intimidating by thus predicting the effects of this war; for I know it will in England have the fate of all my former predictions, not to be believed till the event shall verify it.

Long did I endeavor, with unfeigned and unwearied zeal, to preserve from breaking that fine and noble china vase, the British empire; for I knew that, being once broken, the separate parts could not retain even their share of the strength or value that existed in the whole, and that a perfect reunion of those parts could scarce ever be hoped for. Your Lordship may possibly remember the tears of joy that wet my cheek, when, at your good sister's in London, you once gave me expectations that a reconciliation might soon take place. I had the misfortune to find those expectations disappointed, and to be treated as the cause of the mischief I was laboring to prevent. My consolation under that groundless and malevolent treatment was that I retained the friendship of many wise and good men in that country, and, among the rest, some share in the regard of Lord Howe.

The well-founded esteem and, permit me to say, affection, which I shall always have for your lordship, makes it painful to me to see you engaged in conducting a war, the great ground of which, as expressed in your letter, is "the necessity of preventing the American trade from passing into foreign channels." To me it seems that neither the obtaining or retaining of any trade, how valuable soever, is an object for which men may justly spill each other's blood; that the true and sure means of extending and securing commerce is the goodness and cheapness of commodities; and that the profit of no trade can ever be equal to the expense of compelling it, and of holding it, by fleets and armies.

I consider this war against us, therefore, as both unjust and unwise; and I am persuaded that cool, dispassionate posterity will condemn to infamy those who advised it; and that even success will not save from some degree of dishonor those who voluntarily engaged to conduct it. I know your great motive in coming hither was the hope of being instrumental in a reconciliation; and I believe, when you find that impossible on any terms given you to propose, you will relinquish so odious a command, and return to a more honorable private station.

With the greatest and most sincere respect, I have the honor to be, my Lord, your Lordship's most obedient humble servant, . . .

2. LORD HOWE STATES THE CASE FOR SUBMISSION

Notes of Henry Strachey, secretary to Lord Howe, with his interpolations in parentheses.

September 11, 1776

Lord Howe received the gentlemen on the beach—Dr. Franklin introduced Mr. Adams and Mr. Rutledge—Lord Howe very politely expressed the sense he entertained of the confidence they had placed in him by thus putting themselves in his hands—

A general and immaterial conversation from the beach to the house—the Hessian guard saluted, as they passed—

A cold dinner was on the table—dined—the Hessian colonel present—immediately after dinner he retired.

Lord Howe informed them it was long since he had entertained an opinion that the differences between the two countries might be accommodated to the satisfaction of both—that he was known to be a well wisher to America—particularly to the Province of Massachusetts Bay, which had endeared itself to him by the very high honors it had bestowed upon the memory of his eldest brother—that his going out as Commissioner from the King had been early mentioned, but that afterwards for some time he had heard no more of it—that an idea had then arisen of sending several Commissioners, to which he had objected—that his wish was to go out singly and with a Civil Commission only, in which case his plan was to have gone immediately to Philadelphia—that he had even objected to his brother's being on the Commission, from the delicacy of the situation and his desire to take upon himself all the reproach that might be the consequence of it—that it was however thought necessary that the general should be joined in the Commission for reasons which he explained (having their hands upon the two services)—and that he, Lord Howe, should also have the naval command, in which he had acquiesced—that he had hoped to reach America before the army had moved, and did not doubt but if their disposition had been the same as expressed in their Petition to the King, he should have been able to have brought about an accommodation to the satisfaction of both countries—that he thought the Petition was a sufficient basis to confer upon—that it contained matter which with candour and discussion might be wrought into a plan of permanency—that the Address to the People, which accompanied the Petition to His Majesty, tended to destroy the good effects that might otherwise have been hoped for from the Petition—that he had however still flattered himself that upon the grounds of the Petition he should be able to do some good—

[Mr. Rutledge mentioned (by way of answer to Lord Howe's remark upon that point) that their Petition to the King contained all which they thought was proper to be addressed to His Majesty—that the other matters which could not come under the head of a Petition, and therefore could not with propriety be inserted, were put into the Address to the People, which was only calculated to shew them the importance of America to Great Britain—and that the Petition to the King was by all of them meant to be respectful.]

That they themselves had changed the ground since he left England by their Declaration of Independency, which, if it could not be got over, precluded him from all treaty, as they must know, and he had explicitly said so in his letter to Dr. Franklin, that he had not, nor did he expect ever to have, powers to consider the Colonies in the light of Independent States—that they must also be sensible that he could not confer with them as a Congress—that he could not acknowledge that body which was not acknowledged by the King, whose delegate he was; neither, for the same reason, could he confer with these gentlemen as a Committee of the Congress—that if they would not lay aside that distinction, it would be improper for him to proceed—that he thought it an unessential form, which might for the present lie dormant—that they must give him leave to consider them merely as gentlemen of great ability and influence in the country—and that they were now met to converse together upon the subject of differences, and to try if any outline could be drawn to put a stop to the calamities of war, and to bring forward some plan that might be satisfactory both to America and to England. He desired them to consider the delicacy of his situation—the reproach he was liable to, if he should be understood by any step of his to acknowledge or to treat with the Congress—that he hoped they would not by any implication commit him upon that point—that he was rather going beyond his powers in the present meeting—

[Dr. Franklin said, "You may depend upon our taking care of that, my Lord."]

That he thought the idea of a Congress might easily be thrown out of the question at present, for that if matters could be so settled that the King's government should be re-established, the Congress would of course cease to exist, and if they meant such accommodation, they must see how unnecessary and useless it was to stand upon that form which they knew they were to give up upon the restoration of legal government—

[Dr. Franklin said that His Lordship might consider the gentlemen present in any view he thought proper—that they were also at liberty to consider themselves in their real character—there was no necessity on this occasion to distinguish between the Congress and individuals—and that the conversation might be held as amongst friends.

The two other gentlemen assented, in very few words, to what the Doctor had said.]

Lord Howe then proceeded—that on his arrival in this country he had thought it expedient to issue a Declaration, which they had done him the honor to comment upon—that he had endeavored to couch it in such terms as would be the least exceptionable—that he had concluded they must have judged he had not expressed in it all he had to say, though enough, he thought, to bring on a discussion which might lead the way to accommodation—that their Declaration of Independency had since rendered him the more cautious of opening himself—that it was absolutely impossible for him to treat, or confer, upon that ground, or to admit the idea in the smallest degree—that he flattered himself if that were given up, there was still room for him to effect the King's purposes—that his Majesty's most earnest desire was to make his American subjects happy, to cause a reform in whatever affected the freedom of their legislation, and to concur with his Parliament in the redress of any real grievances—that his powers were, generally, to restore peace and grant pardons, to attend to complaints and representations, and to confer upon means of establishing a re-union upon terms honorable and advantageous to the colonies as well as to Great Britain—that they knew we expected aid from America—that the dispute seemed to be only concerning the mode of obtaining it—

[Doctor Franklin here said, "That we never refused, upon requisition."]

Lord Howe continued—that their money was the smallest consideration—that America could produce more solid advantages to Great Britain—that it was her commerce, her strength, her men, that we chiefly wanted—

[Here Dr. Franklin said with rather a sneering laugh, "Ay, my Lord, we have a pretty considerable manufactory of men"—alluding as it should seem to their numerous army. Marginal notation of Lord Howe: "No—to their increasing population."]

Lord Howe continued: "It is desirable to put a stop to these ruinous extremities, as well for the sake of our country as yours—when an American falls, England feels it. Is there no way of treading back this step of Independency, and opening the door to a full discussion?"

Lord Howe concluded with saying that having thus opened to them the general purport of the Commission, and the King's disposition to a permanent peace, he must stop to hear what they might chuse to observe.

Dr. Franklin said he supposed His Lordship had seen the Resolution of the Congress which had sent them hither—that the Resolution contained the whole of their Commission—that if this conversation was productive of no immediate good effect, it might be of service at a future time—that America had considered the Prohibitory Act as the answer to her Petition to the King—forces had been sent out, and towns destroyed—that they could not expect happiness now under the domination of Great Britain—that all former attachment was obliterated—that America could not return again to the domination of Great Britain, and therefore imagined that Great Britain meant to rest it upon force—the other gentlemen will deliver their sentiments—

Mr. Adams said that he had no objection to Lord Howe's considering him, on the present occasion, merely as a private gentleman, or in any character except that of a British subject—that the Resolution of the Congress to declare the Independency was not taken up upon their own authority—that they had been instructed so to do by all the Colonies—and that it was not in their power to treat otherwise than as independent States. He mentioned warmly his own determination not to depart from the idea of Independency, and spoke in the common way of the power of the Crown, which was comprehended in the ideal power of Lords and Commons.

Mr. Rutledge began by saying he had been one of the oldest Members of the Congress—that he had been one from the beginning—that he thought it was worth the consideration of Great Britain whether she would not receive greater advantages by an alliance with the Colonies as independent States than she had ever hitherto done—that she might still enjoy a great share of the commerce—that she would have their raw materials for her manufactures—that they could protect the West India Islands much more effectively and more easily than she can—that they could assist her in the Newfoundland trade—that he was glad this conversation had happened, as it would be the occasion of opening to Great Britain the consideration of the advantages she might derive from America by an alliance with her as an independent State, before anything is settled with other foreign powers—that it was impossible the people should consent to come again under the English government—he could answer for South Carolina—that government had been very oppressive—that the Crown officers had claimed privilege and confined people upon pretence of a breach of privilege—that they had at last taken the government into their own hands—that the people were now settled and happy under that government and would not (even if they, the Congress, could desire it) return to the King's government—

Lord Howe said that if such were their sentiments, he could only lament it was not in his power to bring about the accommodation he wished—that he had not authority, nor did he expect he ever should have, to treat with the Colonies as States independent of the Crown of Great Britain—and that he was sorry the gentlemen had had the trouble of coming so far, to so little purpose—that if the Colonies would not give up the system of Independency, it was impossible for him to enter into any negotiation—

Dr. Franklin observed that it would take as much time for them to refer to and get an answer from their constituents as it would the Commissioners to get fresh instructions from home, which he supposed might be done in about 3 months—

Lord Howe replied it was in vain to think of his receiving instructions to treat upon that ground—

After a little pause, Dr. Franklin suddenly said, "Well, my Lord, as America is to expect nothing but upon total unconditional submission—"

[Lord Howe interrupted the Doctor at the word submission—said that Great Britain did not require unconditional submission, that he thought what he had already said to them proved the contrary, and desired the gentlemen would not go away with such an idea—

Memorandum—Perhaps Dr. Franklin meant submission to the Crown, in opposition to their Principle of Independency.]

"—And Your Lordship has no proposition to make us, give me leave to ask whether, if we should make propositions to Great Britain (not that I know or am authorized to say we shall), you would receive and transmit them."

Lord Howe said he did not know that he could avoid receiving any papers that might be put into his hands—seemed rather doubtful about the propriety of transmitting home, but did not say that he would decline it.

3. JOHN ADAMS LEARNS THAT HE IS MARKED OUT FOR PUNISHMENT

From the Autobiography.

Monday, September 9, 1776

There were a few circumstances which appear neither in the Journals of Congress nor in my letters, which may be thought by some worth preserving. Lord Howe had sent over an officer as a hostage for our security. I said to Dr. Franklin, it would be childish in us to depend upon such a pledge, and insisted on taking him over with us and keeping our surety on the same side of the water with us. My colleagues exulted in the proposition and agreed to it instantly. We told the officer, if he held himself under our direction, he must go back with us. He bowed assent, and we all embarked in his lordship's barge. As we approached the shore, his lordship, observing us, came down to the water's edge to receive us, and, looking at the officer, he said, "Gentlemen, you make me a very high compliment, and you may depend upon it I will consider it as the most sacred of things." We walked up to the house between lines of guards of grenadiers, looking fierce as ten Furies, and making all the grimaces, and gestures, and motions of their muskets, with bayonets fixed, which, I suppose, military etiquette requires, but which we neither understood nor regarded.

The house had been the habitation of military guards and was as dirty as a stable; but his lordship had prepared a large handsome room by spreading a carpet of moss and green sprigs from bushes and shrubs in the neighborhood, till he had made it not only wholesome, but romantically elegant; and he entertained us with good claret, good bread, cold ham, tongues and mutton. . . .

Two or three circumstances which are omitted in this report and, indeed, not thought worth notice in any of my private letters, I afterwards found circulated in Europe, and oftener repeated than any other part of this whole transaction. Lord Howe was profuse in his expressions of gratitude to the state of Massachusetts for erecting a marble monument in Westminster Abbey to his elder brother, Lord Howe, who was killed in America in the last French war, saying, "he esteemed that honor to his family above all things in this world. That such was his gratitude and affection to this country, on that account, that he felt for America as for a brother, and, if America should fall, he should feel and lament it like the loss of a brother."

Dr. Franklin, with an easy air and a collected countenance, a bow, a smile and all that naïveté which sometimes appeared in his conversation and is often observed in his writings, replied, "My Lord, we will do our utmost endeavors to save your lordship that mortification."

His lordship appeared to feel this with more sensibility than I could expect; but he only returned, "I suppose you will endeavor to give us employment in Europe." To this observation, not a word, nor a look, from which he could draw any inference, escaped any of the committee.

Another circumstance, of no more importance than the former, was so much celebrated in Europe that it has often reminded me of the question of Phocion to his fellow-citizens, when something he had said in public was received by the people of Athens with clamorous applause: "Have I said any foolish thing?" When his lordship observed to us that he could not confer with us as members of Congress or public characters, but only as private persons and British subjects, Mr. John Adams answered somewhat quickly, "Your lordship may consider me in what light you please, and, indeed, I should be willing to consider myself, for a few moments, in any character which would be agreeable to your lordship, except that of a British subject."

His lordship, at these words, turned to Dr. Franklin and Mr. Rutledge and said, "Mr. Adams is a decided character," with so much gravity and solemnity that I now believe it meant more than either of my colleagues, or myself, understood at the time.

In our report to Congress, we supposed that the commissioners, Lord and General Howe, had, by their commission, power to except from pardon all that they should think proper; but I was informed in England afterwards that a number were expressly excepted, by name, from pardon, by the Privy Council, and that John Adams was one of them, and that this list of exceptions was given as an instruction to the two Howes with their commission. When I was afterwards a minister plenipotentiary at the Court of St. James, the king and the ministry were often insulted, ridiculed and reproached in the newspapers for having conducted themselves with so much folly as to be reduced to the humiliating necessity of receiving, as an ambassador, a man who stood recorded by the Privy Council as a rebel expressly excepted from pardon.

If this is true, it will account for his lordship's gloomy denunciation of me as "a decided character."

IX. AWAITING THE ATTACK

To Nicholas Cresswell, an English traveler in New York, it was inconceivable that the British could be beaten or halted by an undisciplined mob such as the American army appeared to be. Washington and his staff shared something of this pessimism. General Greene, John Jay and other Patriots urged that Washington burn New York to prevent it from serving as winter headquarters for the British or as garrison and refuge for the Loyalists who swarmed into it. Washington was unable to obtain authorization from the Congress for so drastic an act, and decided that he must pull most of his forces out of the city and off Manhattan Island.

1. GREENE URGES WASHINGTON TO BURN NEW YORK CITY

Nathanael Greene to George Washington.

Kingsbridge, New-York Island, September 5, 1776

The critical situation which the army is in, will, I hope, sufficiently apologize for my troubling your Excellency with this letter. The sentiments are dictated, I am sure, by an honest mind—a mind which feels deeply interested in the salvation of this country, and for the honour and reputation of the General under whom he serves.

The object under consideration is whether a general and speedy retreat from this island is necessary or not. To me it appears the only eligible plan to oppose the enemy successfully and secure ourselves from disgrace. I think we have no object on this side of King's Bridge. Our troops are now so scattered that one part may be cut off before the others can come to their support. In this situation, suppose the enemy should run up the North River several ships of force and a number of transports at the same time, and effect a landing between the town and middle division of the army; another party from Long-Island should land right opposite; these two parties form a line across the island, and entrench themselves. The two flanks of this line could be easily supported by the shipping; the center, fortified with the redoubts, would render it very difficult if not impossible to cut our way through.

At the time the enemy are executing this movement or manoeuvre, they will be able to make sufficient diversions, if not real lodgments, to render it impossible for the centre and upper divisions of the army to afford any assistance here. Should this event take place (and by the by, I don't think it very improbable), your Excellency will be reduced to that situation which every prudent general would wish to avoid—that is, of being obliged to fight the enemy to a disadvantage, or submit.

It has been agreed that the city of New-York would not be tenable if the enemy got possession of Long-Island and Governour's Island. They are now in possession of both these places. Notwithstanding, I think we might hold it for some time, but the annoyance must be so great as to render it an unfit place to quarter troops in. If we should hold it, we must hold it to a great disadvantage.

The city and island of New-York are no objects for us; we are not to bring them into competition with the general interests of America. Part of the army already has met with a defeat; the country is struck with a panick; any capital loss at this time may ruin the cause. 'Tis our business to study to avoid any considerable misfortune, and to take post where the enemy will be obliged to fight us, and not we them.

The sacrifice of the vast property of New-York and the suburbs I hope has no influence upon your Excellency's measures. Remember the King of France. When Charles the Fifth, Emperor of Germany, invaded his kingdom, he laid whole provinces waste, and by that policy he starved and ruined Charles' army and defeated him without fighting a battle. Two-thirds of the property of the city of New-York and the suburbs belongs to the Tories. We have no very great reason to run any considerable risk for its defence. If we attempt to hold the city and island, and should not be able finally, we shall be wasting time unnecessarily and betray a defect of judgment, if no worse misfortune attend it.

I give it as my opinion that a general and speedy retreat is absolutely necessary, and that the honour and interest of America require it. I would burn the city and suburbs, and that for the following reasons: If the enemy gets possession of the city, we never can recover the possession without a superior naval force to theirs; it will deprive the enemy of an opportunity of barracking their whole army together, which, if they could do, would be a very great security. It will deprive them of a general market; the price of things would prove a temptation to our people to supply them for the sake of grain, in direct violation of the laws of their country.

All these advantages would result from the destruction of the city, and not one benefit can arise to us from its preservation that I can conceive of. If the city once gets into the enemy's hands, it will be at their mercy either to save or destroy it, after they have made what use of it they think proper. . . .

2. "BETWEEN HAWK AND BUZZARD"

Joseph Reed, Washington's Adjutant General, to his wife.

New York, September 6, 1776

I have wrote you twice this week but whether my letters can reach you or not I dont know—I hope they do, as they will serve to keep up your spirits in our critical situation. We are still here in a posture somewhat awkward; we think (at least I do) that we cannot stay and yet we do not know how to go—so that we may be properly said to be between hawk and buzzard.

To attempt a description of all the circumstances which attend us would take more time than I can spare nor would it give you any great consolation. Our comfort is that the season is far advanced, and if a sacrifice of us can save the cause of America there will be time to collect another army before spring and the country be preserved. The councils of the Congress seem to be dark and intricate and very badly calculated to raise or continue an army from which substantial benefit can be derived.

My sensations are too acute and forebodings too strong for such a service, tho I do not find my spirits sink under difficulties but rather rise. I sometimes think my mind a very particular one. It rises when those of others fall and suffers by anticipating the apprehended evil. To use the modern phrase, I have made it up for whatever may happen and feel no other concern than what arises from reflections on you and our dear little folks. And even these I get rid of as soon as possible for it can only unfit me for duty without doing you any service. It is impossible under such circumstances not to have and feel some dependence on Providence. . . .

When I look around and see how few of the numbers who talked so largely of death and honour [are] around me, and those who are here are those from whom it could least be expected, such as the Tilghmans, etc., I am lost in wonder and surprize. Some of our Philadelphia gentlemen who came over on visits, upon the first cannon shot went off in a most violent hurry. Your noisy Sons of Liberty I find are the quietest on the field. . . . The motions of the enemy are very dark and mysterious. Such another surprize would do us much mischief.

I send enclosed a list of such officers as have sent out for their baggage and are certainly prisoners—I suppose there are others whom we shall hear of. I am glad Atlee is safe because every body allows he behaved well. An engagement or even an expectation of one gives a wonderful insight into the characters of men . . . but we are young soldiers—

3. "IF MY COUNTRYMEN ARE BEATEN BY THESE RAGAMUFFINS!"

Journal of Nicholas Cresswell.

New York, Saturday, September 7th, 1776. Left Newark. Crossed Passihack or Second River, then Hackensack River, then North River at Powler-shook Ferry. River about $1\frac{1}{2}$ miles wide. Landed in New York about nine o'clock, when one Collins, an Irish merchant, and myself rambled about the town till three in the afternoon before we could get anything for breakfast. At length we found a little Dutch tippling house and persuaded the old woman to get us something to eat. It was a stew of pork bones and cabbage so full of garlic, nothing but necessity would have compelled me to eat it; my companion would not taste another mouthful. Nothing to be got here. All the inhabitants are moved out. The town full of soldiers. Viewing the town and fortifications and contriving means to effect my escape, but despair of it, the rivers are too well guarded. . . .

Newark, New Jersey—Sunday, September 8th, 1776. Left New York early this morning. Crossed the North River to Powlershook. While we waited for the stage, viewed the Sleber fortifications here. They are made of earth, but what number of guns or what size I cannot tell. No admittance into the fort. The troops stationed here are Yankee men, the nastiest devils in creation. It would be impossible for any human creature whose organs of smelling was more delicate than that of a hog to live one day under the lee of this camp, such a complication of stinks. Saw a Yankee put a pint of molasses into about a gallon of mutton broth. The army here is numerous, but ragged, dirty, sickly and ill-disciplined. If my countrymen are beaten by these ragamuffins I shall be much surprized. Their fleet is large and it is said their army is numerous. New York must fall into their hands, their batteries on Long Island command the town. Heard a smart cannonade crossing the ferry this morning, supposed to be at Hellgate. The fleet is within 2 miles of the town. Got to Newark to dinner. Great scarcity of provisions, the roads full of soldiers. Very uneasy. Must be obliged to go into Canada or stay in this d—d country.

4. WASHINGTON EXPLAINS THE DECISION TO ABANDON NEW YORK

To the President of Congress.

New York, Head Quarters, September 8, 1776

It is now extremely obvious, from all Intelligence, from their movements and every other circumstance, that having landed their whole Army on Long-Island, (except about 4000, on Staten-Island) they mean to enclose us on the Island of New-York by taking post in our Rear, while the Shipping effectually secure the Front, and thus either by cutting off our communication with the Country, oblige us to fight them on their own Terms, or surrender at discretion, or by a brilliant Stroke endeavour to cut this Army in pieces and secure the Collection of Arms and Stores which they well know we shall not be soon able to replace.

consideration how it could be most successfully opposed. On every side there is a Choice of difficulties and every Measure on our part (however painful the reflection is from experience) to be formed with some Apprehension that all our Troops will not do their duty.

In deliberating on this Question it was impossible to forget, that History, our own experience, the advice of our ablest Friends in Europe, the fears of the Enemy, and even the Declarations of Congress demonstrate, that on our Side the War should be defensive. It has even been called a War of Posts. That we should on all occasions avoid a general Action, or put anything to the Risque, unless compelled by a necessity, into which we ought never to be drawn.

The Arguments on which such a System was founded were deemed unanswerable and experience has given her sanction. With these views, and being fully persuaded that it would be presumption to draw out our Young Troops into open ground, against their Superiors both in number and Discipline; I have never spared the Spade and Pick Axe; I confess I have not found that readiness to defend even strong Posts, at all hazards, which is necessary to derive the greatest benefit from them. The honor of making a brave defence does not seem to be a sufficient stimulus, when the success is very doubtful, and the falling into the Enemy's hands probable. But I doubt not this will be gradually attained.

We are now in a strong Post, but not an Impregnable one, nay acknowledged by every man of Judgment to be untenable, unless the Enemy will make the Attack upon Lines, when they can avoid it and their Movements indicate that they mean to do so. To draw the whole Army together in order to arrange the defence proportionate to the extent of Lines and works, would leave the Country open to an Approach, and put the fate of this Army and its Stores on the hazard of making a successful defence in the City, or the Issue of an Engagement out of it. On the other hand to abandon a City, which has been by some deemed defensible and on whose Works much Labour has been bestowed, has a tendency to dispirit the Troops and enfeeble our Cause. It has also been considered as the Key to the Northern Country. But as to this I am fully of opinion, that by Establishing of strong posts at Mount Washington on the upper part of this Island and on the Jersey side opposite to it, with the Assistance of the Obstructions already made and which may be improved in the Water, that not only the navigation of Hudson's River but an easier and better communication, may be effectually secured between the Northern and Southern States. This I believe every one acquainted with the situation of the Country will readily agree to, and will appear evident to those who have an Opportunity of recurring to good maps. These and the many other consequences, which will be involved in the determination of our next measure, have given our Minds full employ and led every one to form a Judgement as the various objects presented themselves to his view. . . .

I am sensible a retreating Army is incircled with difficulties, that the declining an Engagement subjects a General to reproach and that the common Cause may be in some measure affected by the discouragements which it throws over the minds of many; nor am I insensible of the contrary effects, if a brilliant stroke could be made with any Probability of success, especially after our loss upon Long-Island: but when the fate of America may be at stake on the Issue; when the Wisdom of cooler moments and experienced Men have decided that we should protract the War if Possible; I cannot think it safe or wise to adopt a different System, when the season for Action draws so near a close. That the Enemy mean to Winter in New-York there can be no doubt; that with such an Armament they can drive us out is equally clear. The Congress having resolved, that it should not be destroyed, nothing seems to remain but to determine the time of their taking Possession.

It is our Interest and wish to prolong it, as much as possible, provided the delay does not affect our further measures.

—FITZPATRICK, ed., Writings of Washington, VI, 27-32.

X. THE EAST RIVER CROSSING AND THE KIP'S BAY ROUT

Anticipating Washington's withdrawal from New York, Howe determined to trap the American army by another flanking move. While the fleet was to bombard the city's front and right flank, the army was to cross over from the present site of Astoria, turn Washington's left flank, cut off his communications, and force him to surrender.

On the eve of the attack, September 13, Howe issued the following order:

An attack upon the enemy being shortly intended, the soldiers are reminded of their evident superiority on the 27th August, by charging the rebels with their bayonets even in woods where they had thought themselves invincible.

The General therefore recommends to the troops an entire dependence upon their bayonets, with which they will ever command that success which their bravery so well deserves. (General Howe's Orderly Book, Lloyd W. Smith Collection.)

The crossing began on the evening of the fourteenth. Soon after, under cover of ten warships, Sir Henry Clinton embarked at the mouth of Newtown Creek and landed his men at Kip's Bay, now 34th Street and the East River. The panic-stricken militia were put to rout and the fugitives were pursued to Murray Hill. According to venerated if dubious tradition Howe lingered for nearly two hours at the residence of Mrs. Murray to enjoy her Madeira, and Putnam, at the sacrifice of baggage, stores and most of his artillery, escaped to the American defense line on Harlem Heights.

1. THE BRITISH PLAN TO SEAL OFF WASHINGTON'S FORCES

Diary of Captain Frederick Mackenzie, of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers.

September 9, 1776

Everything indicates that we shall soon attempt something decisive against the Rebels, but considering the nature of the shore at Hellgate, and rapidity of the tides and variety of eddies there, I do not suppose the landing will be made in that place. It appears probable that the erecting batteries against the enemy's works at Hellgate, and making so much demonstration there, is intended to draw their attention from some other point, for owing to the situation and construction of their principal work, it is extremely difficult to destroy it effectually.

The Rebels appeared at first to intend confining the defence of New York Island to that part of it near Kingsbridge, but as by so doing we should have had no chance of destroying or capturing any considerable number of them, it was perhaps thought proper to give them some confidence and induce them to remain and defend New York, and by so doing, give us an opportunity of cutting off a considerable part of their army, which their situation on a long narrow island, without the means of crossing either of the rivers, makes them liable to. They now therefore appear as if they intend to keep possession of New York and prevent our landing. 'Tis supposed they have not less than 4000 men between Hellgate and New York, with a considerable quantity of artillery.

It is supposed we shall land somewhere about Haerlem, and by taking a position across the island, which is narrow in that part, endeavor to cut off all that part of the rebel army between us and New York, for if some ships go up the North River at the same time it will be almost impossible for any of them to escape. The island in that part affords some very advantageous positions, which would enable us to prevent those near New York from escaping to Kingsbridge, or receiving any assistance from thence. The destruction or capture of a considerable part of the rebel army in this manner would be attended with numerous advantages, as it would impress the remainder with a dread of being surrounded and cut off in every place where they took post, would encrease their discontent, and probably be the means of breaking up the whole of their army, and reducing the Colonies to submission.

It is in our power at any time to drive them from New York and take possession of it, but if we attacked them there, they might set fire to it and once more slip out of our hands. It is of very material consequence to prevent them from burning the town, which will no doubt afford quarters to a considerable part of our army during the ensuing winter, and be made the principal depot of stores, and harbour for our shipping.

—MACKENZIE, Diary, I, 41-42.

2. "THE BRITISH WERE ALWAYS ABOUT THEIR DEVILTRY"

Narrative of a Continental private.

One evening, while lying here, we heard a heavy cannonade at the city and before dark saw four of the enemy's ships that had passed the town and were coming up the East River; they anchored just below us. These ships were the Phoenix, of forty-four guns; the Roebuck, of forty-four; the Rose, of thirty-two; and another, the name of which I have forgotten. Half of our regiment was sent off under the command of our major to man something that were called "lines," although they were nothing more than a ditch dug along on the bank of the river, with the dirt thrown out towards the water. They staid in these lines during the night, and returned to camp in the morning unmolested.

The other half of the regiment went the next night, under the command of the lieut. colonel, upon the like errand. We arrived at the lines about dark, and were ordered to leave our packs in a copse wood, under a guard, and go into the lines without them; what was the cause of this piece of wise policy I never knew; but I knew the effects of it, which was that I never saw my knapsack from that day to this; nor did any of the rest of our party, unless they came across them by accident in our retreat. We "manned the lines," and lay quite as unmolested, during the whole night, as Samson did the half of his in the city of Gaza, and upon about as foolish a business, though there was some difference in our getting away; we did not go off in so much triumph quite as he did. We had a chain of sentinels quite up the river, for four or five miles in length. At an interval of every half hour they passed the watchword to each other—"all is well." I heard the British on board their shipping answer, "We will alter your tune before to-morrow night"—and they were as good as their word for once.

It was quite a dark night, and at daybreak the first thing that "saluted our eyes" was all the four ships at anchor, with springs upon their cables, and within musket shot of us. The Phoenix lying a little quartering and her stern towards me, I could read her name as distinctly as though I had been directly under her stern. What is the meaning of all this? thought I; what is coming forward now? They appeared to be very busy on shipboard, but we lay still and showed our good breeding by not interfering with them, as they were strangers, and we knew not but they were bashful withal. As soon as it was fairly light, we saw their boats coming out of a creek or cove, on the Long-Island side of the water, filled with British soldiers. When they came to the edge of the tide, they formed their boats in line. They continued to augment their forces from the island until they appeared like a large clover field in full bloom.

And now was coming on the famous Kipp's Bay affair, which has been criticised so much by the historians of the Revolution. I was there, and will give a true statement of all that I saw during that day.

It was a Sabbath morning, the day in which the British were always employed about their deviltry, if possible; because, they said, they had the prayers of the church on that day. We lay very quiet in our ditch, waiting their motions, till the sun was an hour or two high; we heard a cannonade at the city, but our attention was drawn toward our own guests. But they being a little dilatory in their operations, I stepped into an old warehouse which stood close by me, with the door open, inviting me in, and sat down upon a stool; the floor was strewed with papers which had in some former period been used in the concerns of the house, but were then lying in "woful confusion." I was very demurely perusing these papers when all of a sudden there came such a peal of thunder from the British shipping that I thought my head would go with the sound. I made a frog's leap for the ditch, and lay as still as I possibly could, and began to consider which part of my carcass was to go first.

The British played their parts well; indeed, they had nothing to hinder them. We kept the lines till they were almost levelled upon us, when our officers, seeing we could make no resistance, and no orders coming from any superior officer, and that we must soon be entirely exposed to the rake of their guns, gave the order to leave the lines. In retreating, we had to cross a level clear spot of ground, forty or fifty rods wide, exposed to the whole of the enemy's fire; and they gave it to us in prime order; the grape shot and lan-grage flew merrily, which served to quicken our motions.

When I had gotten a little out of the reach of their combustibles, I found myself in company with one who was a neighbour of mine when at home, and one other man belonging to our regiment; where the rest of them were I knew not. We went into a house by the highway, in which were two women and some small children, all crying most bitterly; we asked the women if they had any spirits in the house; they placed a case bottle of rum upon the table and bid us help ourselves. We each of us drank a glass and, bidding them good bye, betook ourselves to the highway again. . . .

3. MISTRESS MURRAY'S MADEIRA SAVES PUTNAM'S ARMY

Journal of James Thacher, surgeon with the Continental army.

September 20, 1776

When retreating from New York, Major General Putnam, at the head of three thousand five hundred Continental troops, was in the rear and the last that left the city. In order to avoid any of the enemy that might be advancing in the direct road to the city, he made choice of a road parallel with and contiguous to the North River, till he could arrive at a certain angle, whence another road would conduct him in such a direction as that he might form a junction with our army. It so happened that a body of eight thousand British and Hessians were at the same moment advancing on the road, which would have brought them in immediate contact with General Putnam, before he could have reached the turn into the other road.

Most fortunately, the British generals, seeing no prospect of engaging our troops, halted their own, and repaired to the house of Mr. Robert Murray, a Quaker and a friend of our cause; Mrs. Murray treated them with cake and wine, and they were induced to tarry two hours or more, Governor Tryon frequently joking her about her American friends. By this happy incident General Putnam, by continuing his march, escaped a rencounter with a greatly superior force, which must have proved fatal to his whole party. One half-hour, it is said, would have been sufficient for the enemy to have secured the road at the turn, and entirely cut off General Putnam's retreat. It has since become almost a common saying among our officers that Mrs. Murray saved this part of the American army.

4. "THE DASTARDLY BEHAVIOUR OF THE REBELS SINKS BELOW REMARK"

Journal of Ambrose Serle, secretary to Lord Howe.

Sunday, 15th. Sept.

This morning about 7 o'clock, the Renown of 50 guns, Capt. Banks, the Repulse of 32 guns, Capt. Davis, and the Pearl of 32 guns, Capt. Wilkinson, with the schooner, Lieut. Brown, sailed up the North River. The morning was fine the tide flowed, and there was a fresh breeze. The Rebels began their canonade as furiously as they could, but apparently with very little effect, as their guns were but poorly served. The ships, as these were the grand batteries of the enemy, returned a heavy fire and struck the walls of the batteries and the sods of earth which the Rebels had raised, very frequently. What other damage our people did them, we as yet know not; but 'tis observed that, except for beating down particular structures, or clearing the way for other operations, cannon have but a very small or precarious effect. The great business is always accomplished by the minor implements of war.

About a quarter before 9, the ships came to an anchor in the North River, in view of the fleet, at about 4 or 5 miles distance above it, and beyond the principal works of the enemy.

A transport, during the affair upon the North River, went up the East River and joined the other ships, almost without molestation.

The whole scene was awful and grand; I might say beautiful, but for the melancholy seriousness which must attend every circumstance where the lives of men, even the basest malefactors, are at stake. The hills, the woods, the river, the town, the ships and pillars of smoke, all heightened by a most clear and delightful morning, furnished the finest landscape that either art and nature combined could draw, or the imagination conceive.

After this affair had subsided for a little while, a most tremendous discharge of cannon from the ships began (as was concerted) in the East River, in order to cover the landing of the troops upon New York Island. So terrible and so incessant a roar of guns few even in the army and navy had ever heard before. Above 70 large pieces of cannon were in play, together with swivels and small arms from the ships, while the batteries added to the uproar upon the land.

The Rebels were apparently frightened away by the horrid din, and deserted the town and all their works in the utmost precipitation. The King's forces took possession of the place, incredible as it may seem, without the loss of a man. Nothing could equal the expressions of joy shewn by the inhabitants upon the arrival of the King's officers among them. They even carried some of them upon their shoulders about the streets, and behaved in all respects, women as well as men, like overjoyed bedlamites. One thing is worth remarking: a woman pulled down the Rebel standard upon the fort, and a woman hoisted up in its stead His Majesty's flag, after trampling the other under foot with the most contemptuous indignation. I first espied both circumstances from the ship, and could not help paying the first congratulations to Lord H. upon the occasion.

The spirit and activity of the troops and seamen were unequalled: Every man pressed to be foremost, consistent with order, and to court distinction. The dastardly behaviour of the Rebels, on the other hand, sinks below remark. The ground where our people landed was far from being advantageous; the tide rapid; the current unequal; the shore shallow; and themselves obliged to march up on ground where these poltroons had been at work to entrench themselves for several months. Providentially, the wind coming in with a fine breeze from the S. W. which it had not done before since we have been here, and which was the most favorable circumstance our people could have desired, enabled the boats to carry over the forces almost in a direct line, and return in like manner for the second division, notwithstanding the rapidity of the current. Thus this town and its environs, which these blustering gentlemen had taken such wonderful pains to fortify, were given up in two or three hours without any defence or the least appearance of a manly resistance.

In the evening the Admiral ordered up the Mercury of 24, and the Fowey of 20 guns, to lie close to the town, to prevent the transport boats from going on shore and plundering, which many of them appeared very ready to do.

5. A YANKEE CHAPLAIN DEFENDS THE AMERICAN TROOPS AT KIP'S BAY

Journal of Benjamin Trumbull, chaplain with the First Connecticut Regiment.

September, 1776

A little after day light on Sunday morning September 15 two ships of the line and three frigates drew up near the shore within musket shot of the lines and entrenchments and came to anchor there in a proper situation to fire most furiously upon our lines. In this situation they lay entirely quiet till about 10 o'clock. During this time boats were passing from the island to the ships and men put on board, and about 100 boats full of men came out of New Town Creek and made towards the shore.

When things were thus prepared, the ships about 10 o'clock, after firing a signal gun, began from the mouths of near an 100 canon a most furious canonade on the lines, which soon levelled them almost with the ground in some places, and buried our men who were in the lines almost under sand and sods of earth, and made such a dust and smoke that there was no possibility of firing on the enemy to any advantage, and then not without the utmost hazzard. While the canon poured in such a tremendous fire on the lines the ships from their round tops kept up a smart fire with swivels loaded with grape shot which they were able to fire almost into the entrenchments, they were so near.

The boats all this time kept out of the reach of the musquetry and finally, turning off to the left a little north of the lines in the smoke of the ships, made good their landing without receiving any anoyance from our troops. They soon marched up to the main road and formed across it and on the hills above our troops in order to cut off their retreat.

The Continental troops now left the lines, and there being no general orders given how to form them that they might support each other in a general attack, or any disposition made for it, they attempted an escape round the enemy in the best manner they could, and generally made their escape.

Colonels Selden, Hart and Thompson were taken with Major Porter and Brigadier Major Wyllys, and an 150 or 200 men were either killed or taken. Some canon, tents, flower and a great deal of baggage fell into the enemies hands. This on the whole was an unfortunate day to the American States. The loss was owing principally to a want of wagons and horses to remove the guns and baggage, and to the situation of the troops left behind, and the neglect in the officers in not forming some proper plan of defence.

The army was principally called off to the northward and had been in a state of retreat from the city for some days. All the field pieces had been removed out of the town and most of the artillery companies. And though few canon had been left in the forts to keep up the farce of defence and opposition, yet there was not one that could annoy the shipping or be brought on to the assistance of the infantry. They could [not] see nor expect any assistance from the troops above as they were all retreating. Officers and men had expected that their retreat would be cut off unless they could fight their way through them, which they thought very dangerous and precarious. In such a situation it was not reasonable to expect that they would make any vigorous stand.

The men were blamed for retreating and even flying in these circumstances, but I imagine the fault was principally in the general officers in not disposing of things so as to give the men a rational prospect of defence and a safe retreat should they engage the enemy. And it is probable many lives were saved, and much [loss] to the army prevented, in their coming off as they did, tho' it was not honourable. It is admirable that so few men are lost.

6. "GOOD GOD, HAVE I GOT SUCH TROOPS AS THOSE!"

September 20, 1776

Since my last we have evacuated New York, a step that was found absolutely necessary for the preservation of the army, as we held it on very precarious terms, and might have been attended with the worst of consequences at this time, the General not having an army that he could depend upon, and so circumstanced from the situation of the place that a safe retreat could not be made had the enemy have landed above us, which was easy to effect.

We should have got of[f] all the stores and troops on Sunday night, but believe the enemy suspected a thing of the sort, and early on Sunday morning sent several frigates up the East and North Rivers, and landed two considerable armies near the same time on the shores of each. General Putnam commanded in York, and had time to bring the troops out whilst our batteries amused the shipping. Two brigades of northern troops were to oppose their landing, and engage them. They run of[f] without firing a gun, tho' General Washington was himself present, and all he, his aide de camps and other general officers could do, they were not to be rallied till they had got some miles.

The General was so exasperated that he struck several officers in their flight, three times dashed his hatt on the ground, and at last exclaimed, "Good God, have I got such troops as those!" It was with difficulty his friends could get him to quit the field, so great was his emotions. He however got of[f] safe, and all the troops as you may think. Nothing was left in York but about 700 barrels of flower and some old corne of little consequence. . . .

XI. THE BRITISH REPULSE AT HARLEM HEIGHTS

After the rout at Kip's Bay, Washington consolidated his lines behind fortified Harlem Heights. His defense in depth comprised a triple line of entrenchments extending across Manhattan. Observing the enemy's light troops incautiously advancing to the high ground opposite the American camp just north of Manhattanville, Washington ordered Colonel Thomas Knowlton, a hero of Bunker's Hill, and Major Andrew Leitch to get in their rear, while the British would be diverted by a feigned direct attack. A perfect plan partially miscarried when the firing on the front started before Knowlton and Leitch could get completely around the enemy's flank. The British were driven back from a wood to a buckwheat field, present site of Barnard College at 116th Street and Broadway, and thence retreated to what is now 110th Street. Washington declined to follow up the victory when he learned that Cornwallis had come up with reinforcements. But for the first time in the New York campaign the British had retreated, and, as George Clinton, shortly to become governor of New York, who participated in the engagement observed, they were "mortified." "If I only had a pair of pistols," he wrote a friend, "I am sure I would at least have shot a puppy of an officer I found slinking off in the heat of the action."

I. THE ENGLISH FOX HUNTERS SOUND THEIR BUGLES

Adjutant General Joseph Reed to his wife.

Heights near Kingsbridge, September 17, 1776

Just after I had sealed my letter and sent it away, an account came that the enemy were advancing upon us in three large columns. We have so many false reports that I desired the General to permit me to go and discover what truth there was in the account. I accordingly went down to our most advanced guard and while I was talking with the officer, the enemy's advanced guard fired upon us at a small distance. Our men behaved well, stood and returned the fire till, overpowered by numbers, they were obliged to retreat. The enemy advanced upon us very fast. I had not quitted a house 5 minutes before they were in possession of it.

Finding how things were going I went over to the General to get some support for the brave fellows who had behaved so well. By the time I got to him the enemy appeared in open view and in the most insulting manner sounded their bugle horns as is usual after a fox chase. I never felt such a sensation before; it seemed to crown our disgrace.

The General was prevailed on to order over a party to attack them, and as I had been upon the ground which no one else had, it fell to me to conduct them. An unhappy movement was made by a regiment of ours which had been ordered to amuse them while those I was with expected to take them in the rear. But being diverted by this the Virginia regiment, with which I was, went another course; finding there was no stopping them, I went with them the new way—and in a few minutes our brave fellows mounted up the rocks and attacked them; then they ran in turn. Each party sent in more succours so that at last it became a very considerable engagement and men fell on every side.

However, our troops still pressed on, drove the enemy above a mile and a half till the General ordered them to give over the pursuit, fearing the whole of the enemy's army would advance upon them; they retreated in very good order and I assure you it has given another face of things in our army. The men have recovered their spirits and feel a confidence which before they had quite lost. We have several prisoners and have buried a considerable number of their dead. Our own loss is also considerable. The Virginia major (Leech) who went up first with me was wounded with 3 shott in less than 3 minutes. But our greatest loss was a brave officer from Connecticut whose name and spirit ought to be immortalized, one Col Knowlton. I assisted him off and when gasping in the agonies of death all his inquiry was if we had drove the enemy.

Be not alarmed, my dear creature, when I tell you the horse I rode received a shot just behind his fore shoulder. It happened to be [one] taken from a number on the hill. Tho' [many fell] round me, thank God I was not struck [by] a single ball, and I have the great happiness [to know] that I have by getting the General to [direct a] reinforcement to go over contributed in [some way] to the benefit which may result from this [action]. When I speak of its importance I do not mean that I think the enemy have suffered a loss which will affect their operations—but it has given spirits to our men that I hope they will now look the enemy in the face with confidence. But alas our situation here must soon be a very distressing one if we do not receive much relief in the articles of stores, provision, forage, etc. The demands of a large army are very great and we are in a very doubtful condition on this head.

2. "THE VIRGINIA AND MARYLAND TROOPS BEAR THE PALM"

Lieutenant Colonel Tench Tilghman to his father.

Headquarters at Col. Morris's House, September 19, 1776

I wrote you a few lines since we removed to this place. On Monday last we had a pretty smart skirmish with the British troops which was brought on in the following manner. The General rode down to our farthest lines, and when he came near them heard a firing which he was informed was between our scouts and the out guards of the enemy. When our men came in they informed the General that there were a party of about 300 behind a woody hill, tho' they only showed a very small party to us. Upon this the General laid a plan for attacking them in the rear and cutting off their retreat, which was to be effected in the following manner.

Major Leitch, with three companies of Colonel Weedon's Virginia regiment, and Colonel Knowlton, with his Rangers, were to steal round while a party were to march towards them and seem as if they intended to attack in front, but not to make any real attack till they saw our men fairly in their rear.

The bait took as to one part; as soon as they saw our party in front the enemy ran down the hill and took possession of some fences and bushes and began to fire at them, but at too great a distance to do much execution. Unluckily Colonel Knowlton and Major Leitch began their attack too soon; it was rather in flank than in rear. The action now grew warm. Major Leitch was wounded early in the engagement and Colonel Knowlton soon after, the latter mortally; he was one of the bravest and best officers in the army. Their men notwithstanding persisted with the greatest bravery.

The General finding they wanted support ordered over part of Colonel Griffiths's and part of Colonel Richardson's Maryland regiments; these troops tho' young charged with as much bravery as I can conceive; they gave two fires and then rushed right forward which drove the enemy from the wood into a buckwheat field, from whence they retreated. The General, fearing (as we afterwards found) that a large body was coming up to support them, sent me over to bring our men off. They gave a hurra and left the field in good order.

We had about 40 wounded and very few killed. A serjeant who deserted says their accounts were 89 wounded and 8 killed, but in the latter he is mistaken for we have buried more than double that number. We find their force was much more considerable than we imagined when the General ordered the attack. It consisted of the 2d Battalion of Light Infantry, a battalion of the Royal Highlanders and 3 companies of Hessian rifle men.

The prisoners we took told us they expected our men would have run away as they did the day before, but that they were never more surprised than to see us advancing to attack them. The Virginia and Maryland troops bear the palm. They are well officered and behave with as much regularity as possible, while the Eastern people are plundering everything that comes in their way. An ensign is to be tried for marauding to-day; the General will execute him if he can get a court martial to convict him.

I like our post here exceedingly; I think if we give it up it is our own faults.

—TILGHMAN, Memoir, pp. 138-139.

3. "UPON THE WHOLE THEY GOT CURSEDLY THRASHED"

General George Weedon to John Page, President of the Virginia Council.
Head Quarters at Morris's Heights 10 miles above York,
September 20th, 1776

... The enemy, elated at this piece of success, formed next morning and advanced in three columns. A disposition was made at this place to check them, in which your 3d Virginia Regiment made part. I was ordered to defend a pass at a valley that divides those heights from New York and the country below. The brave Major Leitch was detached with 3 rifle companies commanded by Captains Thornton, West and Ashby to flank the enemy that were then making for it. I soon got engaged, as did the major and his party. How we behaved it does not become me to say. Let it suffice to tell you that we had the General's thanks in public orders for our conduct. We were reinforced by some Maryland troops and others who behaved well. The poor major received three balls through his body before he quitted the field, and so lucky are their direction that I am in hopes he will do well. At present he is in a fair way.

I lost with his party and my own three killed and 12 wounded. The other cores that joined us lost in proportion. The enemies loss was at first supposed to be 97, but a deserter that came in today makes them to have lost between 2 and 3 hundred. This is partly confirmed by an old countryman to whose barn they carried their wounded. He declares they had at one time 97 wounded that was brought in, and that night sent it to their main army in waggons, several of which the deserter says is since dead. Upon the whole they got cursedly thrashed and have since declaired they did not think the Virginians had got up.

We are now very near neighbours, and view each other every hour in the day. The two armies lay within two miles of each other and a general action is every hour expected. I am more easy in my mind since we have got elbow room, and had the army first thrown up lines here it would have saved vast labour and expence. Indeed, I could wish we were three miles further back yet, as it's not our business to run any risque of being surrounded, an advantage that this country affords the enemy by the number of navigable rivers and creeks that make into it, and in many places do not leave the land more than a mile or two [wide]. . . .

XII. NEW YORK IN FLAMES: THE GREAT FIRE OF SEPTEMBER 20

A goodly portion of what Washington was helpless to defend went up in flames and smoke in the night of September 20, 1776. The fire broke out in a wooden house on a wharf near Whitehall Slip and was spread rapidly by a stiff breeze from the south. The American troops had carted away all the church bells for conversion into cannon, so that alarms could not be quickly sounded. Fire companies were undermanned and disorganized and engines and pumps out of order. A shift of wind about 2 A.M. of the twenty-first confined the fire to an area between Broadway and the North River, but the destruction of 493 houses was a major disaster for the British, who were now confronted with the problem of finding quarters for the army and housing for returning Tories.

The British command, which had hoped to seize New York intact for its headquarters, was infuriated. The Tory New York Mercury called the fire an "atrocious deed, which in guilt and villainy is not inferior to the Gunpowder Plot." Ambrose Serle, Howe's secretary, charged that "the New England people" were "at the bottom of this plot," and Howe himself asserted that the "wretches . . . succeeded too well." If there was sabotage, it was unauthorized by the American commander, but, as Washington put it, "Providence, or some good honest fellow, has done more for us than we were disposed to do for ourselves."

1. A BRITISH OFFICER SEES THE FIRE AS "DESIGNEDLY SET"

Diary of Captain Frederick Mackenzie.

20th Sept—A little after 12 o'clock last night a most dreadful fire broke out in New York, in three different places in the south and windward part of the town. The alarm was soon given, but unfortunately there was a brisk wind at south, which spread the flames with such irresistible rapidity that, notwithstanding every assistance was given which the present circumstances admitted, it was impossible to check its progress till about 11 this day, when by preventing it from crossing the Broad-way at the north part of the town, it was stopped from spreading any further that way, and about 12 it was so far got under that there was no danger of its extending beyond those houses which were then on fire. It broke out first near the Exchange, and burnt all the houses on the west side of Broad Street, almost as far as the City Hall, and from thence all those in Beaver Street, and almost every house on the west side of the town between the Broad way and the North River, as far as the College, amounting in the whole to about 600 houses, besides several churches, particularly Trinity Church, the principal one in town.

On its first appearance two regiments of the 5th Brigade went into town, and some time after, a great number of seamen from the fleet were sent on shore under proper officers by order of Lord Howe, to give assistance. About daybreak the Brigade of Guards came in from camp, but from the absence of the regular firemen, the bad state of the engines, a want of buckets, and a scarcity of water, the efforts of the troops and seamen, tho' very great, could not prevent the fire from spreading in the manner it did. The first notice I had of it was from the sentry at Genl Smith's quarters at Mr Elliott's house, who called me up about 10 clock and said New York was on fire; on going to the window I observed an immense column of fire and smoke, and went and called Genl Smith, who said he would follow me into town as soon as possible. I dressed myself immediately and ran into town, a distance of two miles, but when I got there the fire had got to such a head there seemed to be no hopes of stopping it, and those who were present did little more than look on and lament the misfortune. As soon as buckets and water could be got, the seamen and the troops, assisted by some of the inhabitants, did what they could to arrest its progress, but the fresh wind and the combustible nature of the materials of which almost all the houses were built, rendered all their efforts vain.

From a variety of circumstances which occurred it is beyond a doubt that the town was designedly set on fire, either by some of those fellows who concealed themselves in it since the 15th instant, or by some villains left behind for the purpose. Some of them were caught by the soldiers in the very act of setting fire to the inside of empty houses at a distance from the fire; many were detected with matches and combustibles under their clothes, and combustibles were found in several houses. One villain who abused and cut a woman who was employed in bringing water to the engines, and who was found cutting the handles of the fire buckets, was hung up by the heels on the spot by the seamen. One or two others who were found in houses with fire brands in their hands were put to death by the enraged soldiery and thrown into the flames. There is no doubt however that the flames were communicated to several houses by means of the burning flakes of the shingles, which, being light, were carried by the wind to some distance and falling on the roofs of houses covered with shingles (which is most generally the case at New York) and whose inhabitants were either absent or inattentive, kindled the fire anew. The Trinity Church, a very handsome, ancient building, was perceived to be on fire long before the fire reached the adjacent houses, and as it stood at some distance from any house, little doubt remained that it was set on fire wilfully.

During the time the Rebels were in possession of the town, many of them were heard to say they would burn it, sooner than it should become a nest for Tories—and several inhabitants who were most violently attached to the Rebel cause have been heard to declare they would set fire to their own houses sooner than they should be occupied by the King's troops.

No assistance could be sent from the army till after daybreak, as the general was apprehensive the Rebels had some design of attacking the army.

It is almost impossible to conceive a scene of more horror and distress than the above. The sick, the aged, women, and children half naked were seen going they knew not where, and taking refuge in houses which were at a distance from the fire, but from whence they were in several instances driven a second and even a third time by the devouring element, and at last in a state of despair laying themselves down on the Common. The terror was increased by the horrid noise of the burning and falling houses, the pulling down of such wooden buildings as served to conduct the fire (in which the soldiers and seamen were particularly active and useful), the rattling of above 100 waggons, sent in from the army and which were constantly employed in conveying to the Common such goods and effects as could be saved. The confused voices of so many men, the shrieks and cries of the women and children, the seeing the fire break out unexpectedly in places at a distance, which manifested a design of totally destroying the city, with numberless other circumstances of private misery and distress, made this one of the most tremendous and affecting scenes I ever beheld.

The appearance of the Trinity Church, when completely in flames, was a very grand sight, for the spire being entirely framed of wood and covered with shingles, a lofty pyramid of fire appeared, and as soon as the shingles were burnt away the frame appeared with every separate piece of timber burning, until the principal timbers were burnt through, when the whole fell with a great noise.

—MACKENZIE, Diary, I, 58-61.

2. "SOME WICKED INCENDIARIES HAD A HAND IN THIS"

Diary of the Reverend Mr. Shewkirk.

Saturday [Sept.] 21st.—In the first hour of the day, soon after midnight, the whole city was alarmed by a dreadful fire. Br. Shewkirk, who was alone in the chapel-house, was not a little struck when he saw the whole air red and thought it to be very near; but going into the street, he found that it was in the low west end of the town, and went thither. When he came down the Broad Way, he met with Sister Sykes and her children. She was almost spent carrying the child, and a large bundle besides. He took the bundle and went back with them, and let them in to our house; when he left them and returned with their prentice to the fire, taking some buckets along. The fire was then in the lower part of Broad Street, Stone Street, etc. It spread so violently that all what was done was but of little effect; if one was in one street and looked about, it broke out already again in another street above; and thus it raged all the night and till about noon. The wind was pretty high from south-east and drove the flames to the northwest.

It broke out about White Hall; destroyed a part of Broad Street, Stone Street, Beaver Street, the Broadway, and then the streets going to the North River, and all along the North River as far as the King's College. Great pains was taken to save Trinity Church, the oldest and largest of the English churches, but in vain; it was destroyed, as also the old Lutheran church; and St. Paul's, at the upper end of the Broadway, escaped very narrowly.

Some of our families brought off their goods to our house. Bro. Shewkirk had the pleasure to be a comfort to our neighbors, who were much frightened the fire might come this way; and indeed, if the wind had shifted to the west as it had the appearance a couple of times, the whole city might have been destroyed. The corner house of our street, going to the Broadway, caught already; Bro. Shewkirk ordered our long ladder, and the others to be fetched out of our burying ground; which were of service in carrying the water up to the roof of said house in buckets; and by the industry of all the people the fire was put out. Several of our people have sustained considerable loss: Sister Kilburn has lost two houses; Pell's three houses; Jacobson one, and Widow Zoeller her's; and others have lost a part of their goods; as Lepper, Eastman, etc.

There are great reasons to suspect that some wicked incendiaries had a hand in this dreadful fire, which has consumed the fourth part of the city; several persons have been apprehended; moreover there were few hands of the inhabitants to assist; the bells being carried off, no timely alarm was given; the engines were out of order; the fire company broke; and also no proper order and directions, etc.; all of which contributed to the spreading of the flames.

—JOHNSTON, Campaign of 1776, II, 118-119.

3. "THE WRETCHES SUCCEEDED TOO WELL"

Sir William Howe to Lord George Germain.

York Island, September 23, 1776

My Lord: Between the 20th and 21st instant, at midnight, a most horrid attempt was made by a number of wretches to burn the town of New York, in which they succeeded too well, having set it on fire in several places with matches and combustibles that had been prepared with great art and ingenuity. Many were detected in the fact, and some killed upon the spot by the enraged troops in garrison; and had it not been for the exertions of Major-General Robertson, the officers under his command in the town and the brigade of Guards detached from the camp, the whole must infallibly have been consumed, as the night was extremely windy.

The destruction is computed to be about one-quarter of the town; and we have reason to suspect there are villains still lurking there, ready to finish the work they had begun, one person, escaping the pursuit of a sentinel the following night, having declared he would again set fire to the town the first opportunity. The strictest search is making after these incendiaries, and the most effectual measures taken to guard against the preparation of their villainous and wicked designs.

XIII. THE MARTYRDOM OF NATHAN HALE

Under the date of September 22, 1776, Howe's Orderly Book contains a laconic entry: "A spy from the enemy by his own full confession, apprehended last night, was executed this day at 11 o'clock in front of the Artillery Park." The spy was young Nathan Hale, who, after Harlem Heights, had volunteered to go on a mission to secure intelligence about British troop movements in and around New York City. Apprehended on Long Island, and identified as an American officer, reputedly by his own cousin Samuel Hale, he was brought to the city the day after the fire, interrogated by General Howe, summarily turned over to the provost marshal, and hanged somewhere in the neighborhood of the present site of Grand Central Terminal. This curt account of the tragic incident is in a contemporary paper:

This day, one Hale, in New York, on suspicion of being a spy was taken up and dragged without ceremony to the execution post, and hung up. General Washington has since sent in a flag, supposed to be on that account.

Nothing here about Hale's immortal last words, which seem to have been first recorded in the Essex Journal of Newburyport, Massachusetts, which reported on February 13, 1777, that Hale had declared on the gallows: "If he had ten thousand lives, he would lay them all down, if called to it, in defence of his injured, bleeding country." But it is to the memoirs of William Hull, who was to surrender Detroit to the British in the War of 1812, that we are indebted for the commonly accepted last words as recorded by Hull's daughter, Maria Hull Campbell. A contemporary ballad, probably the best to come out of the war, commemorated Hale's mission, arrest and execution.

1. A BRITISH CAPTAIN SEES HALE DIE LIKE A HERO

Diary of Captain Frederick Mackenzie.

Sept. 22. A person named Nathaniel Hales, a lieutenant in the Rebel army and a native of Connecticut, was apprehended as a spy last night upon Long Island; and having this day made a full and free confession to the Commander in Chief of his being employed by Mr Washington in that capacity, he was hanged at 11 o'clock in front of the park of artillery. He was about 24 years of age, and had been educated at the College of Newhaven in Connecticut.

duty of every good officer to obey any orders given him by his Commander in Chief; and desired the spectators to be at all times prepared to meet death in whatever shape it might appear.

—MACKENZIE, Diary, I, 61-62.

2. "I ONLY REGRET THAT I HAVE BUT ONE LIFE TO LOSE FOR MY COUNTRY"

From the manuscript memoirs of Captain William Hull of Connecticut.

In a few days an officer came to our camp, under a flag of truce, and informed Hamilton, then a captain of artillery, but afterwards the aid of General Washington, that Captain Hale had been arrested within the British lines, condemned as a spy, and executed that morning.

I learned the melancholy particulars from this officer, who was present at his execution and seemed touched by the circumstances attending it.

He said that Captain Hale had passed through their army, both of Long Island and York Island. That he had procured sketches of the fortifications, and made memoranda of their number and different positions. When apprehended, he was taken before Sir William Howe, and these papers, found concealed about his person, betrayed his intentions. He at once declared his name, his rank in the American army, and his object in coming within the British lines.

Sir William Howe, without the form of a trial, gave orders for his execution the following morning. He was placed in the custody of the Provost Marshal, who was a refugee and hardened to human suffering and every softening sentiment of the heart. Captain Hale, alone, without sympathy or support, save that from above, on the near approach of death asked for a clergyman to attend him. It was refused. He then requested a Bible; that too was refused by his inhuman jailer.

"On the morning of his execution," continued the officer, "my station was near the fatal spot, and I requested the Provost Marshal to permit the prisoner to sit in my marquee, while he was making the necessary preparations. Captain Hale entered: he was calm, and bore himself with gentle dignity, in the consciousness of rectitude and high intentions. He asked for writing materials, which I furnished him: he wrote two letters, one to his mother and one to a brother officer." He was shortly after summoned to the gallows. But a few persons were around him, yet his characteristic dying words were remembered. He said, "I only regret that I have but one life to lose for my country."

—CAMPBELL, General William Hull, pp. 37-38.

3. BALLAD OF NATHAN HALE

[1776]

The breezes went steadily thro' the tall pines,
 A-saying "oh! hu-ush!" a-saying "oh! hu-ush!"
 As stilly stole by a bold legion of horse,
 For Hale in the bush, for Hale in the bush.

"Keep still!" said the thrush as she nestled her young,
In a nest by the road; in a nest by the road.
"For the tyrants are near, and with them appear What bodes us no good, what bodes us no good."

The brave captain heard it, and thought of his home,
In a cot by the brook; in a cot by the brook.
With mother and sister and memories dear,
He so gaily forsook; he so gaily forsook.

Cooling shades of the night were coming apace,
The tattoo had beat; the tattoo had beat.
The noble one sprang from his dark lurking place
To make his retreat; to make his retreat.

He warily trod on the dry rustling leaves,
As he passed through the wood; as he passed through the wood;
And silently gained his rude launch on the shore,
As she played with the flood; as she played with the flood. . . .

The guards of the camp, on that dark, dreary night,
Had a murderous will; had a murderous will.
They took him and bore him afar from the shore,
To a hut on the hill; to a hut on the hill.

No mother was there, nor a friend who could cheer,
In that little stone cell; in that little stone cell.
But he trusted in love, from his father above.
In his heart, all was well; in his heart, all was well.

An ominous owl with his solemn bass voice,
Sat moaning hard by; sat moaning hard by.
"The tyrant's proud minions most gladly rejoice,
"For he must soon die; for he must soon die."

The brave fellow told them, no thing he restrained—
The cruel gen'ral; the cruel gen'ral—
His errand from camp, of the ends to be gained,
And said that was all; and said that was all.

They took him and bound him and bore him away,
Down the hill's grassy side; down the hill's grassy side.
'Twas there the base hirelings, in royal array,
His cause did deride; his cause did deride.

Five minutes were given, short moments, no more,
For him to repent; for him to repent;
He prayed for his mother, he asked not another.
To Heaven he went; to Heaven he went.

The faith of a martyr, the tragedy shewed,
 As he trod the last stage; as he trod the last stage.
 And Britons will shudder at gallant Hale's blood,
 As his words do presage; as his words do presage.

"Thou pale king of terrors, thou life's gloomy foe,
 Go frighten the slave, go frighten the slave;
 Tell tyrants, to you their allegiance they owe
 No fears for the brave; no fears for the brave."

—MOORE, ed., Songs and Ballads, pp. 131-133.

XIV. AWAITING HOWE'S NEXT MOVE

The army was riddled with plunderers, drifters and fair-weather soldiers. Washington's solution: Better pay and more prestige for officers, long-term enlistments for privates, no dependence upon the militia. Rather a standing army than "inevitable ruin." Meantime, distrust of Washington among the officers was deepening. As Colonel Haslet of the Delaware battalion put it in a letter of September 4 to Caesar Rodney, the Delaware Patriot leader: "Would to Heaven General Lee were here is the language of officers and men." Washington himself confessed to being in an "unhappy, divided" state of mind.

While a reorganization of the army was exigent, Washington had to make the necessary moves with such forces as he had in anticipation of Howe's next attack. Although a Westchester landing seemed imminent, Washington yielded to a general council and divided the American forces to be prepared for alternative attack plans by the British. It was indeed a time of desperation. "We are hellishly frightened," Gouverneur Morris wrote to Robert R. Livingston on October 8, adding, "but don't say a word of that for we shall get our spirits again." That very same day the British Captain Frederick Mackenzie noted in his diary that the rebels were about to make their last stand.

1. CHARGES OF INDISCRIMINATE PLUNDERING BY THE PATRIOTS

Lewis Morris, Jr., to his father, Lewis Morris, the Signer.

New York, September 6, 1776

Dear Sir,

. . . When I received your letter I was at the bridge looking for a sloop to carry some furniture to the Fish Kill, which I believe I shall send off next day after to-morrow. From your letter I believed you were acquainted with Mamma's moving up to Harrison's Purchase with her family where she has carried a great deal of furniture and all her linnen and wearing apparel, and therefore your position of moveing her to Philadelphia will be attended with many obstacles, for she can neither bring cloaths sufficient for the family nor utensils to keep house, as most of the carts and waggons are pressed in the service; however I shall set off in the morning to propose the scheme and if she approves of it, I shall spare neither time nor trouble in effecting of it.

I wish you had sent me a duplicate of your letter by Billy, for the post office is moved up to Dobes's Ferry and shall be at a loss what to do with the stocks till I receive it, and if I send it is ten to one if I get it and perhaps I may be upon the wing for it for these two or three days. I assure you, Sir, your affairs at Morrisania, however secure you may think they may be, are in a very critical situation; in all probability they may be in possession of the enemy in a little time; for from their manoeuvre Westchester County is their object, and let me whisper to you a secret from my suspicions and the appearance of theirs: We are retreating to King's Bridge; if so, Morrisania will fall of course.

I wish you was home to assist me; you have a great deal at stake which I hope I shall be able to secure. There is a regiment at Morrisania, and your own house is made a barrack of, that is for the officers, and there are troops all about us which makes it impossible to prosecute the business of the farm—and besides they press your horses; the two coaches horses were pressed this afternoon which Colonel Shee has returned, and I believe unless speedily secured your breeding mares will come next. . . . Your fat cattle are in the hands of the commissary. . . . Colonel Hand's regiment plunder every body in Westchester County indiscriminately, even yourself have not escaped. Montrasseurs Island they plundered and committed the most unwarrantable destruction upon it; fifty dozen of bottles were broke in the cellar, the paper tore from the rooms and every pane of glass broke to pieces. His furniture and cloaths were brought over to Morrisania and sold at publick auction. Jimmy Delancey, Oliver and John, after giving their parole, are gone off to the enemy and their house is plundered. Mrs. Wilkins is upon Long Island with her husband and her house is plundered and hers and Mrs. Moncriefe's cloathes were sold at vendue. Seabury has likewise eloped, and Mrs. Wilkins has very industriously propagated that you had fled to France. Such brimstones will certainly meet with their desert. Give my love to all, and believe me to be

Your dutiful son,

L. MORRIS

2. "THE ARMY IS NOW ONLY A RECEPTACLE FOR RAGAMUFFINS"

Major General Henry Knox to his brother.

Heights of Harlem, 8 Miles from New York, Sept. 23d, 1776

The general is as worthy a man as breathes, but he cannot do every thing nor be everywhere. He wants good assistants. There is a radical evil in our army—the lack of officers. We ought to have men of merit in the most extensive and unlimited sense of the word. Instead of which, the bulk of the officers of the army are a parcel of ignorant, stupid men, who might make tolerable soldiers, but are bad officers; and until Congress forms an establishment to induce men proper for the purpose to leave ther usual employments and enter the service, it is ten to one they will be beat till they are heartily tired of it. We ought to have academies, in which the whole theory of the art of war shall be taught, and every other encouragement possible given to draw persons into the army that may give a lustre to our arms. As the army now stands, it is only a receptacle for ragamuffins. You will observe, I am chagrined, not more so than at any other time since I've been in the army; but many late affairs, of which I've been an eye-witness, have so totally sickened me that unless some very different mode of conduct is observed in the formation of the new army, I shall not think myself obliged by either the laws of God or nature to risk my reputation on so cobweb a foundation. . . .

3. "WE ARE NOW ON THE EVE OF ANOTHER DISSOLUTION OF OUR ARMY"

George Washington to John Hancock.

Colonel Morris's, on the Heights of Harlem, September 24, 1776

Sir: From the hours allotted to Sleep, I will borrow a few Moments to convey my thoughts on sundry important matters to Congress. I shall offer them, with that sincerity which ought to characterize a man of candour; and with the freedom which may be used in giving useful information, without incurring the imputation of presumption.

We are now, as it were, upon the eve of another dissolution of our Army; the remembrance of the difficulties which happened upon that occasion last year, the consequences which might have followed the change, if proper advantages had been taken by the Enemy; added to a knowledge of the present temper and Situation of the Troops, reflect but a very gloomy prospect upon the appearance of things now, and satisfy me, beyond the possibility of doubt, that unless some speedy, and effectual measures are adopted by Congress, our cause will be lost.

It is in vain to expect, that any (or more than a trifling) part of this Army will again engage in the Service on the encouragement offered by Congress. When Men find that their Townsmen and Companions are receiving 20, 30, and more dollars, for a few Months Service, (which is truly the case) it cannot be expected; without using compulsion; and to force them into the Service would answer no valuable purpose. When Men are irritated, and the Passions inflamed, they fly hastily and cheerfully to Arms; but after the first emotions are over, to expect, among such People, as compose the bulk of the Army, that they are influenced by any other principles than those of Interest, is to look for what never did, and I fear never will happen; the Congress will deceive themselves therefore if they expect it.

A Soldier reasoned with upon the goodness of the cause he is engaged in, and the inestimable rights he is contending for, hears you with patience, and acknowledges the truth of your observations, but adds, that it is of no more Importance to him than others. The Officer makes you the same reply, with this further remark, that his pay will not support him, and he cannot ruin himself and Family to serve his Country, when every Member of the community is equally Interested, and benefitted by his Labours. The few therefore, who act upon Principles of disinterestedness, are, comparatively speaking, no more than a drop in the Ocean.

It becomes evidently clear then, that as this Contest is not likely to be the Work of a day; as the War must be carried on systematically, and to do it, you must have good Officers, there are, in my Judgment, no other possible means to obtain them but by establishing your Army upon a permanent footing; and giving your Officers good pay; this will induce Gentlemen, and Men of Character to engage; and till the bulk of your Officers are composed of such persons as are actuated by Principles of honour, and a spirit of enterprize, you have little to expect from them.—They ought to have such allowances as will enable them to live like, and support the Characters of Gentlemen; and not be driven by a scanty pittance to the low, and dirty arts which many of them practice, to filch the Publick of more than the difference of pay would amount to upon an ample allowe. besides, something is due to the Man who puts his life in his hand, hazards his health, and forsakes the Sweetst of domestick enjoyments. Why a Captn. in the Continental Service should receive no more than 5/. Curry per day, for performing the same duties that an officer of the same Rank in the British Service receives 10/. Sterlg. for, I never could conceive; especially when the latter is provided with every necessity he requires, upon the best terms, and the former can scarce procure them, at any Rate. There is nothing that gives a Man consequence, and renders him fit for Command, like a support that renders him Independent of every body but the State he Serves.

With respect to the Men, nothing but a good bounty can obtain them upon a permanent establishment; and for no shorter time than the continuance of the War, ought they to be engaged; as Facts incontestibly prove, that the difficulty, and cost of Inlistments, increase with time. When the Army was first raised at Cambridge, I am persuaded the Men might have been got without a bounty for the War: after this, they began to see that the Contest was not likely to end so speedily as was immaged, and to feel their consequence, by remarking, that to get the Militia In, in the course of last year, many Towns were induced to give them a bounty.

Foreseeing the Evils resulting from this, and the destructive consequences which unavoidably would follow short Inlistments, I took the Liberty in a long Letter, written by myself (date not now recollected, as my Letter Book is not here) to recommend the Inlistments for and during the War; assigning such Reasons for it, as experience has since convinced me were well founded. At that time twenty Dollars would, I am persuaded, have engaged the Men for this term. But it will not do to look back, and if the present opportunity is slip'd, I am perswaded that twelve months more will Increase our difficulties fourfold. I shall therefore take the freedom of giving it as my opinion, that a good Bounty be immediately offered, aided by the proffer of at least 100, or 150 Acres of Land and a suit of Cloaths and Blanket, to each non-Comd. Officer and Soldier; as I have good authority for saying, that however high the Men's pay may appear, it is barely sufficient in the present scarcity and dearthness of all kinds of goods, to keep them in Cloaths, much less afford support to their Families.

If this encouragement then is given to the Men, and such Pay allowed the Officers as will induce Gentlemen of Character and liberal Sentiments to engage; and proper care and precaution used in the nomination (having more regard to the Characters of Persons, than the Number of Men they can Inlist) we should in a little time have an Army able to cope with any that can be opposed to it, as there are excellent Materials to form one out of: but while the only merit an Officer possesses is his ability to raise Men; while those Men consider, and treat him as an equal; and (in the Character of an Officer) regard him no more than a broomstick, being mixed together as one common herd; no order nor no discipline can prevail; nor will the Officer ever meet with the respect which is essentially necessary to due subordination.

To place any dependance upon Militia, is, assuredly, resting upon a broken staff. Men just dragged from the tender Scenes of domestick life, unaccustomed to the din of Arms; totally unacquainted with every kind of Military skill, which being followed by a want of confidence in themselves, when opposed to Troops regularly trained, disciplined, and appointed, superior in knowledge, and superior in Arms, makes them timid, and ready to fly from their own shadows. Besides, the sudden change in their manner of living, (particularly in their lodging) brings on sickness in many; impatience in all, and such an unconquerable desire of returning to their respective homes that it not only produces shameful, and scandalous Desertions among themselves, but infuses the like spirit in others. Again, Men accustomed to unbounded freedom, and no control, cannot brook the Restraint which is indispensably necessary to the good order and Government of an Army; without which, licentiousness, and every kind of disorder triumphantly reign. To bring Men to a proper degree of Subordination, is not the work of a day, a Month or even a year; and unhappily for us, and the cause we are Engaged in, the little discipline I have been labouring to establish in the Army under my immediate Command, is in a manner done away by having such a mixture of Troops as have been called together within these few Months.

Relaxed, and unfit, as our Rules and Regulations of War are, for the Government of an Army, the Militia (those properly so called, for of these we have two sorts, the Six Months Men and those sent in as a temporary aid) do not think themselves subject to 'em, and therefore take liberties, which the Soldier is punished for; This creates jealousy; jealousy begets dissatisfaction; and these by degrees ripen into Mutiny; keeping the whole Army in a confused, and disordered State; rendering the time of those who wish to see regularity and good Order prevail more unhappy than Words can describe. Besides this, such repeated changes take place, that all arrangement is set at nought, and the constant fluctuation of things, deranges every plan. . . .

These Sir, Congress may be assured, are but a small part of the Inconveniences which might be enumerated and attributed to Militia; but there is one that merits particular attention, and that is the expence. Certain I am, that it would be cheaper to keep 50 or 100,000 Men in constant pay than to depend upon half the number, and supply the other half occasionally by Militia. The time the latter is in pay before and after they are in Camp, assembling and Marching; the waste of Ammunition; the consumption of Stores, which in spite of every Resolution, and requisition of Congress they must be furnished with, or sent home, added to other incidental expenses consequent upon their coming, and conduct in Camp, surpasses all Idea, and destroys every kind of regularity and oeconomy which you could establish among fixed and Settled Troops; and will, in my opinion prove (if the scheme is adhered to) the Ruin of our Cause.

The Jealousies of a standing Army, and the Evils to be apprehended from one, are remote; and in my judgment, situated and circumstanced as we are, not at all to be dreaded; but the consequence of wanting one, according to my Ideas, formed from the present view of things, is certain, and inevitable Ruin; for if I was called upon to declare upon Oath, whether the Militia have been most serviceable or hurtful upon the whole; I should subscribe to the latter. I do not mean by this however to arraign the Conduct of Congress, in so doing I should equally condemn my own measures, (if I did not my judgment); but experience, which is the best criterion to work by, so fully, clearly, and decisively reprobates the practice of trusting to Militia, that no Man who regards order, regularity, and oeconomy; or who has any regard for his own honour, Character, or peace of Mind, will risk them upon this Issue. . . .

Another matter highly worthy of attention, is, that other Rules and Regulations may be adopted for the Government of the Army than those now in existence, otherwise the Army, but for the name, might as well be disbanded. For the most atrocious offences, (one or two Instances only excepted) a Man receives no more than 39 Lashes; and these perhaps (thro' the collusion of the Officer who is to see it inflicted), are given in such a manner as to become rather a matter of sport than punishment; but when inflicted as they ought, many hardened fellows who have been the Subjects, have declared that for a bottle of Rum they would undergo a Second operation; It is evident therefore that this punishment is inadequate to many Crimes it is assigned to, as a proof of it, thirty and 40 Soldiers will desert at a time; and of late, a practice prevail . . . of the most alarming nature; and which will, if it cannot be checked, prove fatal both to the Country and Army; I mean the infamous practice of Plundering, for, under the Idea of Tory property, or property which may fall into the hands of the Enemy, no Man is secure in his effects, and scarcely in his Person; for in order to get at them, we have several Instances of People being frightened out of their Houses under pretence of those Houses being ordered to be burnt, and this is done with a view of seizing the Goods; nay, in order that the villainy may be more effectually concealed, some Houses have actually been burnt to cover the theft.

I have with some others, used my utmost endeavours to stop this horrid practice, but under the present lust after plunder, and want of Laws to punish Offenders, I might almost as well attempt to remove Mount Atlas.—I have ordered instant corporal Punishment upon every Man who passes our Lines, or is seen with Plunder, that the Offenders might be punished for disobedience of Orders; and Inclose you the proceedings of a Court Martial held upon an Officer, who with a Party of Men had robbd a House a little beyond our Lines of a number of valuable goods; among which (to shew that nothing escapes) were four large Pier looking Glasses, Women's Cloaths, and other Articles which one would think, could be of no earthly use to him. He was met by a Major of Brigade who ordered him to return the Goods, as taken contrary to Genl. Orders, which he not only peremptorily refused to do, but drew up his Party and swore he would defend them at the hazard of his Life; on which I ordered him to be arrested, and tryed for Plundering, Disobedience of Orders, and Mutiny; for the result, I refer to the Proceedings of the Court; whose judgment appeared so exceedingly extraordinary, that I ordered a Re-consideration of the matter, upon which, and with the Assistance of fresh evidence, they made Shift to Cashier him. . . .

4. THE FATAL DECISION TO HOLD FORT WASHINGTON

From the memoirs of Major General William Heath of the Continental Army.

September 16, 1776

It now became an object of high importance to calculate, if possible, where the British would make their next attempt; and here the general officers were divided in opinion. A part of them imagined that the British would first endeavour to make themselves masters of the whole of New-York Island, and that, therefore, the reduction of Fort Washington and its dependencies would be their object. Others supposed that they would make a landing either at Morrisania, Hunt's or Frog's Point, which eventually would produce as certain a reduction of the works on the island, with very little loss to the British. It was therefore determined in council to guard against both; and for this purpose 10,000 men were to be retained on the island, at and near Fort Washington. Our General's division was to be augmented to 10,000 men, and a floating bridge was to be thrown across Haarlem Creek, that these two bodies might communicate with and support each other, as circumstances might require; and Maj.-Gen. Greene was to command the flying camp on the Jersey side of the Hudson, which was to consist of 5000. The different arrangements took place accordingly.

XV. THE RETREAT TO WHITE PLAINS

Howe's next moves—or his failure to make them—cost him the war. It took him two months after the Battle of Long Island to move less than thirty miles to reach White Plains. Deciding to circumvent Washington rather than risk a frontal attack, Howe, under cover of fog, embarked his main army during the night of October 12 and landed an advance force at Throg's Neck, a peninsula on what is now the Bronx. Washington had already anticipated this move. A small detachment of Pennsylvania riflemen posted behind a woodpile threw the British back in confusion. To cross the creek and marsh at this point and in the face of increasing opposition seemed hazardous to Howe, who embarked his troops once more and landed three miles east at Pell's Point.

Howe's landing on Westchester imperiled Washington's main army. Accordingly the American general and his staff decided to retreat to White Plains, then a completely isolated country spot remote from military supplies. The main American move began on October 18. Meantime, Colonel John Glover of Marblehead, whose men had ferried the American army back to Manhattan from Brooklyn Heights and who was a leading exponent of amphibious warfare, fought a valiant delaying action against the British about a mile from their landing place at Pell's Point, and Haslet attempted a surprise attack on a corps of Tories under the redoubtable Ranger, Robert Rogers, at Mamaroneck, and took 36 prisoners ahead with him to White Plains.

1. THE BRITISH ALMOST MEET DISASTER AT HELL GATE

Diary of Captain Frederick Mackenzie.

October 23, 1776 . . . Some of the captains of the navy who attended for the regulating of the boats and vessels when they went through Hellgate with the army the morning of the 12th instant, have since declared that it was a most hazardous enterprize to go through a channel of that dangerous nature with such a fleet, and before it was daylight. What made it still more dangerous was that an unexpected fog came on early in the morning, which prevented them in a great degree from seeing the boat and buoys which had been previously fixed to mark the proper channel. It was too late when the fog came on to postpone the movement; the troops and everything necessary were embarked, and the wind and tide answered exactly; therefore notwithstanding the hazard it could not be delayed.

I dare say at the moment the army began to move the general and admiral would have compounded for the loss of one or two hundred men. Fortune, however, favored the bold:—only one boat, having on board an officer and 25 artillery men and three 6-pounders was sunk. All but four men and the guns were saved, which was more than could have been expected. Everything else got safe through that dangerous passage, where at all times, except at high and low water, the tide runs with the utmost rapidity, forming dreadful whirlpools, and at half tide roaring over the masses of rocks which project into, or rear up their broken heads in the middle of the channel. In one place if the stream catches a boat or vessel, it is drawn into a kind of whirlpool or eddy, where it is carried round several times with great violence, and then, if not sucked in, is thrown on the adjacent rocks and dashed to pieces. One boat with a detachment of Grenadiers was caught into this place, and after some turns round was thrown upon the shore, but fortunately the men got out safe, and soon after got into another boat and followed the army.

This passage is thought extremely dangerous by those who are best acquainted with it, and who take every advantage of winds, tides and other circumstances. When I was formerly quartered at New York, I frequently went out as far as Hellgate to see vessels go through, especially when there were any which carried topsails, and the pilots were generally under much apprehension when they had such vessels under their charge. Those men were in the utmost astonishment to see ships of war of 44 guns, frigates, transports full of troops, horses and waggons, and flat boats with troops and artillery, attempting and accomplishing so difficult an undertaking with such a trifling loss. To any other nation the obstacles would have seemed insurmountable.

Since the army went through, I have frequently seen large transports go through stern foremost, with all sails set and filled, the strength of the tide overcoming the power of the wind upon the sails. Some officers of the Navy say this is the safest way, as the ship has better and more certain steerage.

2. AT PELHAM: "A PRETTY CLOSE FIRE WHICH CHECKED THEM"

Memoirs of Major General William Heath.

[October] 18th.—The regiment at West Chester causeway had been relieved by another. The officer on command there, this morning, sent up an express to our General, informing him that the British were opening up an embrasure in their work at the end of the causeway, and that he apprehended they intended, under a cannonade from this, to attempt to pass. Our General ordered one of his aids to gallop his horse to the officer commanding the brigade, near Valentine's, the nearest to West Chester, and order him to form his brigade instantly. Arriving, himself, by the time the brigade was formed, he ordered the officer to march with the utmost expedition to the head of the causeway, to reinforce the troops there; himself moving on with them.

When the troops had advanced to about half the way between the head of the creek and the post at the head of the causeway, another express met him, informing him that the whole British army were in motion and seemed to be moving towards the pass at the head of the creek. Upon this, the brigade was ordered to halt, the whole to prime and load, and the rear regiment to file off by the left, and march briskly to reinforce the Americans at the pass, at the head of the creek.

At this instant, Gen. Washington came up and, having inquired of our General the state of things, ordered him to return immediately and have his division formed ready for action, and to take such a position as might appear best calculated to oppose the enemy, should they attempt to land another body of troops on Morrisania, which he thought not improbable. Our General immediately obeyed the order.

The wind was now fresh at south-west. The British crossed to the other side of Frog's Neck, embarked on board their boats, crossed over the cove, landed on Pell's Neck, and moved briskly upwards. Three or four of the American regiments advanced towards them, and took a good position behind a stone fence. When the British had advanced sufficiently near, they gave them a pretty close fire, which checked them, and even obliged them to fall back; but being immediately supported, they returned vigorously to the charge. The action was sharp for a short time; but the Americans were soon obliged to give way to superior force. . . .

3. A MARBLEHEAD HERO LONGS FOR GENERAL LEE AT PELHAM

Letter from Colonel John Glover.

Mile Square, October 22, 1776

You no doubt heard the enemy landed all their army on Frog's Point the 11th instant, leaving only twelve hundred men in York, and there remained until the 18th, which was Friday.

I arose early in the morning and went on the hill with my glass, and discovered a number of ships in the Sound under way; in a very short time saw the boats, upwards of two hundred sail, all manned and formed in four grand divisions. I immediately sent off Major Lee express to General Lee, who was about three miles distant, and without waiting his orders, turned out the brigade I have the honour to command, and very luckily for us I did, as it turned out afterwards, the enemy having stole a march one and a half miles on us. I marched down to oppose their landing with about seven hundred and fifty men and three field-pieces, but had not gone more than half the distance before I met their advanced guard, about thirty men; upon which I detached a captain's guard of fifty men to meet them, while I could dispose of the main body to advantage.

This plan succeeded very well, as you will hereafter see. The enemy had the advantage of us, being posted on an eminence which commanded the ground we had to march over. However, I did the best I could and disposed of my little party to the best of my judgment. . . .

This disposed of, I rode forward—(oh! the anxiety of mind I was then in for the fate of the day—the lives of seven hundred and fifty men immediately at hazard, and under God their preservation entirely depended on their being well disposed of; besides this, my country, my honour, my own life, and every thing that was dear, appeared at that critical moment to be at stake. I would have given a thousand worlds to have had General Lee or some other experienced officer present, to direct or at least to approve of what I had done—looked around, but could see none, they all being three miles from me, and the action came on so sudden it was out of their power to be with me)—to the advance guard, and ordered them to advance, who did, within fifty yards, and received their fire without the loss of a man; we returned it and fell[ed] four of them, and kept the ground till we exchanged five rounds.

Their body being much larger than mine, and having two men killed and several wounded, which weakened my party, the enemy pushing forward not more than thirty yards distant, I ordered a retreat, which was masterly well done by the captain that commanded the party. The enemy gave a shout and advanced; Colonel Reed's, laying under cover of a stone wall undiscovered till they came within thirty yards, then rose up and gave them the whole charge; the enemy broke and retreated for the main body to come up.

In this situation we remained about an hour and a half, when they appeared about four thousand, with seven pieces of artillery; they now advanced, keeping up a constant fire of artillery; we kept our post under cover of the stone wall before mentioned till they came within fifty yards of us, rose up and gave them the whole charge of the battalion; they halted and returned the fire with showers of musketry and cannon balls. We exchanged seven rounds at this post, retreated, and formed in the rear of Colonel Shepherd and on his left; they then shouted and pushed on till they came on Shepherd, posted behind a fine double stone wall; he rose up and fired by grand divisions, by which he kept up a constant fire and maintained his part till he exchanged seventeen rounds with them, and caused them to retreat several times, once in particular so far that a soldier of Colonel Shepherd's leaped over the wall and took a hat and canteen off of a captain that lay dead on the ground they retreated from.

However, their body being so much larger than ours, we were, for the preservation of our men, forced to retreat. . . . The enemy halted, and played away their artillery at us, and we at them, till night, without any damage on our side, and but very little on theirs. At dark we came off, and marched about three miles, leading to Dobb's Ferry, after fighting all day without victuals or drink, laying as a picket all night, the heavens over us and the earth under us, which was all we had, having left our baggage at the old encampment we left in the morning. The next morning marched over to Mile Square. I had eight men killed and thirteen wounded, among which was Colonel Shepherd, a brave officer.

XVI. HOWE'S FUTILE STROKE AT WHITE PLAINS

As late as October 26, Captain Frederick Mackenzie of the Royal Welsh Fusiliers recorded in his diary that "the cautious conduct of General Howe in all the operations of this campaign is generally approved of." The bitter fruits of that caution were to be evident in the next few critical weeks.

Howe waited at New Rochelle until October 22, when he was reinforced by Hessians under Knyphausen, again giving Washington time to build up his position at White Plains. On the morning of the twenty-eighth the opposing armies, each about 13,000 strong, confronted each other. Washington's forces held entrenchments on hilly ground in the village of White Plains. His left rested on a millpond; his right on a bend in the Bronx River, which protected his flank and rear. Again Howe avoided a frontal attack, but sent his main forces to seize Chatterton's Hill, a steep unfortified point across the Bronx River. When the British advanced they met a withering fire from young Captain Alexander Hamilton's artillery. But when the Hessians came up on the right, General McDougall, exposed to heavy fire in front and flank, was forced to retreat across the stream to White Plains. Howe won the hill, but let victory slip from his grasp. Again he waited for reinforcements before attacking. A storm further delayed his operations, and Washington was able to pull back his forces north to New Castle, with the main American army intact.

1. "GENTLEMEN, WE HAVE OTHER BUSINESS THAN RECONNOITRING"

Major General William Heath's account.

October 27th.—In the forenoon a heavy cannonade was heard towards Fort Washington. Thirteen Hessians and two or three British soldiers were sent in on this day. From the American camp to the west-south-west, there appeared to be a very commanding height, worthy of attention. The Commander in Chief ordered the General Officers who were off duty to attend him to reconnoitre this ground on this morning. When arrived at the ground, although very commanding, it did not appear so much so as other grounds to the north and almost parallel with the left of the army, as it was then formed.

"Yonder," says Major-Gen. Lee, pointing to the grounds just mentioned, "is the ground we ought to occupy."

"Let us go and view it," replied the Commander in Chief.

When on the way, a light-horseman came up in full gallop, his horse almost out of breath, and addressed Gen. Washington: "The British are on the camp, sir."

The General observed: "Gentlemen, we have now other business than reconnoitring," putting his horse in full gallop for the camp, and followed by the other officers.

When arrived at head-quarters, the Adjutant-General Re[e]d, who had remained at camp, informed the Commander in Chief that the guards had been all beat in, and the whole American army were now at their respective posts, in order of battle. The Commander in Chief turned round to the officers and only said, "Gentlemen, you will repair to your respective posts, and do the best you can."

Our General, on arriving at his own division, found them all in the lines; and, from the height of his post, found that the first attack was directed against the Americans on Chatterton's Hill. The little river Bronx, which ran between the American right and this hill, after running round its north side, turned and ran down on the east and south-east.

2. THE FIGHT FOR CHATTERTON'S HILL

Colonel John Haslet to Caesar Rodney.

November 12, 1776

I received his Excellency's orders to take possession of the hill [Chatterton's Hill] beyond our lines, and the command of the Militia regiments there posted; which was done. We had not been many minutes on the ground when the cannonade began, and the second shot wounded a militia-man in the thigh, upon which the whole regiment broke and fled immediately, and were not rallied without much difficulty. Soon after, General McDougall's brigade took post behind us. Some of our officers expressed much apprehension from the fire of our friends so posted. On my application to the general, he ordered us to the right, formed his own brigade on the left, and ordered Brooks's Massachusetts Militia still farther to the right, behind a stone fence.

The troops being thus disposed, I went up to the top of the hill, in front of our troops, accompanied by Major McDonough, to reconnoitre the enemy, I plainly perceived them marching to the White-Plain, in eight columns, and stop in the wheat-fields a considerable time. I saw their General Officers on horse back assemble in council, and soon their whole body face about and in one continued column march to the hill opposite to our right. I then applied to General McDougall again to vary his disposition, and advised him to order my regiment farther onward, and replace it with Colonel Smallwood's, or order the colonel forward, for there was no dependence to be placed on the Militia. The latter measure was adopted.

On my seeing the enemy's march to the creek begin in a column of their main body, and urging the necessity of bringing our field-pieces immediately forward to bear upon them, the general ordered one, and that so poorly appointed, that myself was forced to assist in dragging it along the rear of the regiment. While so employed, a cannon-ball struck the carriage, and scattered the shot about, a wad of tow blazing in the middle. The artillerymen fled. One alone was prevailed upon to tread out the blaze and collect the shot. The few that returned made not more than two discharges, when they retreated with the field-piece.

At this time the Maryland battalion was warmly engaged, and the enemy ascending the hill. The cannonade from twelve or fifteen pieces, well served, kept up a continual peal of reiterated thunder. The Militia regiment behind the fence fled in confusion, without more than a random, scattering fire. Colonel Smallwood in a quarter of an hour afterwards gave way also. The rest of General McDougall's brigade never came up to the scene of action. Part of the first three Delaware companies also retreated in disorder, but not till after several were wounded and killed. The left of the regiment took post behind a fence on the top of the hill with most of the officers, and twice repulsed the Light Troops and Horse of the enemy; but seeing ourselves deserted on all hands, and the continued column of the enemy advancing, we also retired. Covering the retreat of our party, and forming at the foot of the hill, we marched into camp in the rear of the body sent to reinforce us.

XVII. THE FALL OF FORT WASHINGTON

Admitting to 150 killed and wounded in the joint British-Hessian attack on Chatterton Hill, Archibald Robertson of the Royal Engineers noted in his diary under the date of October 28: "This day General Knipphausen advanced toward King's Bridge. Fort Independence, etc., taken possession of." On November 5 Howe left White Plains for Dobbs Ferry, toward which his army was already moving. "The design of this manoeuvre is a matter of much conjecture," Washington reported to Congress. The Americans actually expected Howe to cross into Jersey or to move up the Hudson. He did neither.

Why he changed his whole plan of campaign and decided to move south against Fort Washington on Manhattan Island is now clear. An American traitor, William Demont, an ensign in Magaw's 5th Pennsylvania, deserted and turned over the plans of that fort to the British. Conclusive evidence of this treachery is found in the contemporary diary kept by the British officer, Captain Mackenzie, and in a letter from the turncoat himself which was not published until a hundred years after the event.

The damage had been done, but as Alexander Graydon later observed, intelligence about the fort might readily have been obtained "from hundreds in New York" who had "a perfect knowledge of the ground we occupied." Standing near the northern end of Manhattan, Fort Washington was no longer tenable and should have been abandoned, especially after two British ships of 44 guns each and a 20-gun frigate had passed by the obstructions placed across the river to block the fleet. Washington advised Nathanael Greene to evacuate the fort but left the decision to his subordinate. Greene advised him: "I cannot conceive the garrison to be in any great danger." Against his better judgment Washington permitted Greene to retain the garrison there. The Rhode Island anchormith and ex-Quaker, whose judgment cost the Americans 2,900 troops, one of the major blunders of the war, was the youngest of Washington's brigadiers. He still had much to learn, but he was fast to learn it and ended the war as an outstanding military figure.

Washington, who saw the battle of Fort Washington from the heights of Morrisania, tried to prepare an escape route for the besieged garrison and urged Magaw to hold out until nightfall, but the commander, finding his position untenable, personally surrendered to the Hessian Knyphausen. This was a tribute to Hessian accomplishments that day, for, along with two Highland regiments, the German troops had broken the back of the defense, charging up the hillside on the north and east side of the American works while Lord Percy's troops attacked the strong lines overlooking Harlem. The Hessians were reputed to have given no quarter.

The British lost 458 killed and wounded but took 2,800 prisoners. It was one of the costliest capitulations of the entire war. The numbers of the captured were swollen by troops who had been defending outlying areas and were forced by two British crossings of the Harlem River and naval movements to retire behind the fortifications.

1. A TRAITOR REVEALS THE PLANS OF FORT WASHINGTON

Diary of Captain Frederick Mackenzie.

3rd November. General Knyphausen, with six Hessian battalions which had taken post on the heights near Kingsbridge lately, passed over to this island yesterday, without a shot being fired at him, and encamped on the high grounds near Fort Washington. This movement completely cuts off all communication between the Rebel troops on this island, and those under Genl. Washington. . . .

In the several attacks lately made on the Rebels by the troops under Genl. Howe, very few prisoners have been taken. The soldiers generally made use of their bayonets. The 17th Dragoons are said to have behaved remarkably well, and to have taken several batteries. Preparations have been making for some time past by the Barrack Master General in New York for the reception of such troops as may be quartered there during the ensuing winter. Many of the public buildings have been and others are fitting up for hospitals; such as the College, the Bridewell, the Workhouse, the new hospital, and some of the meeting houses and churches. . . .

The first object at present is the reduction of Fort Washington, and thereby the complete possession of this island: after which Genl. Howe will probably detach a considerable part of the army to the southward, where operations may be carried on with advantage during the winter, or else penetrate into Jersey and endeavor to enlarge the quarters of the army in a province abounding with provisions, fuel and other necessary supplies. The extension of our quarters will also give the Loyalists an opportunity of declaring themselves, and circumscribe the resources of the enemy.

A man named Diamond, who says he was Ensign and Adjutant and acted as Major of Brigade in the Rebel Army, deserted yesterday from their advanced post. He says the Rebels remaining on this island amount to about 2000 men, who, if they are obliged to abandon their advanced works, are to retire into Fort Washington and defend it to the last extremity, having therein two months provisions, many cannon and plenty of ammunition. He says there are great dissensions in the Rebel Army, everybody finding fault with the mode of proceeding, and the inferior officers, even ensigns, insisting that, in such a cause, every man has a right to assist in council and to give his opinion. They are much distressed for clothing. The people from the Southern Colonies declare they will not go into New England, and the others that they will not march to the southward. If this account is true in any degree, they must soon go to pieces.

—MACKENZIE, Diary, I, 94-96.

2. A TRAITOR OWNS: "I SACRIFICED ALL I WAS WORTH"

William Demont to the Reverend Dr. Peters.

London, January 16, 1792

... On the 2nd of November 1776 I sacrificed all I was worth in the world to the service of my King and country, and joined the then Lord Percy, brought in with me the plans of Fort Washington, by which plans that fortress was taken by his Majesty's troops the 16 instant, together with 2700 prisoners and stores and ammunition to the amount of 1800 pounds. At the same time I may with justice affirm, from my knowledge of the works I saved the lives of many of his Majesty's subjects. These, Sir, are facts well known to every General Officer which was there.

—DEMONT, "Letter," Mag. of Am. Hist.

3. THE FALL OF THE OUTER DEFENSES

Alexander Graydon's account.

At ten o'clock in the morning, a large body of the enemy appeared on Haerlem plains, preceded by their field pieces, and advanced with their whole body towards a rocky point of the height, which skirted the plains in a southern direction from the first line, and at a considerable distance from it—and, commencing a brisk fire on the small work constructed there, drove out the party which held it, consisting of twenty men, and took possession of it, the men retiring with the picket guard to the first line. The enemy, having gained the heights, advanced in column on open ground towards the first line; whilst a party of their troops pushed forward and took possession of a small unoccupied work in front of the first line; from whence they opened their fire with some field pieces and a howitzer, upon the line, but without effect. When the column came within proper distance, a fire from the six-pounder was directed against it; on which, the whole column inclined to their left and took post behind a piece of woods, where they remained. As it was suspected that they would make an attempt on the right of the line, under cover of the wood, that part was strengthened.

Things remained in this position for about an hour and a half, during which interval General Washington, with Generals Putnam, Greene, Mercer and other principal officers, came over the North River from Fort Lee and crossed the island to Morris's house; whence they viewed the position of our troops and the operations of the enemy in that quarter. Having remained there a sufficient time to observe the arrangement that had been made for the defence of that part of the island, they retired by the way they came, and returned to Fort Lee, without making any change in the disposition of the troops or communicating any new orders. It is a fact not generally known that the British troops took possession of the very spot on which the Commander-in-chief, and the general officers with him, had stood, in fifteen minutes after they left it.

Colonel Rawlings was some time late in the morning attacked by the Hessians, whom he fought with great gallantry and effect, as they were climbing the heights, until the arms of the riflemen became useless from the foulness they contracted from the frequent repetition of their fire. From this incident, and the great superiority of the enemy, Colonel Rawlings was obliged to retire into the fort. The enemy, having gained the heights, immediately pushed forward towards the fort and took post behind a large store-house within a small distance of it.

But to return to what passed at the first line towards New York. Intelligence having been received by Colonel Cadwalader that the enemy were coming down Haerlem River in boats to land in his rear, he detached Captain Lenox with fifty men to oppose them, and, on farther information, a hundred more, with Captains Edwards and Tudor. This force, with the addition of about the same number from Fort Washington, arrived on the heights near Morris's house, early enough to fire on the enemy in their boats, which was done with such effect that about ninety were killed and wounded. The great superiority, however, of the enemy (their numbers amounting to about eight hundred men) prevailed over the bravery and good conduct of our troops, who, with some loss, retired to Fort Washington.

This body of the enemy immediately advanced and took possession of the grounds in advance of and a little below Morris's house, where some soldiers' huts had been left standing, not far from the second line. This position of the enemy being observed, it was expected they would march down and take possession of the second line (which, from the want of men, was entirely without defence) and thereby place the troops in the first line between two fires. This important movement did not, however, take place, owing, as was afterwards learned, to the apprehension they entertained that the enclosed bastions concealed therein a number of men whose fire would greatly annoy them. They hesitated; and this being perceived from the delay that took place, Colonel Cadwalader, to avoid the fatal consequences that must have resulted from the expected movement, immediately resolved to retire to the fort with the troops under his command; and as the measure required promptness and activity, he sent orders to the right and left of the line to move off towards Fort Washington, on the signal being given; which, after a proper interval of time, being made, the whole was put in motion (those on the left retiring obliquely towards the centre of the second line) past the second line, and when they came opposite to the body of the enemy posted at the huts, received their fire, which was returned in an irregular manner; and, pursuing the road which led to the fort, under the heights by the North River, arrived there with little or no loss.

The militia under Colonel Baxter, posted on Haerlem River, were attacked by the British guards and light infantry, who landed on the island of New York, protected by the fire from the work on the heights on the opposite side of the river. A short contest ensued; but our troops, overpowered by numbers, and leaving behind them Colonel Baxter who was killed by a British officer as he was bravely encouraging his men, retired to the fort. The guards and light infantry then crossed the island to the heights on the North River, a little below the fort, under which Colonel Cadwalader with his party, but a few minutes before, had passed in his way to the fort.

4. "THUS THE HESSIANS TOOK POSSESSION OF THE FORT"

Journal of John Reuber, Hessian soldier in the regiment of Colonel Johann Rall.

17 November, in the morning before day-break, all the regiments and corps were assembled, the Hessians on the right wing at the north haven; the English troops upon the left wing at the south haven. When it was now day and the Americans perceived us, but nothing more very plainly, at once these two ships of war, on both sides, made their master-strokes upon the fort, and we began at the same time on the land with cannon, and all the regiments marched forward up the hill and were obliged to creep along up the rocks, one falling down alive, another being shot dead. We were obliged to drag ourselves by the beech-tree bushes up the height where we could not really stand.

At last, however, we got about on the top of the hill where there were trees and great stones. We had a hard time of it there together. Because they now had no idea of yielding, Col. Rall gave the word of command, thus: "All that are my grenadiers, march forwards!" All the drummers struck up the march, the hautboy-players blew. At once all that were yet alive shouted, "Hurrah!" Immediately all were mingled together, Americans and Hessians. There was no more firing, but all ran forward pell-mell upon the fortress.

Before we came up, the Americans had a trench about the fortress, as soon as we were within which, the order came to halt. Then the Americans had a mind to run out through us, but then came the command: "Hold! you are all prisoners of war." The fort was at once demanded by Gen. V. Kniphausen. The Rebels were allowed two hours for capitulating; when they were expired, the fort was surrendered to General V. Kniphausen with all the munitions of war and provisions belonging thereto within and without the fort; all guns and arms were to be laid down, and when all this was done, Rall's regiment and the old Lossberg, being made to form into two lines facing each other, they were required to march out between the two regiments and deposit their guns and other weapons.

Then came the English and took them to New York into custody, and when the first transport was off, the second marched out of the citadel and was as strong as the first, and they also were conducted to New York into confinement. And when all this was got through with, it was night. Thus the Hessians took possession of the fort, and the rest marched again round to Kingsbridge into our old camp we had before stopped so long. Then came the order that the fort should be called Fort Kniphausen.

CHAPTER TWELVE

“Bagging the Fox”

THE TITLE OF this chapter comes from a nonchalant boast of Cornwallis that he would catch Washington in New Jersey as a hunter bags a fox. That proved easier said than done. The British strategy after the fall of Fort Washington was to trap the main Patriot army, which under the Fabian tactics of its commander had fallen back toward Philadelphia and held a thin line on the Delaware River. Then with lightning counterpunches at Trenton and Princeton Washington turned the tide of battle in the Jerseys and saved his army, which was to make its winter quarters in the hills around Morristown.

As we have already seen, Carleton had failed to push down from the North to Albany. The grand pincer operation had fizzled out, for, aside from New York City, Howe had little to show for his gigantic effort. In fact it could be persuasively argued that the Jersey campaign was a turning point in the war. Washington's main army had been saved and Patriot morale had been in large part restored.

The campaign in the Jerseys brings to the fore a number of personalities, among them the flashy and talented Cornet Banastre Tarleton of the British Light Dragoons, destined to become Britain's most formidable cavalry officer, and the willful and unstable Charles Lee, a former British army officer, who held the rank of major general and until the Jersey campaign enjoyed an inflated reputation. That so vacuous and untrustworthy a character as Lee could be seriously considered by many officers of the Patriot army as the man to supplant Washington speaks volumes for the low state of morale after the retreat from New York.

I. THE RETREAT TO NEW JERSEY

The fall of Fort Washington left Greene mortified. “I feel mad, vexed, sick, and sorry,” he wrote Henry Knox on November 17 from across the river at Fort Lee. “Happy should I be to see you. This is a most terrible event: its consequences are justly to be dreaded.” In a sober report to Congress written the previous day, Washington summed it up: “The loss of such a number of officers and men, many of whom have been trained with more than common attention, will I fear be severely felt. But when that of the arms and accoutrements is added, much more so, and must be a farther incentive to procure as considerable a supply as possible for the new troops, as soon as it can be done.”

On the stormy night of November 19, 1776, six thousand men under Cornwallis crossed the Hudson, and by morning had dragged their artillery to the top of the Palisades. Fort Lee was hurriedly evacuated. Greene had no time to remove the stores, only to save the gunpowder. Washington, who had brought over some of his troops from White Plains, ordered a retreat through flat country, though the army might be trapped between the Hackensack and Passaic rivers. Commented one British officer, "On the appearance of our troops, the rebels fled like scared rabbits. . . . They have left some poor pork, a few greasy proclamations, and some of that scoundrel Common Sense man's letters, which we can read at our leisure, now that we have got one of the 'impregnable redoubts' of Mr. Washington's to quarter in." Other British officers were equally jubilant, while the Americans realized that Philadelphia and the control of the Delaware seemed to be the new objective of Sir William. Were the British to move against Philadelphia, General Mifflin wrote Robert Morris on November 21, that city would "in a few hours after it shake to her centre."

The British advance soon bogged down. "As we go forward into the country the rebels fly before us," one British officer observed, "and when we come back they always follow us. 'Tis almost impossible to catch them. They will neither fight, nor totally run away, but they keep at such a distance that we are always a day's march from them. We seem to be playing at bo peep." The British and Hessian advance was accompanied by scenes of pillaging and criminal acts. "They to the disgrace of civilised nations ravish the fair sex, from the age of ten to seventy," one correspondent wrote Jefferson in December. Patriot morale seemed to one British traveler, Nicholas Cresswell, to be on the verge of collapse. "The politicians (or rather timid Whigs) give up all for lost," he commented, "and the Tories begin to exult. I am convinced that if General Howe will push to Philadelphia the day is his own."

1. THE FALL OF FORT LEE: "THEIR ARMY IS BROKEN TO PIECES"

Probably from Francis, Lord Rawdon, to Robert Auchmuty.

November 25, 1776

. . . This grand point [Fort Washington] being gained, by which York Island and a great part of the province was cleared from the rebels, General Howe, I think on the morning of the 20th instant, landed 5,000 men under the command of Lord Cornwallis up the North River on the Jersey shore, a few miles above the other famous fortification, called Fort Constitution or Fort Lee. His Lordship immediately marched to attack this place, and got to it by 1 o'clock the same day, but found it had been evacuated by the rebels so precipitately that the pots were left absolutely boiling on the fire, and the tables spread for dinner of some of their officers. In the fort they found but twelve men, who were all dead drunk. There were forty or fifty pieces of cannon found loaded, with two large iron sea mortars and one brass one, with a vast quantity of ammunition, provision and stores, with all their tents standing.

His Lordship, finding this, pressed forward as quick as he could toward Hackensack new bridge. But the people belonging to the fort had the heels of him. However, on the road he met with 3 or 4,000 fresh hands coming from Newark to assist in garrisoning the forts. To these gentry the troops distributed a couple of rounds, and set them a scampering, leaving behind them several brass field pieces and their baggage; and as they marched along, found the roads thick strewn with muskets, knapsacks, etc. But the number of cattle taken in the Hackinsack meadows, which had been driven from Pennsylvania and some parts of the Jerseys for the use of the grand rebel army, is truly astonishing, and amount to many thousands.

His Lordship's face seems to be set towards Philadelphia, where he will meet with no kind of opposition. I hope he will be at Amboy or Brunswick to-morrow or next day, if it will leave off raining. You see, my dear sir, that I have not been mistaken in my judgement of this people. The southern people will no more fight than the Yankees. The fact is that their army is broken all to pieces, and the spirits of their leaders and their abettors is also broken. However, I think one may venture to pronounce that it is well nigh over with them.

2. "I AM IN GREAT FEAR FOR OUR POLITICAL SALVATION"

Ebenezer Huntington, Captain in the Continental Army, to his grandfather, Jabez Huntington.

Peeks Kill, November 25, 1776

This comes by Mr Grover, who can better tell you news from this post than myself. The anxiety I am in for raising of a new army is not small but to parents I think I have an undoubted right to write freely. The present appearance is very gloomy, the British troops making head wherever they attempt. Our people, instead of behaving like brave men, behave like rascalls, and to add to that, it seems that the British troops had gone into the Jerseys, only to receive the submission of the whole country. People join them almost in captains' companies to take the oath of allegiance. Besides, those of the Militia who have been sent for our assistance leave us the minute their times are out and would not stay tho' their eternal salvation was to be forfeited if they went home. The persuasion of a Cisero would not any more effect their tarry than the Niagara Falls would the kindling of a fire. Besides the slow progress of a new army, it seems as though the few that remain till the first of January are to fall a sacrifice to the British savages.

Dear Father, no man unless on the spott can have a tolerable idea of it. Our stores lost without an exchange of a shott. A Hell itself could not furnish worse beings than subsist in the world where our army are now posted.

I am, Dear Sir, in Great Fear for our political salvation while I subscribe myself your dutiful son.

—HUNTINGTON, Letters Written During the Revolution, p. 53.

3. "AN INDECISIVE MIND IS ONE OF THE GREATEST MISFORTUNES TO AN ARMY"

A. ADJUTANT GENERAL JOSEPH REED TO GENERAL CHARLES LEE

Hackensack, November 21, 1776

The letter you will receive with this contains my sentiments with respect to your present station. But besides this I have some additional reasons for most earnestly wishing to have you where the principal scene of action is laid.

I do not mean to flatter, nor praise you at the expence of any other, but I confess I do think that it is entirely owing to you that this army and the liberties of America so far as they are dependant on it are not totally cut off. You have decision, a quality often wanting in minds otherwise valuable, and I ascribe to this an escape from York Island—from Kingsbridge and the Plains—and I have no doubt had you been here the garrison at Mount Washington would now have composed a part of this army. Under all these circumstances I confess I ardently wish to see you removed from a place where I think there will be little call for your judgment and experience to the place where they are like to be so necessary. Nor am I singular in my opinion—every gentleman of the family, the officers and soldiers generally have a confidence in you—the enemy constantly inquire where you are, and seem to me to be less confident when you are present.

Col. Cadwallader, thro a special indulgence on account of some civilities shewn by his family to Gen. Prescott, has been liberated from New-York without any parole. He informs that the enemy have a southern expedition in view—that they hold us very cheap in consequence of the late affair at Mount Washington where both the plan of defence and execution were contemptible—if a real defence of the lines was intended the number was too few; if the fort only, the garrison was too numerous by half. General Washington's own judgment, seconded by representations from us, would I believe have saved the men and their arms, but unluckily General Greene's judgment was contrary; this kept the general's mind in a state of suspense till the stroke was struck. Oh! General—an indecisive mind is one of the greatest misfortunes that can befall an army—how often have I lamented it this campaign.

All circumstances considered we are in a very awful and alarming state, one that requires the utmost wisdom and firmness of mind. As soon as the season will admit I think yourself and some others should go to Congress and form the plan of the new army—point out their defects to them and if possible prevail on them to bind their whole attention to this great object—even to the exclusion of every other. If they will not or cannot do this, I fear all our exertions will be vain in this part of the world. Foreign assistance is soliciting but we cannot expect they will fight the whole battle—but artillery and artillerists must be had, if possible.

I intended to have said more but the express is waiting—and I must conclude with my clear and explicit opinion that your presence is of the last importance.

—REED, "Letter," N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., V, 293-294.

B. GENERAL CHARLES LEE TO JOSEPH REED.

Camp, November 24, 1776

I received your most obliging, flattering letter—lament with you that fatal indecision of mind which in war is a much greater disqualification than stupidity or even want of personal courage. Accident may put a decisive blunderer in the right—but eternal defeat and miscarriage must attend the man of the best parts if cursed with indecision. The General recommends in so pressing a manner as almost to amount to an order to bring over the Continental troops under my command—which recommendation or order throws me into the greatest dilemma from sev'ral considerations. Part of the troops are so ill furnished with shoes and stockings, blankets, etc., that they must inevitably perish in this wretched weather. Part of 'em are to be dismissed on Saturday next and this part is the best accoutred for service.

What shelter we are to find on the other side the river is a serious consideration: but these considerations should not sway me; my reason for not having marched already is that we have just received intelligence that Rogers's corps, the Light Horse, part of the Highlanders and another brigade lye in so exposed a situation as to give the fairest opportunity of being carried off. I should have attempted it last night but the rain was too violent, and when our pieces are wet you know our troops are hors de combat. This night I hope will be better.

If we succeed we shall be well compensated for the delay. We shall likewise be able in our return to clear the country of all the articles wanted by the enemy. In every view therefore the expedition must answer. . . . I only wait myself for this business I mention of Rogers and Co. being over—shall then fly to you—for to confess a truth I really think our Chief will do better with me than without me.

—CHARLES LEE, "Letter," N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., V, 305-306.

4. "BY RETREATING I SHALL LULL THEM INTO SECURITY"

George Washington to General Charles Lee, an intercepted letter found among the archives at Marburg, Germany.

Brunswick, 30th of November, 1776

The movements of the enemy are, since I wrote you from Newark, of such a nature, as things stand at present, sincerely to be wished for. I have feared that they would take Newark, Elizabeth Town and Amboy for their winter quarters in order to undertake from these places early in the spring an attack on Philadelphia and at the same time having a favourable season ahead that they would make a diversion on the Delaware river with their fleet. The advantages they have gained over us in the past have made them so proud and sure of success that they are determined to go to Philadelphia this winter. I have positive information that this is a fact and because the term of service of the light troops of Jersey and Maryland are ended they anticipate the weakness of our army. Should they now really risk this undertaking then there is a great probability that they will pay dearly for it for I shall continue to retreat before them so as to lull them into security.

—STRYKER, Battles of Trenton and Princeton, pp. 326-327.

5. THE FLIGHT OF CONGRESS TO BALTIMORE

General Oliver Wolcott, delegate to Congress from Connecticut, to his wife.
Philadelphia, December 13, 1776

The 11th in the evening a detachment of the enemy took possession of Burlington, about 20 miles from this city on the Jersey shore. The rest of their army are at Trenton, and upon the banks of the river above it; their numbers are uncertain, but are computed about twelve thousand, and as their designs are undoubtedly to gain possession of this city, the Congress, upon the advice of Genls Putnam and Mifflin (who are now here to provide for the protection of the place) as well as the result of their own opinion, have adjourned themselves to Baltimore in Maryland, about 110 miles from this city, as it was judged that the Council of America ought not to sit in a place liable to be interrupted by the rude disorder of arms, so that I am at this moment going forward for that place. Whether the army will succeed in their cruel designs against this city must be left to time to discover. Congress have ordered the General to defend it to the last extremity, and God grant that he may be successful in his exertions!

Whatever event may take place, the American cause will be supported to the last, and I trust in God that it will succeed. The Grecian, Roman and Dutch States were in their infancy reduced to the greatest distress, infinitely beyond what we have yet experienced. The God who governs the universe and who holds empires in His hand, can with the least effort of His will, grant us all that security, opulence and power which they have enjoyed. . . .

Gen. Howe has lately published a proclamation abusing the Congress as having sinister designs upon the people and has offered, to such as will accept of pardon upon an unlimited submission, "Royal Forgiveness." But who is base enough to wish to have a precarious care dependent upon the caprice of power, unrestrained by any law and governed by the dangerous thirst of avarice and ambition?

My best love to my children and friends. May the Almighty ever have you and them in His protection!

—JOHNSTON, Campaign of 1776, II, 147-148.

6. "A CERTAIN GREAT MAN IS MOST DAMNABLY DEFICIENT"

General Charles Lee to General Horatio Gates, written the day of Lee's capture.

Basking Ridge, N. J., December 13, 1776

The ingenious manoeuvre of Fort Washington has unhinged the goodly fabrick we had been building. There never was so damned a stroke. Entre nous, a certain great man is most damnably deficient. He has thrown me into a situation where I have my choice of difficulties. If I stay in this Province I risk myself and army, and if I do not stay the Province is lost for ever. I have neither guides, cavalry, medicines, money, shoes or stockings. I must act with the greatest circumspection. Tories are in my front, rear and on my flanks. The mass of the people is strangely contaminated.

In short unless something which I do not expect turns up we are lost. Our counsels have been weak to the last degree. As to what relates to yourself, if you think you can be in time to aid the General I would have you by all means go. You will at least save your army. It is said that the Whigs are determined to set fire to Philadelphia. If they strike this decisive stroke the day will be our own, but unless it is done all chance of liberty in any part of the globe is forever vanished.

Adieu, my dear friend. God bless you!

—CHARLES LEE, "Letter," N. Y. Hist. Soc. Coll., V, 348.

7. THE CAPTURE OF GENERAL CHARLES LEE

A. "A MOST MIRACULOUS EVENT"

Banastre Tarleton to his mother.

Prince's Town, December 18, 1776

My dear Madam

Our correspondence is totally stopt, so few ships go to and come from England on acct. of the quantity of American privateers that this continent seems utterly secluded from Great Britain.

You will with pleasure, if you receive it, read this letter. Lieutenant General Earl Cornwallis, under whose command the King's army has penetrated into the Jerseys as far as the River Delaware, being ignorant of General Lee's motions and situation, gave orders on the 11th inst. for a party of the Queen's Light Dragoons, consisting of a captain, 2 subalterns and 25 privates, to be ready to march in expedition order the next morning. Colonel Harcourt who was with the regiment received his private orders from Lord Cornwallis, together with Captain Eustace, his Lordship's aid de camp, who attended us on this expedition.

Our first day's march was 18 miles, but barren of incidents. We took up our quarters at night at Hillsborough upon the River Millstone. A battalion of the 71st covered us at that place. Our house caught fire at 1 o'clock in the morning and burnt to the ground. We escaped without loss or damage—we bedded ourselves in straw till 5 o'clock. We then received orders to march. Col. Harcourt gave me the advanced guard, consisting of 6 men: a circumstance I ever shall esteem as one of the most fortunate of my life. We marched by different and cross roads towards Maurice Town. We had not proceeded above 14 miles before the advanced guard discovered some and took one Rebel in arms. We marched 2 miles forward, then Colonel Harcourt found by some people that General Lee was not above 4 or 5 miles distant from the detachment, and at the same time heard that our retreat was cut off by the road we had come. He detached Captain Nash with 4 dragoons back to prove the truth of the last information. Colonel Harcourt then ordered me to advance. We trotted on about 3 miles when my advanced guard seized 2 sentrys without firing a gun.

The dread of instant death obliged these fellows to inform me, to the best of my knowledge, of the situation of General Lee. They told us he was about a mile off, that his guard was not very large and that he was about half a mile in the rear of his army. These men were so confused that they gave us but an imperfect idea where General Lee was. Colonel Harcourt immediately detached me with 2 men only to the top of an eminence in the road, to get what intelligence I could, and if much fired upon, immediately to retreat upon him. In going quick to the ground I observed a Yankee light-horseman, at whom I rushed and made prisoner. I brought him in to Colonel Harcourt; the fear of the sabre extorted great intelligence, and he told us he had just left General Lee from whom he had an express to carry to General Sullivan at Pukamin. He could not satisfy me exactly as to the strength of General Lee's guard, but confirmed the account of the other 2 prisoners as to his situation.

He said he thought his guard did not consist of above 30 men. He pointed out to us the house where he had left General Lee and mentioned that he was going to move directly.

Colonel Harcourt called to Eustace, to know whether he thought we were strong enough. Eustace replied in the affirmative. Without further consultation I was ordered to lead on my advanced guard which consisted of only 5 men as quick as possible. I went on at full speed, when perceiving two sentrys at a door and a loaded waggon I pushed at them, making all the noise I could. The sentrys were struck with a panic, dropped their arms and fled. I ordered my men to fire into the house thro' every window and door, and cut up as many of the guard as they could. An old woman upon her knees begged for life and told me General Lee was in the house.

This assurance gave me pleasure. I carried on my attack with all possible spirit and surrounded the house, tho' fired upon in front, flank and rear. General Lee's aid de camp, 2 French colonels and some of the guard kept up a fire for about 8 minutes, which we silenced. I fired twice through the door of the house and then addressed myself to this effect: "I knew Genl. Lee was in the house, that if he would surrender himself, he and his attendants should be safe, but if my summons was not complied with immediately, the house should be burnt and every person without exception should be put to the sword."

At this instant I was called by one of my men to the back door, my attention being directly engaged by his saying that Genl. Lee was escaping that way and I galloped to the spot. The French colonels, one of the aid de camp (the other being shot) and some of the guard attempted to retreat sword in hand. We took one colonel prisoner, the rest were killed or wounded. Genl. Lee surrendered himself to the sentry I had placed at the front door, whilst we were employed as above. The prisoner was led to Col. Harcourt, who was silencing the fires in my rear and flanks whilst I carried on the attack upon Genl. Lee's quarters with the advanced guard only. Col. Harcourt placed his noble prisoner upon a horse and led him off by a different road from that which we had come with all possible expedition.

The bugle horn was then sounded. I brought up the rear of the men and the French colonel. This attack which continued in the whole about 15 minutes proved fatal to none of the officers or dragoons. One horse's leg which was slightly grazed and one saddle which was shot through the pommel were the only damages we sustained. We retreated afterwards 13 miles thro' an enemys country without any accident. We then forded a river, approached Hillsborough and gave each other congratulations with every symptom of joy.

Captain Nash whom I mentioned being detached did not join us again till Genl. Lee was our prisoner. He was beat back from the place where we had passed in the morning and where they meant to cut off our retreat. He lost a servant and a horse. The party returned safe.

This is a most miraculous event—it appears like a dream. We conducted Genl. Lee and the French col. to Lord Cornwallis at Penning. Our day's march only exceeded 60 miles.

Genl. Lee is sent prisoner to Brunswick. Colonel Harcourt's whole conduct was masterly—it deserves every applause. Present my love, comps., etc. (I shall tire you if I write any more).

I forgot to tell you that this coup de main has put an end to the campaign. We have not yet crossed the Delaware. The Queen's Regt. of Lt. Dragoons are cantoned off Princes Town and Brunswick; at the former exists one who will always be proud to subscribe himself

B. "HERE IS THE GENERAL. HE HAS SURRENDERED"

Memoirs of Captain James Wilkinson of the Continental Army.

General Lee wasted the morning in altercation with certain militia corps who were of his command, particularly the Connecticut light horse, several of whom appeared in large full-bottomed perukes, and were treated very irreverently; the call of the adjutant general for orders also occupied some of his time, and we did not sit down to breakfast before 10 o'clock. General Lee was engaged in answering General Gates's letter, and I had risen from the table and was looking out of an end window down a lane about one hundred yards in length which led to the house from the main road, when I discovered a party of British dragoons turn a corner of the avenue at a full charge.

Startled at this unexpected spectacle, I exclaimed, "Here, Sir, are the British cavalry!"

"Where?" replied the general, who had signed his letter in the instant.

"Around the house," for they had opened files and encompassed the building.

General Lee appeared alarmed, yet collected, and his second observation marked his self-possession: "Where is the guard?—damn the guard, why don't they fire?" and after a momentary pause, he turned to me and said, "Do, Sir, see what has become of the guard."

The women of the house at this moment entered the room and proposed to him to conceal himself in a bed, which he rejected with evident disgust. I caught up my pistols which lay on the table, thrust the letter he had been writing into my pocket, and passed into a room at the opposite end of the house, where I had seen the guard in the morning. Here I discovered their arms; but the men were absent. I stepped out of the door and perceived the dragoons chasing them in different directions, and receiving a very uncivil salutation, I returned into the house.

Too inexperienced immediately to penetrate the motives of this enterprize, I considered the rencontre accidental, and from the terrific tales spread over the country of the violence and barbarity of the enemy, I believed it to be a wanton murdering party, and determined not to die without company. I accordingly sought a position where I could not be approached by more than one person at a time, and with a pistol in each hand I awaited the expected search, resolved to shoot the first and the second person who might appear, and then to appeal to my sword. I did not remain long in this unpleasant situation, but was apprised of the object of the incursion by the very audible declaration, "If the general does not surrender in five minutes, I will set fire to the house;" which after a short pause was repeated with a solemn oath; and within two minutes I heard it proclaimed, "Here is the general. He has surrendered." A general shout ensued, the trumpet sounded the assembly, and the unfortunate Lee mounted on my horse, which stood ready at the door, was hurried off in triumph, bareheaded, in his slippers and blanket coat, his collar open, and his shirt very much soiled from several days' use.

8. THE LOW EBB OF THE AMERICAN CAUSE

George Washington to Lund Washington.

Ten miles above the Falls [of the Delaware],

December 17, 1776

I have since [his letter of Dec. 10] moved up to this place, to be more convenient to our great and extensive defences of this river. Hitherto, by our destruction of the boats, and vigilance in watching the fords of the river above the falls (which are now rather high), we have prevented them from crossing; but how long we shall be able to do it God only knows, as they are still hovering about the river. And if every thing else fails, will wait till the 1st of January, when there will be no other men to oppose them but militia, none of which but those from Philadelphia . . . are yet come (although I am told some are expected from the back countries). When I say none but militia, I am to except the Virginia regiments and the shattered remains of Smallwood's, which, by fatigue, want of clothes, etc., are reduced to nothing—Weedon's, which was the strongest, not having more than between one hundred and thirty to one hundred and forty men fit for duty, the rest being in the hospitals.

The unhappy policy of short enlistments and a dependence upon militia will, I fear, prove the downfall of our cause, though early pointed out with an almost prophetic spirit! Our cause has also received a severe blow in the captivity of Gen. Lee. Unhappy man! Taken by his own imprudence, going three or four miles from his own camp, and within twenty of the enemy, notice of which by a rascally Tory was given a party of light horse, seized him in the morning after travelling all night, and carried him off in high triumph and with every mark of indignity, not even suffering him to get his hat or surtout coat. The troops that were under his command are not yet come up with us, though they, I think, may be expected to-morrow.

A large part of the Jerseys have given every proof of disaffection that they can do, and this part of Pennsylvania are equally inimical. In short, your imagination can scarce extend to a situation more distressing than mine. Our only dependence now is upon the speedy enlistment of a new army. If this fails, I think the game will be pretty well up, as, from disaffection and want of spirit and fortitude, the inhabitants, instead of resistance, are offering submission and taking protection from Gen. Howe in Jersey.

9. "THESE ARE THE TIMES THAT TRY MEN'S SOULS"

Joining the Patriot army, Tom Paine took part in the retreat across New Jersey. At Newark he wrote the first of his Crisis papers, according to tradition with a drumhead for a desk and a flickering campfire for light. Ordered read to the troops, the pamphlet resolved by its eloquent patriotism the hesitation of many in and out of the army. The Crisis papers continued to be written down to 1783. Paine therein proposed that the property of Loyalists be confiscated to provide a base for Continental currency, advocated effective fiscal measures, the imposing of oaths to the new government, and a strong federal union. Here are the opening paragraphs of the first of Thomas Paine's pamphlets collectively entitled The American Crisis, published on December 19, 1776.

These are the times that try men's souls. The summer soldier and the sunshine patriot will, in this crisis, shrink from the service of their country; but he that stands it now deserves the love and thanks of man and woman. Tyranny, like hell, is not easily conquered; yet we have this consolation with us, that the harder the conflict, the more glorious the triumph. What we obtain too cheap, we esteem too lightly: it is dearness only that gives every thing its value. Heaven knows how to put a proper price upon its goods; and it would be strange indeed if so celestial an article as FREEDOM should not be highly rated. Britain, with an army to enforce her tyranny, has declared that she has a right (not only to TAX) but "to BIND us in ALL CASES WHATSOEVER," and if being bound in that manner is not slavery, then is there not such a thing as slavery upon earth. Even the expression is impious; for so unlimited a power can belong only to God.

Whether the independence of the continent was declared too soon, or delayed too long, I will not now enter into as an argument; my own simple opinion is that had it been eight months earlier, it would have been much better. We did not make a proper use of last winter, neither could we, while we were in a dependent state. However, the fault, if it were one, was all our own; we have none to blame but ourselves. But no great deal is lost yet. All that Howe has been doing for this month past is rather a ravage than a conquest, which the spirit of the Jerseys, a year ago, would have quickly repulsed, and which time and a little resolution will soon recover.

I have as little superstition in me as any man living, but my secret opinion has ever been, and still is, that God Almighty will not give up a people to military destruction, or leave them unsupportedly to perish, who have so earnestly and so repeatedly sought to avoid the calamities of war by every decent method which wisdom could invent. Neither have I so much of the infidel in me as to suppose that He has relinquished the government of the world and given us up to the care of devils; and as I do not, I cannot see on what grounds the king of Britain can look up to heaven for help against us: a common murderer, a highwayman or a house-breaker has as good a pretence as he.

'Tis surprising to see how rapidly a panic will sometimes run through a country. All nations and ages have been subject to them: Britain has trembled like an ague at the report of a French fleet of flat-bottomed boats; and in the fourteenth century the whole English army, after ravaging the kingdom of France, was driven back like men petrified with fear; and this brave exploit was performed by a few broken forces collected and headed by a woman, Joan of Arc. Would that heaven might inspire some Jersey maid to spirit up her countrymen and save her fair fellow sufferers from ravage and ravishment! Yet panics, in some cases, have their uses; they produce as much good as hurt. Their duration is always short; the mind soon grows through them and acquires a firmer habit than before. But their peculiar advantage is that they are the touchstones of sincerity and hypocrisy, and bring things and men to light which might otherwise have lain forever undiscovered. In fact, they have the same effect on secret traitors which an imaginary apparition would have upon a private murderer. They sift out the hidden thoughts of man and hold them up in public to the world. Many a disguised tory has lately shown his head, that shall penitentially solemnize with curses the day on which Howe arrived upon the Delaware.

As I was with the troops at Fort Lee and marched with them to the edge of Pennsylvania, I am well acquainted with many circumstances which those who live at a distance know but little or nothing of. Our situation there was exceedingly cramped, the place being a narrow neck of land between the North River and the Hackensack. Our force was inconsiderable, being not one fourth so great as Howe could bring against us. We had no army at hand to have relieved the garrison, had we shut ourselves up and stood on our defence. Our ammunition, light artillery and the best part of our stores had been removed, on the apprehension that Howe would endeavor to penetrate the Jerseys, in which case Fort Lee could be of no use to us; for it must occur to every thinking man, whether in the army or not, that these kind of field forts are only for temporary purposes, and last in use no longer than the enemy directs his force against the particular object which such forts are raised to defend.

Such was our situation and condition at Fort Lee on the morning of the 20th of November, when an officer arrived with information that the enemy with 200 boats had landed about seven miles above. Major General Green, who commanded the garrison, immediately ordered them under arms, and sent express to General Washington at the town of Hackensack, distant by way of the ferry six miles.

Our first object was to secure the bridge over the Hackensack, which laid up the river between the enemy and us, about six miles from us, and three from them. General Washington arrived in about three quarters of an hour, and marched at the head of the troops towards the bridge, which place I expected we should have a brush for; however, they did not choose to dispute it with us, and the greatest part of our troops went over the bridge, the rest over the ferry, except some which passed at a mill on a small creek, between the bridge and the ferry, and made their way through some marshy grounds up to the town of Hackensack, and there passed the river. We brought off as much baggage as the wagons could contain, the rest was lost. The simple object was to bring off the garrison and march them on till they could be strengthened by the Jersey or Pennsylvania militia, so as to be enabled to make a stand. We staid four days at Newark, collected our outposts with some of the Jersey militia, and marched out twice to meet the enemy, on being informed that they were advancing, though our numbers were greatly inferior to theirs.

Howe, in my little opinion, committed a great error in generalship in not throwing a body of forces off from Staten Island through Amboy, by which means he might have seized all our stores at Brunswick and intercepted our march into Pennsylvania; but if we believe the power of hell to be limited, we must likewise believe that their agents are under some providential controul.

I shall not now attempt to give all the particulars of our retreat to the Delaware; suffice it for the present to say that both officers and men, though greatly harassed and fatigued, frequently without rest, covering or provision, the inevitable consequences of a long retreat, bore it with a manly and martial spirit. All their wishes centred in one, which was that the country would turn out and help them to drive the enemy back.

Voltaire has remarked that King William never appeared to full advantage but in difficulties and in action; the same remark may be made on General Washington, for the character fits him. There is a natural firmness in some minds which cannot be unlocked by trifles, but which, when unlocked, discovers a cabinet of fortitude; and I reckon it among those kind of public blessings, which we do not immediately see, that God hath blessed him with uninterrupted health, and given him a mind that can even flourish upon care.

II. COUNTERATTACK: THE VICTORY AT TRENTON

Since the troops sent from New York to reinforce him had in most cases not re-enlisted and their service would expire the first of the year, Washington in desperation realized that a blow must be struck at once. By mid-December the British had gone into winter quarters. Howe's forces had spread themselves very thin, extending from Perth Amboy and New Brunswick as far south as Burlington and Mount Holly. General Grant, in command of the British forces in New Jersey, saw little danger from the American army which had retreated across the Delaware to Pennsylvania. Writing on December 21 to Lieutenant Colonel Rall in command of the Hessian garrison at Trenton, he stated that the American army was "almost naked, dying of cold, without blankets, and very ill supplied with provisions." On this east side of the Delaware "they have not three hundred men."

This optimistic note left the nervous Rall ill-prepared for the blow that followed. Washington decided on a surprise attack at Trenton.

He proposed to cross the Delaware above Trenton with about one half of his command, while General Erwing and Colonel Cadwalader should cross opposite Trenton and Bristol, cut Rall's line of retreat and prevent Colonel Carl von Donop, Rall's superior in command of the forces in Southern Jersey, from bringing reinforcements up from Mount Holly. Because of the snow and ice Cadwalader found he could not move his artillery to the other side of the river and abandoned his part of the attack.

Jagged cakes of ice, strong winds and snow and sleet made the Christmas night crossing of the Delaware a trying operation. No episode of the war is perhaps so familiar to Americans, in large part owing to the industry of Emmanuel Leutze, who put the story down on canvas at Düsseldorf on the Rhine some 60 years after the event and managed to capture the spirit of 'seventy-six even though he was inaccurate in his details. Glover's Marbleheaders, again at the oars as they had been in the retreat from Long Island, got the troops safely across the river. Sullivan entered Trenton from the northwest, Greene from the north. Advancing early in the morning of the twenty-sixth through a violent snow and hailstorm, both forces attacked virtually simultaneously. The Hessians were caught by surprise. Hand's riflemen kept them from crossing the bridge over the Assanpink Creek. Rall was mortally wounded and his command quickly surrendered. Almost a thousand prisoners were taken in fighting that lasted three quarters of an hour. The Americans suffered five casualties—two men frozen to death on the march, two officers and one private wounded. One of the officers was a future President, Lieutenant James Monroe.

For the Americans Trenton was like an eleventh-hour reprieve. The Patriot cause, which had seemed desperate, now took on new life and hope. As Thomas Rodney wrote, a few days after Trenton, "Never were men in higher spirits than our whole army is." Washington had seized the offensive, and was to hold it for some time; the murmurings against his Fabian tactics died down.

1. THE BRITISH ARE BUOYED BY FAVORABLE INTELLIGENCE

Intelligence by Mr. Hovenden, who left Bucks County December 20, 1776.

That the main body of the rebel army lies at Beaumonts between Telits and Bakers Ferry about 11 miles above Trenton Ferry commanded by General Washington and Lord Stirling. That a party of about 3000 men under Gen. Sullivan had joined Gen. Washington and it was said they were immediately to march and make their quarters at Newtown. That of this number near 200 sick and invalids were arrived at the hospital at Newtown. A party [of] 200 or 300 men are stationed at Robinsons Ferry about 7 miles above Beaumonts. Don't know of any other party higher up the river. That General Washington had with him 6 eight-pounders but were removed from thence, know not where. There are opposite to Slacks Island about 5 miles below Beaumonts 4 eight-pounders. That below Slack's Island and at Yardley's are about 600 men, commanded by Gen. Dickinson with two pieces of cannon. Gen. Mercer was there but often shifts his quarters. That upon the most diligent inquiry and best intelligence he could procure, General Washington's whole army did not consist of more than 8000 men. That General Sullivan went to Philadelphia on the 15th inst from Washington's quarters. That General Gates had not passed the river on Thursday last, but was informed, he was coming forward with about 500 men.

Intelligence by Mr. Haines, a Burlington County Loyalist.

Bazilla Haines, sent out to procure intelligence on the 21st of Dec., 1776, arrived at Mount Holly in the night and lodged in the Rebel camp there. Was informed they had only two field pieces, which he thinks were three-pounders as he perceived them at the church. That all the troops were drawn up in his view, that he walked round them and thinks there were not above eight hundred, near one half boys and all of them militia, a very few Pennsylvanians excepted. That he knew a great many of them, who came from Gloucester, Egg Harbour, Penns Neck and Cohansey. They were commanded by Col. Griffin.

Intelligence by Samuel Brown, who left Bucks County on December 22, 1776.

That the troops opposite to Trenton and Bordentown are in number about 600 men commanded by General Ewing. Of these men there is a guard of 25 men opposite Mr. Field's, about 50 at Mr. Riche's opposite to Bordentown, about half a mile nearer Trenton about thirty; the rest lay above between Riche's and Trenton, and over against Trenton there are two pieces of cannon. That Gen. Washingtons whole army does not consist of more than 8000 men, about 5000 of them troops formerly enlisted, partly brought from Jersey to Washington and partly by Sullivan; the rest are new raised militia. That the time of enlistment of Ewing's brigade of 600 men all expire the first of Jan. next and that the officers and men and Gen. Ewing himself has declared they will serve no longer. That the New England troops who came with General Washington it is generally believed from their declaration that they will not serve longer than the term of their enlistment, which expires also the first of Jan'y next; that these troops compose the main part of Washington's army. Mr. Hovenden further says that there are four regiments or rather the remains of them, whose time expires the 1st of Jan'y and that he was informed by their principal officers that they would serve no longer out of their own Province.

2. "WILL IT NOT BE POSSIBLE TO MAKE A DIVERSION AT TRENTON?"

Colonel Joseph Reed to George Washington.

Bristol, December 22, 1776

We are all of opinion, my dear General, that something must be attempted to revive our expiring credit, give our cause some degree of reputation, and prevent a total depreciation of the Continental money, which is coming on very fast; that even a failure cannot be more fatal than to remain in our present situation; in short, some enterprise must be undertaken in our present circumstances or we must give up the cause. In a little time the Continental Army will be dissolved. The militia must be taken before their spirits and patience are exhausted; and the scattered, divided state of the enemy affords us a fair opportunity to trying what our men will do when called to an offensive attack. Will it not be possible, my dear General, for your troops, or such part of them as can act with advantage, to make a diversion, or something more, at or about Trenton? The greater the alarm, the more likely the success will attend the attacks. If we could possess ourselves again of New Jersey, or any considerable part of it, the effects would be greater than if we had never left it.

Allow me to hope that you will consult your own good judgment and spirit, and not let the goodness of your heart subject you to the influence of opinions from men in every respect your inferiors. Something must be attempted before the sixty days expire which the commissioners have allowed; for, however many affect to despise it, it is evident that a very serious attention is paid to it, and I am confident that unless some more favourable appearance attends our arms and cause before that time, a very large number of the militia officers here will follow the example of those of Jersey and take benefit from it. I will not disguise my own sentiments, that our cause is desperate and hopeless if we do not take the opportunity of the collection of troops at present to strike some stroke. Our affairs are hastening fast to ruin if we do not retrieve them by some happy event. Delay with us is now equal to a total defeat. Be not deceived, my dear General, with small, flattering appearances; we must not suffer ourselves to be lulled into security and inaction because the enemy does not cross the river. It is but a reprieve; the execution is the more certain, for I am very clear that they can and will cross the river in spite of any opposition we can give them.

Pardon the freedom I have used. The love of my country, a wife and four children in the enemy's hands, the respect and attachment I have to you, the ruin and poverty that must attend me and thousands of others will plead my excuse for so much freedom.

Your obedient and affectionate humble servant

JOSEPH REED

3. "CHRISTMAS NIGHT IS THE TIME FIXED UPON"

George Washington to Joseph Reed "or, in his absence, to John Cadwalader, Esq., only, at Bristol."

23 December 1776

The bearer is sent down to know whether your plan was attempted last night and if not to inform you, that Christmas-day at night, one hour before day is the time fixed upon for our attempt on Trenton. For Heaven's sake keep this to yourself, as the discovery of it may prove fatal to us, our numbers, sorry am I to say, being less than I had any conception of: but necessity, dire necessity, will, nay must, justify an attempt. Prepare, and, in concert with Griffin, attack as many of their posts as you possibly can with a prospect of success: the more we can attack at the same instant, the more confusion we shall spread and greater good will result from it. If I had not been fully convinced before of the enemy's designs, I have now ample testimony of their intentions to attack Philadelphia, so soon as the ice will afford the means of conveyance. . . .

We could not ripen matters for our attack before the time mentioned in the first part of this letter: so much out of sorts and so much in want of everything are the troops under Sullivan, etc. Let me know by a careful express the plan you are to pursue. The letter herewith sent, forward on to Philadelphia: I could wish it to be in time for the Southern post's departure, which will be I believe by eleven o'clock tomorrow.

I am, dear Sir, Your obedient servant

GEO. WASHINGTON

P.S.—I have ordered our men to be provided with three days' provisions ready cooked, with which and their blankets they are to march: for if we are successful, which Heaven grant and the circumstances favor, we may push on. I shall direct every ferry and ford to be well guarded, and not a soul suffered to pass without an officer's going down with the permit. Do the same with you.

4. "FOR GOD'S SAKE, KEEP BY YOUR OFFICERS!"

Memoirs of Elisha Bostwick of the Seventh Connecticut Regiment.

[O]ur army passed through Bethlehem and Moravian town and so on to the Delaware which we crossed 9 miles north of Trenton and encamped on the Pennsylvania side and there remained to the 24th December. [O]ur whole army was then set on motion and toward evening began to recross the Delaware but by obstructions of ice in the river did not all get across till quite late in the evening, and all the time a constant fall of snow with some rain, and finally our march began with the torches of our field pieces smuck in the exhalters. [They] sparkled and blazed in the storm all night and about day light a halt was made, at which time his Excellency and aids came near to front on the side of the path where the soldiers stood.

I heard his Excellency as he was coming on speaking to and encouraging the soldiers. The words he spoke as he passed by where I stood and in my hearing were these:

"Soldiers, keep by your officers. For God's sake, keep by your officers!" Spoke in a deep and solemn voice.

While passing a slanting, slippery bank his Excellency's horse's hind feet both slipped from under him, and he seized his horse's mane and the horse recovered. Our horses were then unharnessed and the artillery men prepared. We marched on and it was not long before we heard the outcries of the enemy both on the road we were in and the eastern road, and their outposts retreated firing, and our army, then with a quick step pushing on upon both roads, at the same time entered the town. Their artillery taken, they resigned with little opposition, about nine hundred all Hessians, with 4 brass field pieces; the remainder crossing the bridge at the lower end of the town escaped. . . .

Marched the next day with our prisoners back to an encampment. I will here make a few remarks as to the personal appearance of the Hessians. They are of a moderate stature, rather broad shoulders, their limbs not of equal proportion, light complexion with a bluish tinge, hair cut as tight to the head as possible, sticking straight back like the handle of an iron skillet. Their uniform blue with black facings, brass drums which made a tinkling sound, their flag or standard of the richest black silk and the devices upon it and the lettering in gold leaf. . . .

When crossing the Delaware with the prisoners in flat bottom boats the ice continually stuck to the boats, driving them down stream; the boatmen endeavoring to clear off the ice pounded the boat, and stamping with their feet, beckoned to the prisoners to do the same, and they all set to jumping at once with their cues flying up and down, soon shook off the ice from the boats, and the next day recrossed the Delaware again and returned back to Trenton, and there on the first of January 1777 our years service expired, and then by the pressing solicitation of his Excellency a part of those whose time was out consented on a ten dollar bounty to stay six weeks longer, and altho desirous as others to return home, I engaged to stay that time and made every exertion in my power to make as many of the soldiers stay with me as I could, and quite a number did engage with me who otherwise would have went home. . . .

—BOSTWICK, Memoirs.

5. "PROVIDENCE SEEMED TO HAVE SMILED UPON THIS ENTERPRISE"

Henry Knox to his wife.

Delaware River, near Trenton, December 28, 1776

. . . Trenton is an open town, situated nearly on the banks of the Delaware, accessible on all sides. Our army was scattered along the river for nearly twenty-five miles. Our intelligence agreed that the force of the enemy in Trenton was from two to three thousand, with about six field cannon, and that they were pretty secure in their situation, and that they were Hessians—no British troops. A hardy design was formed of attacking the town by storm. Accordingly a part of the army, consisting of about 2,500 or 3,000, passed the river on Christmas night, with almost infinite difficulty, with eighteen field-pieces. The floating ice in the river made the labor almost incredible. However, perseverance accomplished what at first seemed impossible. About two o'clock the troops were all on the Jersey side; we then were about nine miles from the object. The night was cold and stormy; it hailed with great violence; the troops marched with the most profound silence and good order.

They arrived by two routes at the same time, about half an hour after daylight, within one mile of the town. The storm continued with great violence, but was in our backs, and consequently in the faces of our enemy. About half a mile from the town was an advanced guard on each road, consisting of a captain's guard. These we forced, and entered the town with them pell-mell; and here succeeded a scene of war of which I had often conceived, but never saw before.

The hurry, fright and confusion of the enemy was [not] unlike that which will be when the last trump shall sound. They endeavored to form in streets, the heads of which we had previously the possession of with cannon and howitzers; these, in the twinkling of an eye, cleared the streets. The backs of the houses were resorted to for shelter. These proved ineffectual: the musketry soon dislodged them. Finally they were driven through the town into an open plain beyond. Here they formed in an instant.

During the contest in the streets measures were taken for putting an entire stop to their retreat by posting troops and cannon in such passes and roads as it was possible for them to get away by. The poor fellows after they were formed on the plain saw themselves completely surrounded; the only resource left was to force their way through numbers unknown to them. The Hessians lost part of their cannon in the town: they did not relish the project of forcing, and were obliged to surrender upon the spot, with all their artillery, six brass pieces, army colors, etc. A Colonel Rawle commanded, who was wounded. The number of prisoners was above 1,200, including officers—all Hessians. There were few killed or wounded on either side. After having marched off the prisoners and secured the cannon, stores, etc., we returned to the place, nine miles distant, where we had embarked.

Providence seemed to have smiled upon every part of this enterprise. Great advantages may be gained from it if we take the proper steps. At another post we have pushed over the river 2,000 men, to-day another body, and to-morrow the whole army will follow. It must give a sensible pleasure to every friend of the rights of man to think with how much intrepidity our people pushed the enemy and prevented their forming in the town.

6. "THE ENEMY HAVE FLED BEFORE US IN THE GREATEST PANIC"

Thomas Rodney to Caesar Rodney.

Allen's Town, in Jersey, December 30, 1776

... On the 25th inst. in the evening, we received orders to be at Shamony ferry as soon as possible. We were there according to orders in two hours, and met the rifle-men, who were the first from Bristol; we were ordered from thence to Dunk's Ferry, on the Delaware, and the whole army of about 2000 men followed as soon as the artillery got up. The three companies of Philadelphia infantry and mine were formed into a body, under the command of Captain Henry (myself second in command), which were embarked immediately to cover the landing of the other troops.

We landed with great difficulty through the ice, and formed on the ferry shore, about 200 yards from the river. It was as severe a night as ever I saw, and after two battalions were landed, the storm increased so much, and the river was so full of ice, that it was impossible to get the artillery over; for we had to walk 100 yards on the ice to get on shore. Gen. Cadwallader therefore ordered the whole to retreat again, and we had to stand at least six hours under arms—first to cover the landing and till all the rest had retreated again—and, by this time, the storm of wind, hail, rain and snow, with the ice, was so bad that some of the infantry could not get back till next day. This design was to have surprised the enemy at Black Horse and Mount Holley, at the same time that Washington surprised them at Trenton; and had we succeeded in getting over, we should have finished all our troubles. Washington took 910 prisoners, with 6 pieces of fine artillery, and all their baggage in Trenton.

The next night I received orders to be in Bristol before day; we were there accordingly, and about 9 o'clock began to embark one mile above Bristol, and about 3 o'clock in the afternoon got all our troops and artillery over, consisting of about 3000 men and began our march to Burlington—the infantry, flanked by the rifle-men, making the advanced guard. We got there about 9 o'clock and took possession of the town, but found the enemy had made precipitate retreat the day before, bad as the weather was, in a great panic. The whole infantry and rifle-men were then ordered to set out that night and make a forced march to Bordentown (which was about 11 miles), which they did, and took possession of the town about 9 o'clock, with a large quantity of the enemy's stores, which they had not time to carry off. We stayed there till the army came up; and the general, finding the enemy were but a few miles ahead, ordered the infantry to proceed to a town called Crosswick's, four miles from Bordentown, and they were followed by one of the Philadelphia and one of the New England battalions. We got there about 8 o'clock, and at about 10 (after we were all in quarters) were informed that the enemy's baggage was about 16 miles from us, under a guard of 300 men.

Some of the militia colonels applied to the infantry to make a forced march that night and overhaul them. We had then been on duty four nights and days, making forced marches, without six hours sleep in the whole time; whereupon the infantry officers of all the companies unanimously declared it was madness to attempt, for that it would knock up all our brave men, not one of whom had yet gave out, but every one will suppose were much fatigued. . . .

The enemy have fled before us in the greatest panic that ever was known; we heard this moment that they have fled from Princeton, and that they were hard pressed by Washington. Never were men in higher spirits than our whole army is; none are sick, and all are determined to extirpate them from the Jersey, but I believe the enemy's fears will do it before we get up with them. The Hessians, from the general to the common soldier, curse and imprecate the war, and swear they were sent here to be slaughtered; that they never will leave New-York again till they sail for Europe. Jersey will be the most whiggish colony on the continent: the very Quakers declare for taking up arms. You cannot imagine the distress of this country. They have stripped every body almost without distinction—even of all their cloths, and have beat and abused men, women and children in the most cruel manner ever heard of.

We have taken a number of prisoners in our route, Hessians and British, to the amount of about twenty. It seems likely through the blessing of Providence that we shall retake Jersey again without the loss of a man, except one Gen. Washington lost at Trenton. The enemy seem to be bending their way to Amboy with all speed, but I hope we shall come up with the Princeton baggage yet, and also get a share of their large stores at Brunswick. I hope, if I live, to see the conquest of Jersey, and set off home again in two weeks. Some of my men have complained a little, but not to say sick; they are all now well here.

7. BATTLE OF TRENTON

[1776]

On Christmas day in seventy-six
Our ragged troops with bayonets fixed
For Trenton marched away.
The Delaware see! the boats below!
The light obscured by hail and snow!
But no signs of dismay.

Our object was the Hessian band
That dared invade fair freedom's land
And quarter in that place.
Great Washington he led us on,
Whose streaming flag, in storm or sun,
Had never known disgrace.

In silent march we passed the night,
Each soldier panting for the fight,
Though quite benumbed with frost.
Greene, on the left, at six began.
The right was led by Sullivan,
Who ne'er a moment lost.

Their pickets stormed, the alarm was spread
 That rebels risen from the dead
 Were marching into town.
 Some scampered here, some scampered there,
 And some for action did prepare,
 But soon their arms laid down.

Twelve hundred servile miscreants,
 With all their colors, guns and tents,
 Were trophies of the day.
 The frolic o'er, the bright canteen
 In centre, front and rear was seen
 Driving fatigue away.

Now, brothers of the patriot bands,
 Let's sing deliverance from the hands
 Of arbitrary sway.
 And as our life is but a span,
 Let's touch the tankard while we can,
 In memory of that day.

8. AFTERMATH: A HESSIAN COURT-MARTIAL CONVICTS A DEAD MAN

"A most unfortunate business" was the comment of British General Grant. "Why could not Rall have continued to retreat across the bridge to Borden-town?" he asked. From his new quarters at Allentown, Donop wrote Knypshausen:

Whether this affair was an accident or whether a mistake had been made could not be determined from the stories told by the fugitives. All agree, however, that if Colonel Rall with his brigade had retreated over the bridge and then destroyed it he could have saved his command instead of fighting for an hour against such heavy odds. Nevertheless it certainly proves his splendid courage and that of his regiments, and this at least is greatly to their honor. Even the two regiments, the von Lossberg and his own, could have been saved. The death of Colonel Rall has therefore avoided a painful investigation, for he would have had to answer for his grave responsibility.

The Hessian court-martial formally exonerated everyone but the dead Rall, and Howe in his dispatch to Germain took the same position. Perhaps a young Hessian lieutenant had the last word with this epitaph:

Hier liegt der Oberst Rall.
 Mit ihm ist alles all!

For the British as well as the Americans, Trenton meant a bitter and tedious winter. Writing on January 8 from New Brunswick to Lord George Germain, Cornwallis summed up the Battle of Trenton: "The unlucky affair of Raal's brigade has given me a winter campaign."

Finding of Hessian Court Martial

January 11, 1782

The President and the members of the Court were then sworn:—

They gave their decision according to their respective rank after they had been cautioned to keep the same secret:—

The Ensigns. They agree that the disaster at Trenton was due to the neglect of Colonel Rall in not making the necessary preparations in case of retreat. Also that he was to blame for attacking the town instead of retreating, thereby causing the confusion in the Rall and Von Lossberg regiments.

They think that Lieutenant Colonel Scheffer in the situation in which he was when he took command of the regiments, against a superior force, would have found it impossible to have effected a retreat; that he and all his officers did all in their power to encourage their men and preserve order and that the testimony shows no censure should be placed on them.

In the matter of the pickets there could be nothing said against them as they were too weak in number to resist so strong an enemy and they were not guilty of making a premature retreat.

Lieutenant Fischer according to the testimony remained with the Von Lossberg regiment and Lieutenant Engelhardt could not save the cannon of the Rall regiment; therefore the Ensigns judge that no blame can be attached to the Artillery detachment of the brigade.

The minutes show in the case of the Von Knyphausen regiment that the command marched into the low ground on a positive order; therefore the regiment could not be held responsible for it. They also think that it was impossible for Captain von Biesenrodt, who took command when the Von Knyphausen regiment already stood in the low ground, to force the bridge with his small regiment, and there was no way for him to make them cross the creek, and that he had taken the necessary steps in this matter, first to have the creek sounded, second to place an officer and forty men to protect the ford, and third to assume charge himself of the rear guard. Captain von Loewenstein had not then shown him where the water was only knee-deep and therefore no lack of resolution or want of bravery can be charged to him. That he finally surrendered himself and his men he could not be censured for, because first the other regiments were already captured, second the situation of the Von Knyphausen regiment was already known to the enemy from Major von Dechow's movements, and third the enemy put its whole force now against the regiment Von Knyphausen, and this regiment could not successfully resist after having the cannon stuck in the swamp and only numbering then 276 men.

We also find that Captain Schimmelpfennig, Lieutenant now Captain Baum, Lieutenant now Captain Vaupell and Lieutenant von Geyso did not go through the creek until the whole regiment had orders from Captain von Biesenrodt, and took the men across according to the statement already made.

So the Ensigns believe Captain von Biesenrodt as well as the officers, the non-commissioned officers and the privates of the Von Knyphausen regiment are free from blame and ought to be acquitted.

H. G. D. MOLDE

A. VON PAPPENHEIM

F. KUESTER

Verdict. On the surprise at Trenton of the regiments Von Lossberg, Von Knyphausen and Rall, now D'Angellelli, and their capture.

The Court-Martial resolves after thoroughly examining all the testimony and all the facts that by a unanimous vote they judge that the regiments Von Lossberg, Von Knyphausen and Rall, now D'Angellelli, cannot be blamed for any want of courage, premature retreat or insubordination at the surprise at Trenton, and they believe that the commanders of the regiments, the other officers, the regiments themselves, the guards and pickets, the watch at the bridge under Sergeant Mueller, and the detachment of artillery all did their duty. . . .

III. PRINCETON

After his stunning victory at Trenton, Washington retired across the Delaware into Pennsylvania; a few days later he recrossed the river. Meantime, Cornwallis, who had been about to sail for England to see his ailing wife, was ordered back to the Jerseys with heavy reinforcements. When he reached Trenton on January 2, Cornwallis rejected the advice of his officers to attack Washington at once, observing that he could just as well "bag the fox" the next morning. His quartermaster general retorted: "My Lord, if you trust those people tonight, you will see nothing of them in the morning."

Leaving his campfires burning and muffling his artillery wheels, Washington staged a night march to Princeton with the idea of smashing the relatively small garrison forces stationed there and of obtaining desperately needed stores. After driving back the British reinforcements under Lt. Col. Charles Mawhood that had been coming up to join Cornwallis, Washington entered the town. There Artillery Captain Alexander Hamilton's cannon were brought to bear on Nassau Hill and he gave the order to fire when the British troops who had sought refuge inside the building refused to surrender. On learning that the main British army under Cornwallis was coming up, Washington withdrew his weary troops to the northeast, first destroying the bridge over Stony Brook. Shortly after, he went into winter quarters in the hills around Morristown.

In the engagement at Princeton British casualties amounted to 273, the American half that number, but the Patriots lost such gallant figures as General Mercer and Colonel Haslet. Trenton and Princeton cleared all but easternmost New Jersey of the enemy and had an incalculable effect in restoring the shattered Patriot morale.

The British traveler, Nicholas Cresswell, attributed to the double victory of Trenton and Princeton the fact that "volunteer companies are collecting in every county on the continent and in a few months the rascals will be stronger than ever. Even the parsons, some of them, have turned out as volunteers and pulpit drums or thunder, which you please to call it, summoning all to arms in this cursed babble. Damn them all."

British officers were now impelled to reappraise their leadership and battle strategy. Many of them agreed with the emotional verdict of Cresswell that "it is the damned Hessians that has caused this." As one British officer at New York put it, "The English and Hessian did not coalesce into one corps." General Archibald Robertson of the Royal Engineers blamed the British failure on "imprudently separating our small army of 6,000 men by far too much." The lesson as he saw it: "Never despise any enemy too much."

1. "THE GROUND WAS MARKED WITH THE BLOOD OF SOLDIERS' FEET"

An account by Sergeant R—.

[March 24, 1832]

Three or four days after the victory at Trenton, the American army recrossed the Delaware into New Jersey. At this time our troops were in a destitute and deplorable condition. The horses attached to our cannon were without shoes, and when passing over the ice they would slide in every direction and could advance only by the assistance of the soldiers. Our men, too, were without shoes or other comfortable clothing; and as traces of our march towards Princeton, the ground was literally marked with the blood of the soldiers' feet. Though my own feet did not bleed, they were so sore that their condition was little better. While we were at Trenton, on the last of December, 1776, the time for which I and most of my regiment had enlisted expired. At this trying time General Washington, having now but a little handful of men and many of them new recruits in which he could place but little confidence, ordered our regiment to be paraded, and personally addressed us, urging that we should stay a month longer. He alluded to our recent victory at Trenton; told us that our services were greatly needed, and that we could now do more for our country than we ever could at any future period; and in the most affectionate manner entreated us to stay. The drums beat for volunteers, but not a man turned out. The soldiers, worn down with fatigue and privations, had their hearts fixed on home and the comforts of the domestic circle, and it was hard to forego the anticipated pleasures of the society of our dearest friends.

The General wheeled his horse about, rode in front of the regiment and addressing us again said, "My brave fellows, you have done all I asked you to do, and more than could be reasonably expected; but your country is at stake, your wives, your houses and all that you hold dear. You have worn yourselves out with fatigues and hardships, but we know not how to spare you. If you will consent to stay only one month longer, you will render that service to the cause of liberty and to your country which you probably never can do under any other circumstances."

A few stepped forth, and their example was immediately followed by nearly all who were fit for duty in the regiment, amounting to about two hundred volunteers. (About half of these volunteers were killed in the battle of Princeton or died of the small pox soon after.) An officer enquired of the General if these men should be enrolled. He replied: "No! men who will volunteer in such a case as this need no enrolment to keep them to their duty."

Leaving our fires kindled to deceive the enemy, we decamped that night and by a circuitous route took up our line of march for Princeton. General Mercer commanded the front guard of which the two hundred volunteers composed a part. About sunrise of the 3rd January, 1777, reaching the summit of a hill near Princeton, we observed a light-horseman looking towards us, as we view an object when the sun shines directly in our faces. Gen. Mercer, observing him, gave orders to the riflemen who were posted on the right to pick him off. Several made ready, but at that instant he wheeled about and was out of their reach. Soon after this as we were descending a hill through an orchard, a party of the enemy who were entrenched behind a bank and fence rose and fired upon us. Their first shot passed over our heads, cutting the limbs of the trees under which we were marching. . . . Our fire was most destructive; their ranks grew thin and the victory seemed nearly complete when the British were reinforced. Many of our brave men had fallen, and we were unable to withstand such superior numbers of fresh troops.

I soon heard Gen. Mercer command in a tone of distress, "Retreat!" He was mortally wounded and died shortly after. I looked about for the main body of the army which I could not discover, discharged my musket at part of the enemy, and ran for a piece of wood at a little distance where I thought I might shelter. At this moment Washington appeared in front of the American army, riding towards those of us who were retreating, and exclaimed, "Parade with us, my brave fellows! There is but a handful of the enemy, and we will have them directly." I immediately joined the main body, and marched over the ground again.

. . . The British were unable to resist this attack, and retreated into the College, where they thought themselves safe. Our army was there in an instant, and cannon were planted before the door, and after two or three discharges a white flag appeared at the window, and the British surrendered. They were a haughty, crabbed set of men, as they fully exhibited while prisoners on their march to the country. In this battle my pack, which was made fast by leather strings, was shot from my back, and with it went what little clothing I had. It was, however, soon replaced by one which had belonged to a British officer and was well furnished. It was not mine long, for it was stolen shortly afterwards. . . .

2. PRINCETON CHANGES MASTERS THREE TIMES IN A DAY

An account of the Battle of Princeton completed on April 18, 1777, by an 85-year-old resident, name unknown.

Genl Washintons army took all the Regulars in town prissoners, and discharged their Continental prissoners that they had confined in the Colledge to the number of —, among whom [as it is said] was about 30 of our country people that were accused either of being rebels or aiding and assisting them. They took their stores in which [it is said] was a very large number of new blankets. They took all the enemys cannon in town and was oblidged to leave two of them for want of carriage to take them of[f]. One gun they threw into a well, and then they marcht on with their prissoners and plunder to Summerset Court House that day, and left some of the prissoners, and [some] of their own men to care of the sick and wounded men on both sides.

Genl Washinton, as [soon] as the [batt]le was over, ordered some of [his] men to be pl[a]ced near the [bri]dge over Stoney Brook on the main road to hinder the Regulars pasing over and to pull up the bridge, which was scarcely done when the Regulars apeared, which caused a second firing about three quarters of an hour appart from the first in which there was no execution done that I heard of. In a little time our men retreated and the Regulars were oblidged to cross the brook at the ford with their artillery almost middle deep in water (the back waters of the mill being then up) and formed on this side the brook, and towards night (when they knew that the other army was gone) marcht into Princetown. Thus that poor and almost wholly desolate town of al its late inhabitants had change of masters two if not three times on that day, for they had the Regulars in the morning, the Continentals at noon, the Regulars again at night, who left them to the Continentals that night again and have not yet returned to assume their conquest. So unconstant is the state of war and so certain and sure are the mischiefs and miserys attending it that it is a wonder that wise men should ever depend on it. . . .

The battle was plainly seen from our door. Before any gun was heard a man was seen to fall and immediately the report and smoke of a gun was seen and heard, and the guns went of[f] so quick and many together that they could not be numbered. We presently went down into the cellar to keep out of the way of the shot. There was a neighbour woman down in the cellar with us that was so affrighted that she imagined that the field was covered with blood, and when we came out of the cellar she called earnestly to us to look out and see how all the field was quit[e] red with blood, when none was to be seen at that distance. This I mention only to show into what strange mistakes sudden frights with the fear of death may put us into.

Almost as soon as the firing was over our house was filled and surrounded with Genl Washington's men, and himself on horseback at the door. They brought in with them on their shoulders two wounded Regulars; one of them was shot in at his hip and the bullet lodged in his groin, and the other was shot through his body just below his short ribs. He was in very great pain and bled much out of both sides, and often desired to be removed from one place to another, which was done accordingly, and he dyed about three o' [clock in the] afternoon. . . .

Immediately after the battle Genl Washingtons men came into our house. Though they were bo[th] hungry and thirsty some of them [were] laughing out right, others smileing, and not a man among them but showed joy in his countenance. It really animated my old blood with love to those men that but a few minutes before had been courageously looking death in the face in ravages of a bold and daring enemy. By the joy that I felt myself I cannot help but be of the opinion that the most strict of them all against bearing arms in our own defence (if they have any love for their bleeding country) must in some degree or other rejoice with the rest of their neighbours and others for that days happy relief that it pleased God to bless us with.

3. WASHINGTON WITHDRAWS FROM PRINCETON

Journal of Captain Thomas Rodney.

January 3, 1777—As soon as the enemy's main army heard our cannon at Princeton (and not 'til then) they discovered our manoeuvre and pushed after us with all speed, and we had not been above an hour in possession of the town before the enemy's light horse and advanced parties attacked our party at the bridge, but our people by a very heavy fire kept the pass until our army left the town.

Just as our army began our march through Princeton with all their prisoners and spoils, the van of the British army we had left at Trenton came in sight and entered the town about an hour after we left it, but made no stay and pushed on towards Brunswick for fear we should get there before him, which was indeed the course our General intended to pursue had he not been detained too long in collecting the baggage and artillery which the enemy had left behind him.

Our army marched on to Kingston, then wheeled to the left and went down the Millstone, keeping that river on our left; the main body of the British followed, but kept on through Kingston to Brunswick; but one division or a strong party of horse took the road on the left of the Millstone and arrived on the hill, at the bridge on that road just as the van of the American army arrived on the opposite side.

I was again commanding the van of our army, and General Washington, seeing the enemy, rode forward and ordered me to halt and take down a number of carpenters which he had ordered forward and break up the bridge, which was done and the enemy were obliged to return.

We then marched on to a little village called Stone Brook or Summerset Court House about 15 miles from Princeton where we arrived just at dusk. About an hour before we arrived here 150 of the enemy from Princeton and 50 which were stationed in this town went off with 20 wagons laden with clothing and linen, and 400 of the Jersey militia who surrounded them were afraid to fire on them and let them go off unmolested, and there were no troops in our army fresh enough to pursue them, or the whole might have been taken in a few hours.

Our army was now extremely fatigued, not having had refreshment since yesterday morning, and our baggage had all been sent away the morning of the action at Trenton; yet they are in good health and in high spirits.

4. HOWE IS SURROUNDED BY "A GREAT PARCEL OF OLD WOMEN"

Lieutenant Colonel Allan Maclean to Alexander Cummings.

New York, February 19, 1777

Poor devils as the Rebel generals are, they out-generaled us more than once, even since I have been here, which is only six weeks, and it is no less certain that with a tolerable degree of common sense, and some ability in our commanders, the rebellion would now be near ended.

Indeed, I find our mistakes in the campaign were many and some very capital ones; but I know I am writing to a friend who has some prudence and will not expose me, tho' I write real truths. . . .

After what I said it would be unjust not to say that General Howe is a very honest man, and I believe a very disinterested one. Brave he certainly is and would make a very good executive officer under another's command, but he is not by any means equal to a C. in C. I do not know any employment that requires so many great qualifications either natural or acquired as the Commander in Chief of an Army. He has, moreover, got none but very silly fellows about him—a great parcel of old women—most of them improper for American service. I could be very ludicrous on this occasion, but it is truly too serious a matter that brave men's lives should be sacrificed to be commanded by such generals.

For excepting Earl Percy, Lord Cornwallis, both Lt. Generals, and the Brigadier Generals Leslie and Sir William Erskine, the rest are useless. Lord Percy is greatly distinguished with Gen. Howe; Lord Cornwallis is, I believe, a brave man, but he allowed himself to be fairly out-generalled by Washington, the 4th Jan. last at Trenton, and missed a glorious opportunity when he let Washington slip away in the night.

Men of real genius cannot long agree with Howe; he is too dull to encourage great military merit—and our great men at home seem to be as little anxious about encouraging true military abilities as our commanders here.

You will say I am too severe, but upon my soul I would be sorry to judge rashly, and I would rather praise any man than condemn him; I am not afraid that the judicious few, who are real judges, will think me wrong in saying that Gen. Howe is by no means equal to his present command. I also find Gen. Carleton is not thought much of at home. I will not pretend to vindicate him; his conduct deserves censure, but I assure you he is a much better general than Howe. But God knows that neither of them merited Stars, or Ribands—and to you, my friend, I can say that had I not been in Canada he would never have got his Red Riband, for Quebec would have been lost, and he would be a prisoner amongst the Rebels—yet poor me have got nothing, not so much as the King's thanks! I am indeed the single man that has been forgot. This will not alter my conduct during this rascally Rebellion; on the contrary, I shall exert myself more to serve my King and Country. . . .

5. "THEY ARE NOW BECOME A FORMIDABLE ENEMY"

Colonel William Harcourt to his father Earl Harcourt.

Brunswick, March 17th, 1777

The public papers have hitherto given you a fair account enough of our operations; in what light they may state the affairs of Trenton and Prince Town I cannot so easily guess, for, however we may blame the scandalous negligence and cowardice of the Hessian brigade, there certainly was a fault in the original arrangement of the winter quarters, which were much too extensive for an army of our numbers, and the position of Trenton in itself extremely faulty.

. . . However Government may have been flattered by the representations of a few interested individuals, you may depend upon it, as a fact, that we have not yet met with ten, I believe I have said two, disinterested friends to the supremacy of Great Britain; that from the want of intelligence we frequently, nay generally, lose the favourable opportunity for striking a decisive stroke, that in general we ought to avoid attacking any considerable body of them (suppose two or three hundred), unless we can pursue our advantage, or at least take post; for though we may carry our point, nevertheless, whenever we attempt to return to our quarters we may be assured of their harassing us upon our retreat; that detached corps should never march without artillery, of which the rebels are extremely apprehensive; lastly, that, though they seem to be ignorant of the precision and order, and even of the principles, by which large bodies are moved, yet they possess some of the requisites for making good troops, such as extreme cunning, great industry in moving ground and felling of wood, activity and a spirit of enterprise upon any advantage.

Having said thus much, I have no occasion to add that, though it was once the fashion of this army to treat them in the most contemptible light, they are now become a formidable enemy. Formidable, however, as they may be, I flatter myself we are a good deal more so, and I have therefore little doubt that, provided affairs continue quiet in Europe, and the expected reinforcements arrive in good time, we shall soon bring this business to a happy conclusion.

—HARCOURT, ed., Harcourt Papers, II, 207-209.

IV. PILLAGING AND ATROCITIES

The British and Hessian campaigns in New York and New Jersey quickly gave rise to repeated charges of plunder, rape, the shooting of prisoners and civilians, and other war atrocities committed by the enemy. One venerable resident of Princeton told how the British burned all the firewood the inhabitants had stored up for the winter, even ripped the boards off houses, burned the fences, cut down the apple and other fruit trees and burned them, too. In the vicinity of Princeton they set fire to grist and fulling mills, killed sheep, and even had milch cows skinned, leaving the skin and hides and taking away the meat. The homes of those who were reported to the British by informers as being sympathetic to the rebellion were maliciously plundered and gutted.

On January 16, 1777, Congress named a committee to inquire into the conduct of the British and Hessian armies. It included two Jerseyites, John Witherspoon and Abraham Clark, and, in addition, Samuel Chase, Francis Lewis, George Ross, Thomas Heyward and William Smith. They made their report in April.

The British themselves conceded that there was a great deal of plundering, but placed the blame on the Hessians. As late as the summer of 1778, a Hessian officer admitted that "there was much plundering" in New Jersey, to Sir Henry Clinton's chagrin. "It has made the country people all the more embittered rebels," he added. Despite Washington's stern injunctions the Patriot record was certainly not spotless either.

1. WASHINGTON FORBIDS PLUNDERING

Trenton, January 1, 1777

His Excellency General Washington strictly forbids all the officers and soldiers of the Continental army, of the militia and all recruiting parties, plundering any person whatsoever, whether Tories or others. The effects of such persons will be applied to public uses in a regular manner, and it is expected that humanity and tenderness to women and children will distinguish brave Americans, contending for liberty, from infamous mercenary ravagers, whether British or Hessians.

2. "THE TRACK OF THE BRITISH IS MARKED WITH DESOLATION"

April 18, 1777

The committee appointed by Congress some time ago to inquire into the conduct of the British troops in their different marches through New York and New Jersey, have to-day reported:—That in every place where the enemy has been, there are heavy complaints of oppression, injury and insult suffered by the inhabitants from officers, soldiers and Americans disaffected to their country's cause.

The committee found these complaints so greatly diversified that as it was impossible to enumerate them, so it appeared exceedingly difficult to give a distinct and comprehensive view of them, or such an account as would not appear extremely defective when read by unhappy sufferers or the country in general. In order, however, in some degree to answer the design of their appointment, they determined to divide the object of their inquiry into the following parts, and briefly state what they found to be the truth upon each.

First:—The wanton and oppressive devastation of the country and destruction of property.

The whole track of the British army is marked with desolation and a wanton destruction of property, particularly through Westchester County, in the State of New York, the towns of Newark, Elizabethtown, Woodbridge, Brunswick, Kingston, Princeton and Trenton, in New Jersey. The fences destroyed, houses deserted, pulled in pieces or consumed by fire, and the general face of waste and devastation spread over a rich and once well-cultivated and well-inhabited country, would affect the most unfeeling with compassion for the unhappy sufferers, and with indignation and resentment against the barbarous ravagers.

It deserves notice that, though there are many instances of rage and vengeance against particular persons, yet the destruction was very general and often undistinguished; those who submitted and took protections, and some who were known to favor them, having frequently suffered in the common ruin. Places and things, which from their public nature and general utility should have been spared by civilized people, have been destroyed or plundered, or both. But above all, places of worship, ministers and other religious persons of some particular Protestant denominations seem to have been treated with the most rancorous hatred, and at the same time with the highest contempt.

Second:—The inhuman treatment of those who were so unfortunate as to become prisoners.

The prisoners, instead of that humane treatment which those taken by the United States experienced, were in general treated with the greatest barbarity. Many of them were kept near four days without food altogether. When they received a supply, it was insufficient in quantity, and often of the worst kind. They suffered the utmost distress from cold, nakedness and close confinement. Freemen and men of substance suffered all that a generous mind could suffer from the contempt and mockery of British and foreign mercenaries. Multitudes died in prison. When they were sent out, several died in being carried from the boats on shore, or upon the road attempting to go home. The committee, in the course of their inquiry, learned that sometimes the common soldiers expressed sympathy with the prisoners, and the foreigners more than the English. But this was seldom or never the case with the officers; nor have they been able to hear of any charitable assistance given them by the inhabitants who remained in or resorted to the city of New York, which neglect, if universal, they believe was never known to happen in any similar case in a Christian country.

Third:—The savage butchery of those who had submitted and were incapable of resistance.

The committee found it to be the general opinion of the people in the neighborhood of Trenton and Princeton that the British, the day before the battle of Princeton, had determined to give no quarter. They did not, however, obtain any clear proof that there were general orders for that purpose, but the treatment of several particular persons at and since that time has been of the most shocking kind, and gives too much countenance to the opposition. Officers wounded and disabled, some of them of the first rank, were barbarously mangled or put to death. A minister of the gospel, who neither was nor had been in arms, was massacred in cold blood at Trenton, though humbly supplicating for mercy.

Fourth:—The lust and brutality of the soldiers in abusing women.

The committee had authentic information of many instances of the most indecent treatment and actual ravishment of married and single women; but such is the nature of that most irreparable injury that the persons suffering it, though perfectly innocent, look upon it as a kind of reproach to have the facts related and their names known. Some complaints were made to the commanding officers on this subject, and one affidavit made before a justice of the peace, but the committee could not learn that any satisfaction was ever given, or punishment inflicted, except that one soldier in Pennington was kept in custody for part of a day.

On the whole, the committee are sorry to say that the cry of barbarity and cruelty is but too well founded; and as in conversation those who are cool to the American cause have nothing to oppose to the facts but their being incredible and not like what they are pleased to style the generosity and clemency of the English nation, the committee beg leave to observe that one of the circumstances most frequently occurring in the inquiry was the opprobrious, disdainful names given to the Americans. These do not need any proof, as they occur so frequently in the newspapers printed under their direction, and in the intercepted letters of those who are officers and call themselves gentlemen. It is easy, therefore, to see what must be the conduct of a soldiery greedy of prey towards a people whom they have been taught to look upon, not as freemen defending their rights on principle, but as desperadoes and profligates, who have risen up against law and order in general and wish the subversion of society itself. This is the most charitable and candid manner in which the committee can account for the melancholy truths which they have been obliged to report. Indeed, the same deluding principle seems to govern persons and bodies of the highest rank in Britain; for it is worthy of notice that not pamphleteers only, but King and Parliament, constantly call those acts lenity, which on their first publication filled this whole continent with resentment and horror.

3. "THERE WAS A GREAT DEAL OF PLUNDERING"

The Examination of Witnesses in the House of Commons on the Conduct of Lord Howe and Sir William Howe, 1779.

From the examination of General [James] Robertson:

Q. Did the troops plunder the inhabitants as they passed through that country?

A. There was a great deal of plundering.

Q. What effect had this on the minds of the people?

A. Naturally it would lose you friends and gain you enemies.

Q. Would it have been possible to have prevented the troops from plundering?

A. The commander in chief gave orders against it repeatedly. A number of officers who lately came into the country, and entertained a notion that Americans were enemies, perhaps did not take enough care to prevent soldiers from gratifying themselves at the expence of the people, so that plundering was very frequent.

Q. You have said there was a great deal of plundering; will you ascertain where and when?

A. The places where I first saw the effect of it was on Long Island; the next on New-York Island.

Q. Do you know of a great deal of plundering in any other part of the country?

A. It has been observed that these are the only two places in which I accompanied the army; I have heard that in other places there has been a good deal of plunder committed.

Q. Will you explain the degree of plunder, within your own knowledge, on Long Island and York Island?

A. When I landed first, I found in all the farms, the poultry, cows, and farm stocked; when I passed sometime afterwards, I found nothing alive: these were some reasons that appeared publicly to me: I saw some men hanged, by Sir William Howe's orders, for plundering; and I have heard that after Mr. Washington took the Hessians at Trenton, he restored to the inhabitants twenty-one waggon-loads of plunder he had found among their baggage.

Q. Did you ever hear of any orders from the convention of New-York for the inhabitants to drive off their cattle and stock?

A. I have seen such a publication.

Q. Did not Sir William Howe give repeated orders to prevent plundering?

A. I have said so.

Q. Do you know, or ever hear, that the Hessian troops were encouraged to go to America by the hopes of plunder?

A. I have heard say that the Hessians before they went away were told that they were going to a country where they would have great plunder; but I don't say that any Hessian officer ever made use of expressions of that sort.

Q. Do you believe that the Hessians looked on America as an enemy's country?

A. I believe so: the Hessians were ignorant of the people; when they saw these people in arms, it was natural for them, who did not know the people, to think they were enemies; people better informed too much adopted the notion.

Q. From your experience of war in Europe, did you observe that there was more plundering in America than there would have been by an army in an enemy's country in Europe?

A. The practice of armies in Europe is very different; some people in Europe would not let their army plunder, even in an enemy's country.

Q. Are you of opinion that Sir William Howe took every proper means to prevent plundering in his power?

A. I dare say, by Sir William Howe's orders, and by what I know of them, he wished to prevent it; and, I dare say, he took the means that occurred to him to do it.

Q. You have said, "A number of officers lately come into the country, and who entertained a notion that Americans were enemies, perhaps did not take enough of care to prevent soldiers from gratifying themselves at the expense of the people, so that plundering was very frequent":—you will therefore explain what officers you meant, and what particular facts you alluded to?

A. I had been asked if I stopped plundering; I answered, "Yes": in order to account for that not happening in every other brigade, I said that the officers who had lately come into the country had not the same sense that I had of the merits and dispositions of the people; and that it was from this want that the commander in chief's orders were not carried into execution in every other brigade; the reflection was general and did not allude to any particular fact.

Q. Do you know of any particular instance where the orders you allude to were disobeyed?

A. As often as plunder was committed the order was disobeyed.

Question repeated.

A. I don't know any other answer I can give; I should wish to satisfy every question that is asked; I don't know how to satisfy it more.

4. THE PENNSYLVANIA MILITIA DESECRATE A CHURCH

From the Journal of the Reverend Dr. Muhlenberg.

Saturday, Sept. 27, 1777. To-day I was requested to bury the child of one of our vestrymen at Augustus church. When I arrived there, found to my sorrow that a regiment of the Pennsylvania militia had taken possession of the church and schoolhouse. The church was filled with officers and men and their arms; the organ gallery was also full; one was playing on the organ and another singing an accompaniment; the floor was filled with straw and dirt, and on the altar they had their victuals. In short, I saw in miniature the horror of destruction in holy places.

I went in but did not think it prudent to say anything to the crowd, as they began to mock, and some of the officers called out to the one playing on the organ to play a Hessian march. I sought Colonel Dunlap and asked him if this was the promised protection to religious and civil freedom. He excused himself by saying that it was difficult to keep up strict discipline with the militia, who were composed of men of all nations. The schoolmaster complained with tears that they had destroyed his buckwheat patch, now ripe, and plundered and trodden down his garden vegetables. I could give him no assistance, for I was served in the same manner. My lot of three acres near the church, which was full of buckwheat in blossom, and from which I had hoped a frugal supply for the winter, had twenty head of horses and oxen in it, eating it off and treading it down. If one says a word about it, one is called a tory and threatened with burning of house and stable. The other side calls us rebels.

I went home and left a message with the schoolmaster for the parents of the dead child, when they arrived, that in such circumstances I could not attend the funeral or hold a discourse in the church for their consolation. The view of the church made me melancholy.

V. STALEMATE

While Howe's New Jersey campaign was grinding to a standstill American and British forces exchanged light jabs in New York and Connecticut. The first of these was a futile American attempt to capture Fort Independence, situated just north of Spuyten Duyvil. The objective of this ill-planned foray was to alarm the enemy and prevent their reinforcing the army in Jersey. Timothy Pickering's severe judgment that in the opinion of discerning men General Heath, who commanded the expedition, had "acquired nought but disgrace," was seconded by Washington. In a blistering letter the American commander wrote Heath:

Your conduct is censured (and by men of sense and judgment who were with you on the expedition to Fort Independence) as being fraught with too much caution by which the Army has been disappointed, and in some degree disgraced. Your summons, as you did not attempt to fulfill your threats, was not only idle but farcical, and will not fail of turning the laugh exceedingly upon us.

Laugh the British did, and uproariously. Ambrose Serle's comment: "One Heath, once a butcher, now a rebel general, has left the army in disgust, on account of some reflections thrown upon him by Washington for not attacking Fort Independence. He blamed his men, and his men, him; villains and cowards altogether!"

A countermove by the British was the raid on Danbury, led by Lord Tryon, the Tory governor of New York. Apparently Howe sought to create the impression that Burgoyne planned to descend upon Connecticut. In counterattacking Tryon's forces, General Wooster was killed, but Benedict Arnold survived to fight at Saratoga. The raid, which, aside from burning some twenty houses and destroying stores, accomplished little, inspired a humorously satirical skit.

As the spring of '77 came to an end, Howe, with other plans in mind which were not clear to Washington, pulled his forces out of all of Jersey except Amboy. General Samuel Parsons commented to his wife: "This State is once more delivered from those pests of society. Who will next be infected with them is uncertain, but we are in high spirits, and ready to march to any part of the country."

1. HEATH MUDDLES THE FORT INDEPENDENCE EXPEDITION

Journal of Colonel Timothy Pickering.

Friday, January 24th [1777]. The snow fell last night about three or four inches deep, and this morning it rained hard, by which the soldiers were generally wet, in their huts, through to their skins. General Lincoln sent Major Popkin, one of his aides-de-camp, to General Heath, for orders relative to the removing the troops, it being impossible for them to continue in their present situation, either with comfort and a possibility of preserving their health, or safety, for their arms were wet and their ammunition would soon be spoiled.

Major Popkin was gone four hours, being detained that General Heath might get intelligence from his advanced posts, and in endeavoring to persuade him to consent that General Lincoln's division might retire to their old quarters at Tarrytown and Dobbs's Ferry, to shift and dry their clothes and refresh themselves after their fatigues; but General Heath would consent only that they should retire about two and three miles to the nearest houses. But, notwithstanding, General Lincoln, upon considering the uncomfortable condition of his troops, and uselessness of their arms and ammunition from their being so much wet, consented that we should proceed towards our old quarters, and in the mean time went to General Heath to induce him also to consent, saying, as he left me, that, if General Heath would not consent to a necessity so urgent, he must send an express to stop us.

We accordingly began our march; but such had been the fatigues and distress of the men from cold and want of cover for the week past that the impatience of great numbers carried them off without orders, and it was not without much difficulty that I could collect any to form a body capable of action, to secure our retreat. Indeed, the arms and ammunition in general were so damaged by the rain that we could have made but a feeble resistance, had the enemy sallied. 'Tis true the storm rendered a sally improbable; besides, we moved off in silence.

On the march, about half way between our late camp and Tarrytown, the Brigade-Major, Burnham, brought me General Heath's positive orders to march to Mile Square. But it was absolutely impracticable to execute them. A large proportion of the men had by this time arrived at their quarters, and full three fourths of my regiment were ahead of me, and I on foot, with my pack and large blanket at my back (which I chose to carry, that I might know what soldiers endured, and to make them more easy, seeing I endured the same fatigues).

Besides, had my regiment been then embodied and under command, I should hardly have attempted to turn them about, to face, in the afternoon, a driving south-east storm of rain, when they had been wet to their skins many hours, and, for the reasons already mentioned, they could have yielded little assistance to General Heath, had we obeyed his orders. Indeed, it appeared to me to be downright cruelty to order them there, especially as no important advantage was held up to view to compensate the soldier's fatigue, nor, indeed, any reason mentioned but the saving General Heath and his division the trouble of turning out of the houses they at that time occupied, and retiring to others a little more remote from the enemy; for, as to the enemy's taking possession of the ground he and we quitted, it was ridiculous to urge that as a reason for our tarrying; for, if we could not drive them from the naked hills, how could he expect to take Fort Independence and destroy Kingsbridge that is open to the fort? against which that he might try his twenty-four-pounder and howitz, General Heath also urged us to stay.

These were his reasons for the orders he gave for our staying in our miserable huts, in cold and rain and snow, or of retiring only two or three miles to houses where we had neither clothes to shift ourselves nor any refreshment save beef and flour; for, when we left Tarrytown, a week before, we had orders to take only our blankets and axes, and the two days' provisions we had cooked, General Lincoln expecting but a short expedition. We did not even take our camp-kettles; and the troops, being detained, suffered a good deal from the want of them, eating their beef roasted (many without salt) on the coals, or held in the fire at the end of a stick sharpened and run through the slices. Indeed, we were so lucky at this time as to get hard bread, a quantity of which had been prepared for the expedition; but this was soon gone, and for two thirds of the week flour was dealt out, which the soldiers made, some into cakes, and some into dumplings, boiled with their meat; for we at length had sent for our camp-kettles.

We continued our route to our old quarters at Tarrytown and Dobbs's Ferry.

Thus ended our week's expedition. After enduring a variety of hardships, we returned, doing nothing and getting nothing but the paltry booty of a few blankets—about forty—a box of candles, a parcel of Osnaburgs, and about forty small arms, all not making a single wagon-load.

The expedition was disgraceful. We were to take Fort Independence, not by storm, for the whole army was militia, and the work was ditched, fraised, and surrounded by an ahatis; not by regular approaches, for we had not a single intrenching tool; not by cannonade, for we had only three six-pounders. And yet, on the first morning we arrived, General Heath, with ridiculous parade and groundless, vain expectation, sent in a summons, demanding the surrender of the fort! The garrison must have been fools and arrant cowards to have regarded it. They did not regard it. After arriving at Morristown, I understood that part of the plan was to have taken New York itself. . . .

It seems the design of the expedition was, if possible, to take Fort Independence, destroy Kingsbridge, carry off forage and alarm the enemy, so as to draw off from or prevent their reënforcing their army in the Jerseys. But Fort Independence is not taken; Kingsbridge is not destroyed; the enemy has been but little alarmed, for it is now pretty clear they have not lessened their forces in the Jerseys, nor increased them at Fort Independence or Kingsbridge; at the latter they have been induced to throw up a little redoubt. We have, as before mentioned, carried off some forage.

2. THE EXPEDITION TO DANBURY

A "royal attack and feat," under the command of General Tryon, to destroy the stores of beef, pork and rum.

SCENE—NEW YORK.

Without wit, without wisdom, half stupid and drunk,
And rolling along arm in arm with his punk,
The gallant Sir William, who fights all by proxy,
Thus spoke to his soldiers, held up by his doxy:

"My boys, I'm a-going to send you with Tryon,
To a place where you'll all get as groggy as I am;
And the wounded, when well, shall receive a full gill,
But the slain be allowed just as much as they will.
By a Tory from Danbury I've just been informed
That there's nobody there, so the place shall be stormed."

TRYON.

If there's nobody there, sir, and nobody near it,
Two thousand will conquer the whole, never fear it.

JOE GALLOP-AWAY, a refugee Tory, with several others.

JOE.

Good soldiers, go fight, that we all may get rich.

SOLDIERS.

Go get you a halter. . . .
Get out, and go live in the woods upon nuts,
Or I'll give you my bayonet plump in your ——
D'ye think, you contemptible thief-looking crew,
That we fight to get beef for such rascals as you?

TRYON.

Come on, my brave boys, now as bold as a lion,
And march for the honor of General Tryon;
My lads, there's no danger, for this you may know,
That I'd let it alone if I thought it was so.

SCENE—CONNECTICUT. TROOPS LANDED.

TRYON.

In cunning and canting, deceit and disguise,
In cheating a friend, and inventing of lies,
I think I'm a match for the best of my species,
But in this undertaking I feel all in pieces;
So I'll fall in the rear, for I'd rather go last;—
Come, march on, my boys, let me see you all past;
For his Majesty's service (so says my commission)
Requires that I bring up the whole expedition.

SCENE—DANBURY. TROOPS ARRIVED.

TRYON.

Come, halloo, my lads, for the day is our own,
No rebels are here; not a soul in the town;
So fire all the houses, and when in a blaze,
We'll honor the King with a shout of huzzas.

A noise among the soldiers.

TRYON.

In his Majesty's name, what's this mutinous jargon?

SOLDIERS.

We came to get drunk, sir, for that was the bargain!

IRISH SOLDIER, DRUNK.

Huzza for the Congress—the Congress and toddy!

TRYON.

You scoundrel, I'll run you quite through the body.

SECOND IRISH SOLDIER.

By the head of St. Paddy,
I care not a louse for King George nor his daddy!

THIRD IRISH SOLDIER.

What plenty is here! Oh what eating and drinking!
Who'd stay in New York, to be starving and ——?

FOURTH IRISH SOLDIER.

The rebels, huzza! in a hat full of rum.

FIFTH IRISH SOLDIER.

Come let us drink bumpers, Jack—out of a drum.

SCOTCH SOLDIER.

Laird Bute and his clan are a bundle of thieves.

ENGLISH SOLDIER.

Lord North and his gang are a kennel of slaves.

WELSH SOLDIER.

And a Welshman, prave poys, never harbors with knaves.

ALL.

Then let us go over.

Who'd stay to be starved, that might thus live in clover?

They sing.

Let freedom and love be the glee of our song,

Let America flourish—the Congress grow strong,

And brave Washington conqueror all the day long!

A consultation of officers. At a distance, houses and stores on fire.

TRYON.

I wish I was back, for I'm woefully scared,

The light will be seen and the noise will be heard,

And the rebels will gather so thick in our way

That whether we run for it or whether we stay,

The fate of the whole will be doubtful—and then—

A sudden alarm; an OFFICER in a fright gallops about crying:

To arms, to arms, to arms—ten thousand men

Are pouring from the clouds—ten thousand more

Are got between the army and the shore,

Ten thousand women too.

TRYON.

Run, run; stop, stop.

Here, help me on my horse before I drop.

Enter an officer from New York. To Tryon:

OFFICER.

The King hath promised, sir, you shall be knighted.

TRYON.

The devil take the King—for I am so frightened—

OFFICER.

But, sir, you must attend to what I've said.

TRYON.

Why, then, the King must knight me when I'm dead.

OFFICER.

But I bring orders, sir, which say "you must"—

TRYON.

Aye, must or not, I'll have a gallop first.

Sets off with the whole after him.

SCENE—THE SHIPPING.

Troops on board. TRYON surrounded with Surgeons.

TRYON.

My belly's full of balls—I hear them rattle.

SURGEON.

'Tis only, sir, the echo of the battle.

TRYON.

Do search me over—see where 'tis I'm wounded.

SURGEON.

You are not hurt, sir.

TRYON.

Then I am confounded;

For as I stood, not knowing what to do,

Whether to fight, to fly, or to pursue,

A cannon ball, of two and thirty pound,

Struck me just where Sir Peter got his wound;

Then passing on between my horse's ears—

SURGEON.

Compose yourself, good sir—forget your cares,

You are not slain—you are alive and well.

TRYON.

—Between my horse's ears, and down he fell,

Then getting up again—

SURGEON.

Dear sir, compose,

And try to get yourself into a doze;

The hurt you've got is not so dangerous deep,

But bleeding, shaving, patience, time and sleep,

With blisters, clysters, physic, air and diet,

Will set you up again if you'll be quiet.

TRYON.

So thick, so fast, the balls and bullets flew,

Some hit me here, some there, some thro' and thro'—

And so by thousands did the rebels muster

Under Generals Arnold and old Wooster

That let me, let me, let me, let me but

Get off alive—Farewell, Connecticut!

3. "THE ENEMY ARE UPON THE EVE OF EVACUATING THE JERSEYS"

Colonel Henry Knox to Henry Jackson.

Camp Middlebrook, June 21, 1777

General Howe on the 14th put his whole army in motion. He had for a long time past been collecting his force from Rhode Island, New York, Staten Island, etc. The boats upon which he designed to cross the Delaware as a bridge were fixed on wagons, besides which he had a large number [of] flat-bottom boats fixed on wagons to transport to the Delaware. These boats with the necessary apparatus, wagons to convey the baggage and the ammunition wagons, etc., swelled the number of his wagons to perhaps 1,000 or 1,100, a great incumbrance to an army not very numerous. . . .

Our position was exceeding good, and while we continued on it the passage to the Delaware would be rendered extremely precarious, and to attack us in camp was an event much to be wished. However, something was to be done.

General Sullivan was posted at Princeton, with a force pretty respectable in itself, but not sufficient to stop General Howe's army; and he might by a forced march push a column between Princeton and us, and cut off General Sullivan's communications at least; but, our intelligence being pretty good, the general directed Sullivan to take post about four miles from Princeton in such a manner that the surrounding him would be impracticable. We also had a party at Milstone, as a cover for the ammunition at Princeton. This was a dangerous post from its proximity to the enemy, but rendered less so by the extreme vigilance which we recommended, and which the officer commanding particularly obeyed.

Matters were thus situated on the morning of the 14th, when we discovered that the party at Milstone was attacked. Support was immediately sent to cover the retreat of the party, when it was discovered to be the enemy's main body, as the same body of observation posted there were obliged to retreat "pretty quick." The enemy took position. Our whole army was immediately ordered under arms, ready to be put in motion; but the conduct of the enemy rendered it unnecessary, for instead of immediately pushing for the Delaware, distant about twenty-five miles, or attacking General Sullivan, he set down on the ground and instantly began to fortify in a very strong position; but it was not till the next day that we discovered their works.

Their conduct was perplexing. It was unaccountable that people who the day before gave out in very gasconading terms that they would be in Philadelphia in six days should stop short when they had gone only nine miles. The intelligence was pretty good with respect to their designs, yet it was too imperfect with respect to their numbers to warrant an attack on troops so well disciplined, and posted as they were. We also in the course of a day or two discovered that they had not moved with any baggage, even tents and the most necessary, but had come out with an intention of drawing us into the plain; had left their immense number of wagons behind them, but even in this kind of ostentatious challenge they omitted not one precaution for their own safety. They had Brunswick and the Raritan River on their right, secured by eight or ten strong redoubts. At Brunswick the Raritan bends and runs a little way north, and then turns nearly west. This they had in their front secured by strong redoubts at Middlebrook. Their left was secured by the River Milstone, which empties itself into the Raritan near Bound Brook: from their right to left was about eight miles.

In this situation they continued until early in the morning of the 19th, continually at work throwing up redoubts. We had a large body of riflemen, under Colonel Morgan, perpetually making inroads upon them, attacking their pickets, killing their light-horse; and beset them in such a manner, assisted by the militia, that Mr. Howe, instead of marching to Philadelphia, found himself almost blockaded in an open flat country. Nothing could exceed the spirit shown on this occasion by the much injured people of the Jerseys. Not an atom of the lethargic spirit that possessed them last winter—all fire, all revenge. The militia of Pennsylvania likewise turned out universally, so that had Sir William put his attempt into execution, we should probably [have] had twenty-five or thirty thousand militia upon his back, besides the most respectable body of Continental troops that ever were in America.

These things being fully represented to General Howe, he thought it proper to take himself and light army back to Brunswick again, and accordingly marched about one o'clock in the morning of the 19th, without beat of drum or sound of fife. When his army had gotten beyond the reach of pursuit, they began to burn, plunder and waste all before them. The desolation they committed was horrid, and served to show the malice which marks their conduct.

The militia, light-horse and riflemen exhibited the greatest marks of valor, frequently taking prisoners within two hundred yards of their encampment. Their loss must be at least one hundred killed and wounded and taken prisoners, among whom are two lieutenants of grenadiers of the 55th and a cornet of light-horse, and a number killed, two sergeants taken. This little march of General Howe's fully proves that no people or country can be permanently conquered where the inhabitants are unanimous in opposition.

What his next manoeuvres may be I can't say, but we suppose the North River; there I believe he will be also disgraced. The motive for belief that the North River will be the scene of his operations is that intelligence is received that Mr. Burgoyne is about crossing the lakes to Ticonderoga, and General Howe must make an attempt to push for a junction. The enemy from all appearances and advices are upon the eve of evacuating the Jerseys. Times are much altered for them from last fall. The people are unanimous in opposing them: just now four thousand marched off to harass the enemy; as many more will go down towards Brunswick this afternoon.

—DRAKE, Henry Knox, pp. 43-46.

CHAPTER THIRTEEN

The Burgoyne Campaign

IN THE WINTER of 1777, General John Burgoyne, known to his troops as "Gentleman Johnny," returned to London after playing a negligible role in the Boston and New York campaigns. Having advanced his social position by his marriage (an elopement) with the daughter of the Earl of Derby, he had distinguished himself in the campaigns in Portugal during the latter part of the Seven Years' War, and won something of a reputation as a moderate by his stand in Parliament on the American question. The playwright-soldier had now worked out a grand strategy to bring the war to a speedy conclusion. This grand strategy was not entirely original in conception. Back in 1776 Carleton had a similar notion, but a combination of stubborn resistance on the part of Benedict Arnold and procrastination on the part of Sir William Howe doomed to failure the previous attempt to capture and divide the state of New York. Burgoyne's plan was more imaginative than any yet proposed and on paper seemed foolproof.

His three-pronged attack to isolate New England provided for a main army to push southward down Lake Champlain and the upper Hudson, an auxiliary force to operate from Oswego through the Mohawk Valley, and a strong force to be dispatched by Howe up the Hudson. King George's comment, in a manuscript in his own hand in the British Museum, that "the force from Canada must join him [Howe] at Albany," reveals that the monarch originally favored Burgoyne's co-ordinated knockout blow. So did Germain at first. That incompetent head of the Colonial Department approved the plan and gave the command of the expedition to Burgoyne instead of to General Carleton, who, as commander of British forces in Canada, outranked him. But on March 3 Germain also approved Howe's plan for an attack on Philadelphia, in the impractical belief that Howe could complete his mission in time to return and effect a juncture with Burgoyne. Before leaving Canada, Burgoyne saw Howe's letter to Carleton stating that, unless Washington attempted to join the northern American army, he could give Burgoyne no help. At that stage there is no indication that Burgoyne was perturbed. Even as late as August 23 it is clear from a letter of Germain that Howe had been given a free hand.

The documents, then, explode the myth that Howe did not go north to relieve Burgoyne because Germain forgot to tell him about the plan. As that story was subsequently told by William Knox, undersecretary for the Colonial Department:

Lord Sackville [Germain] came down to the office on his way to Stoneland, when I observed to him that there was no letter to Howe to acquaint him with the plan or what was expected of him in consequence of it. His Lordship stared and D'Oyly started, but said he would in a moment write a few lines. "So," says Lord Sackville, "my poor horses must stand in the street all the time, and I shan't be to my time anywhere." D'Oyly then said he had better go, and he would write from himself to Howe and include copies of Burgoyne's instructions which would tell him all that he would want to know, and with this his Lordship was satisfied, as it enabled him to keep his time, for he would never bear delay or disappointment.

Germain was not a man to keep his horses waiting.

Had Burgoyne's plan succeeded it would have been a grave blow to the Patriot cause. But it failed, and with this failure an entire British army vanished. Burgoyne's disaster may properly be considered a turning point of the war. True, six more years lay ahead until peace was made, but it was now apparent that the capture and holding of the interior of the American continent would involve an effort beyond the resources of the British to achieve. This was clearly the case once France entered the war, an involvement undoubtedly precipitated by the collapse of Burgoyne's grand design.

I. THE PLAN FOR A THREE-PRONGED ATTACK ON NEW YORK

1. "THOUGHTS FOR CONDUCTING THE WAR FROM THE SIDE OF CANADA"

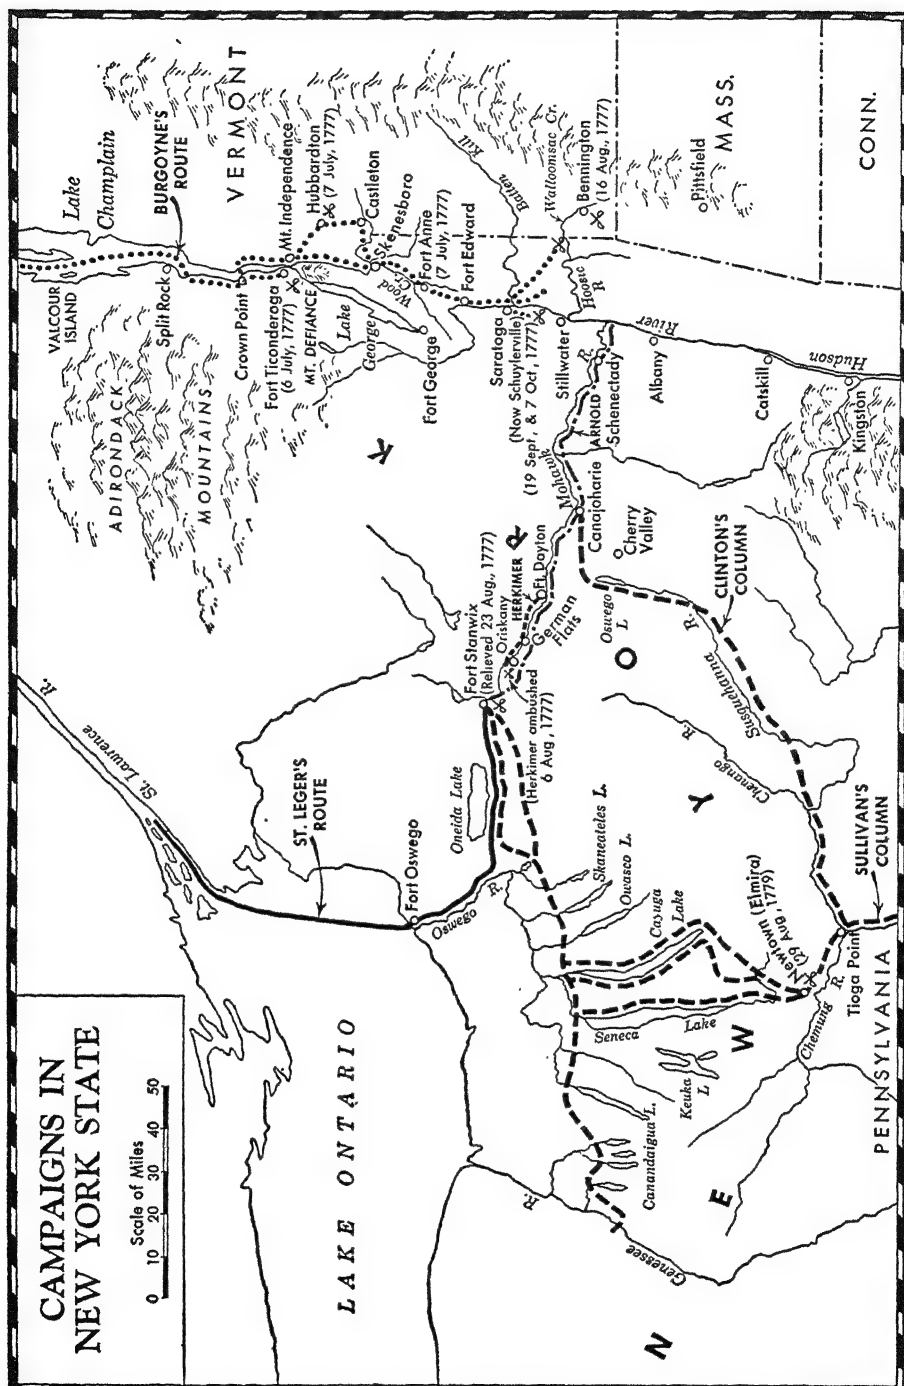

Submitted by General Burgoyne to Lord George Germain, February 28, 1777.

I humbly conceive the operating army (I mean exclusively of the troops left for the security of Canada) ought not to consist of less than eight thousand regulars, rank and file. The artillery required in the memorandums of General Carleton, a corps of watermen, two thousand Canadians, including hatchet-men and other workmen, and one thousand or more savages.

It is to be hoped that the reinforcement and the victualling-ships may all be ready to sail from the Channel and from Corke on the last day of March; I am persuaded that to part with a fleet of transports earlier is to subject government to loss and disappointment. It may reasonably be expected that they will reach Quebec before the 20th of May, a period in full time for opening the campaign. The roads, and the rivers and lakes, by the melting and running off of the snows, are in common years impracticable sooner.

But as the weather, long before that time, will probably have admitted of labour in the docks, I will take for granted that the fleet of last year, as well batteaux as armed vessels, will be found repaired, augmented and fit for immediate service. The magazines that remain of provision (I believe them not to be abundant) will probably be formed at Montreal, Sorel and Chamblée.

I conceive the first business for those entrusted with the chief powers should be to select and post the troops destined to remain in Canada; to throw up the military stores and provision with all possible dispatch, in which service the above-mentioned troops, if properly posted, will greatly assist; and to draw the army destined for operation to cantonments within as few days march of St. John's as conveniently may be. . . .

I must beg leave to state the expeditious conveyance of provision and stores from Quebec and the several other depositaries, in order to form ample magazines at Crown-Point, as one of the most important operations of the campaign, because it is upon that which most of the rest will depend. . . .

The navigation of Lake Champlain secured by the superiority of our naval force, and the arrangements for forming proper magazines so established as to make the execution certain, I would not lose a day to take possession of Crown-Point with Brigadier Fraser's corps, a large body of Savages, a body of Canadians, both for scouts and works, and the best of our engineers and artificers well supplied with intrenching tools.

The brigade would be sufficient to prevent insult during the time necessary for collecting the stores, forming magazines and fortifying the posts; all which should be done, to a certain degree, previous to proceeding in force to Ticonderoga; to such a degree I mean as may be supposed to be effected in time of transporting artillery, preparing fascines and other necessities for artillery operations; and, by keeping the rest of the army back during that period, the transport of provisions will be lessened, and the soldiers made of use in forwarding the convoys.

But though there would be only one brigade at Crown-Point at that time, it does not follow that the enemy should remain in a state of tranquillity. Corps of savages, supported by detachments of light regulars, should be continually on foot to keep them in alarm and within their works, to cover the reconnoitering of general officers and engineers, and to obtain the best intelligence of their strength, position and design.

If due exertion is made in the preparations stated above, it may be hoped that Ticonderoga will be reduced early in the summer, and it will then become a more proper place for arms than Crown-Point.

The next measure must depend on those taken by the enemy, and upon the general plan of the campaign as concerted at home. If it be determined that General Howe's whole forces should act upon Hudson's-River, and to the southward of it, and that the only object of the Canada army be to effect a junction with that force, the immediate possession of Lake George would be of great consequence, as the most expeditious and most commodious route to Albany; and, should the enemy be in force upon that lake, which is very probable, every effort should be tried, by throwing savages and light troops round it, to oblige them to quit it without waiting for naval preparations. Should these efforts fail, the route by South-Bay and Skenesborough might be attempted; but considerable difficulties may be expected, as the narrow parts of the river may be easily choked up and rendered impassible; and, at best, there will be necessity for a great deal of land-carriage for the artillery, provision, etc., which can only be supported from Canada. In case of success also by that route, and the enemy not removed from Lake George, it will be necessary to leave a chain of posts as the army proceeds, for the securities of your communications, which may too much weaken so small an army.

Lest all their attempts should unavoidably fail, and it becomes indispensably necessary to attack the enemy by water upon Lake George, the army, at the out-set, should be provided with carriages, implements and artificers for conveying armed vessels from Ticonderoga to the lake.

These ideas are formed upon the supposition that it be the sole purpose of the Canada army to effect a junction with General Howe; or, after co-operating so far as to get possession of Albany and open the communication to New-York, to remain upon the Hudson's-River, and thereby enable that general to act with his whole force to the southward. . . .

To avoid breaking in upon other matter, I omitted in the beginning of these papers to state the idea of an expedition at the out-set of the campaign by the Lake Ontario and Oswego to the Mohawk River; which, as a diversion to facilitate every proposed operation, would be highly desirable, provided the army should be reinforced sufficiently to afford it.

It may at first appear, from a view of the present strength of the army, that it may bear the sort of detachment proposed by myself last year for this purpose; but it is to be considered that at that time the utmost object of the campaign, from the advanced season and unavoidable delay of preparation for the lakes, being the reduction of Crown-Point and Ticonderoga, unless the success of my expedition had opened the road to Albany, no greater numbers were necessary than for those first operations. The case in the present year differs; because the season of the year affords a prospect of very extensive operation, and consequently the establishment of many posts, patrols, etc., will become necessary. The army ought to be in a state of numbers to bear those drains and still remain sufficient to attack any thing that probably can be opposed to it.

Nor, to argue from probability, is so much force necessary for this diversion this year as was required for the last; because we then knew that General Schuyler with a thousand men was fortified upon the Mohawk. When the different situations of things are considered, viz. the progress of General Howe, the early invasion from Canada, the threatening of the Connecticut from Rhode-Island, etc., it is not to be imagined that any detachment of such forces as that of Schuyler can be supplied by the enemy for the Mohawk. I would not therefore propose it of more (and I have great diffidence whether so much can be prudently afforded) than Sir John Johnson's corps, a hundred British from the Second Brigade and a hundred more from the 8th Regiment, with four pieces of the lightest artillery and a body of savages; Sir John Johnson to be with a detachment in person, and an able field-officer to command it. I should wish Lieutenant-Colonel St. Leger for that employment.

2. GEORGE III AGREES THAT HOWE MUST JOIN BURGOYNE AT ALBANY

Remarks on Burgoyne's plan in the handwriting of King George, from a manuscript in the British Museum.

The outlines of the plan seem to be on a proper foundation. The rank and file of the army in Canada (including the 11th of British, McClean's [Maclean's] corps, the Brunswicks and Hanover) amount to 10,527; add the eleven additional companies and 400 Hanover Chasseurs, the total will be 11,443.

As sickness and other contingencies must be expected, I should think not above 7,000 effectives can be spared over Lake Champlain, for it would be highly imprudent to run any risk in Canada.

The fixing of stations of those left in the province may not be quite right, though the plan proposed may be recommended. Indians must be employed, and this measure must be avowedly directed. . . .

As Sir William Howe does not think of acting from Rhode Island into Massachusetts, the force from Canada must join him at Albany.

The diversion on the Mohawk River ought, at least, to be strengthened by the addition of 400 Hanover Chasseurs.

The provisions ought to be calculated for a third more than the effective soldiery, and the General ordered to avoid delivering these when the army can be subsisted from the country.

Burgoyne certainly greatly undervalues the German recruits.

The idea of carrying the army by sea to Sir William Howe would certainly require the leaving a much larger part of it in Canada, as in that case the rebel army would divide that province from the immense one under Sir W. Howe. I greatly dislike that idea.

3. THE STRATEGIC MISUNDERSTANDING BETWEEN HOWE AND BURGOYNE

A. GENERAL HOWE TO SIR GUY CARLETON

New York, April 2, 1777

Having but little expectation that I shall be able, from the want of sufficient strength in this army, to detach a corps in the beginning of the campaign to act up Hudson's River consistent with the operations already determined upon, the force your Excellency may deem expedient to advance beyond your frontiers after taking Ticonderoga will, I fear, have little assistance from hence to facilitate their approach, and as I shall probably be in Pennsylvania when that corps is ready to advance into this province, it will not be in my power to communicate with the officer commanding it so soon as I could wish; he must therefore pursue such measures as may from circumstances be judged most conducive to the advancement of his Majesty's service consistently with your Excellency's orders for his conduct.

The possession of Ticonderoga will naturally be the first object, and without presuming to point out to your Excellency the advantages that must arise by securing Albany and the adjacent country, I conclude they will engage the next attention, but, omitting others, give me leave to suggest that this situation will open a free intercourse with the Indians, without which we are to expect little assistance from them on this side.

The further progress of this corps, depending so much upon the enemy's movements, cannot be foreseen at this distance of time; still I flatter myself and have reason to expect the friends of Government in that part of the country will be found so numerous and so ready to give every aid and assistance in their power that it will prove no difficult task to reduce the more rebellious parts of the province. In the mean while I shall endeavour to have a corps upon the lower part of Hudson's River sufficient to open the communication for shipping thro' the Highlands, at present obstructed by several forts erected by the rebels for that purpose, which corps may afterwards act in favour of the northern army.

B. GENERAL HOWE TO LORD GEORGE GERMAIN

Philadelphia, October 22, 1777

I was surprized to find the General's [Burgoyne's] declaration, in his message to Sir H. Clinton by Captain Campbell, "that he would not have given up his communication with Ticonderoga had he not expected a co-operating army at Albany," since in my letter to Sir Guy Carleton, a copy of which was transmitted to your Lordship in my dispatch of 2nd April, 1777, No. 47, and of which his Majesty was pleased to approve, I positively mentioned that no direct assistance could be given by the southern army. This letter I am assured was received by Sir Guy Carleton and carried by him to Montreal before General Burgoyne's departure from thence.

II. FIRST ROUND: A WAR OF WORDS

On June 17, 1777, Burgoyne moved south from St. Johns to Lake Champlain with a mixed force of British and German infantrymen numbering some 7,000, a small force of British and Hesse-Hanau artillerymen, 400 Indians, a handful of Canadians and Tories, along with a huge baggage train of 138 guns. Available to his expedition for transportation on the lake was the navy used by Carleton in the Champlain campaign of the previous year, including ships captured from Arnold after Valcour Bay.

The campaign started off in a cloud of oratory and rhetoric released by Gentleman Johnny. On June 23 he made a speech to his Indian allies and issued a bombastic proclamation. In the speech he cautioned the Indians to conduct humane warfare. Edmund Burke promptly ridiculed this appeal in a debate in the House of Commons, exclaiming:

Suppose there was a riot on Tower Hill. What would the keeper of his Majesty's lions do? Would he not fling open the dens of the wild beasts and then address them thus: "My gentle lions—my humane bears—my tenderhearted hyenas, go forth! But I exhort you, as you are Christians and members of civil society, to take care not to hurt any man, woman or child."

But it was Burgoyne's proclamation commending the justice and clemency of the King, but warning that he would execute "the vengeance of the state against the wilful outcasts," that was greeted with especially shrill cat-calls both in London and America. Most widely publicized of all the satirical retorts was the parody and counterblast attributed to the Pennsylvania poet, Francis Hopkinson. Burgoyne soon dropped the quill and plunged ahead with his lumbering baggage train into the forest.

1. GENTLEMAN JOHNNY INFLAMES THE INDIANS

Letter of Thomas Anburey, Lieutenant in the British Army.

Camp at River Bouquet, upon Lake Champlain, June 24, 1777

. . . When the assembly were met, the General thus addressed them, by means of an interpreter:

"Chiefs and Warriors,

"The great King, our common father and the patron of all who seek and deserve his protection, has considered with satisfaction the general conduct of the Indian tribes from the beginning of the troubles in America. Too sagacious and too faithful to be deluded or corrupted, they have observed the violated rights of the parental power they love, and burned to vindicate them. A few individuals alone, the refuse of a small tribe, at the first were led astray: and the misrepresentations, the specious allurements, the insidious promises and diversified plots in which the rebels are exercised, and all of which they employed for that effect, have served only in the end to enhance the honor of the tribes in general by demonstrating to the world how few and how contemptible are the apostates! It is a truth known to you all [that], these pitiful examples excepted (and they have probably, before this day, hid their faces in shame), the collective voices and hands of the Indian tribes over this vast continent are on the side of justice, of law, and the King. . . .

"The clemency of your father has been abused, the offers of his mercy have been despised, and his farther patience would, in his eyes, become culpable, in as much as it would withhold redress from the most grievous oppressions in the provinces that ever disgraced the history of mankind. It therefore remains for me, the General of one of his Majesty's armies and in this council his representative, to release you from those bonds which your obedience imposed. Warriors, you are free—go forth in might and valour of your cause—strike at the common enemies of Great Britain and America, disturbers of public order, peace and happiness, destroyers of commerce, parricides of state."

The General, then directing their attentions by pointing to the officers, both German and British, that attended this meeting, proceeded:

"The circle round you, the chiefs of his Majesty's European forces and of the Princes his allies, esteem you as brothers in the war; emulous in glory and in friendship, we will endeavour reciprocally to give and to receive examples; we know how to value, and we will strive to imitate your perseverance in enterprize, and your constancy to resist hunger, weariness and pain. Be it our task, from the dictates of our religion, the laws of our warfare and the principles and interest of our policy, to regulate your passions when they overbear, to point out where it is nobler to spare than to revenge, to discriminate degrees of guilt, to suspend the uplifted stroke, to chastise and not destroy.

"This war to you, my friends, is new. Upon all former occasions, in taking the field, you held yourselves authorized to destroy wherever you came, because every where you found an enemy. The case is now very different.

"The King has many faithful subjects dispersed in the provinces; consequently you have many brothers there, and these people are more to be pitied that they are persecuted or imprisoned wherever they are discovered or suspected, and to dissemble, to a generous mind, is a yet more grievous punishment.

"Persuaded that your magnanimity of character, joined to your principles of affection to the King, will give me fuller controul over your minds than the military rank with which I am invested, I enjoin your most serious attention to the rules which I hereby proclaim for your invariable observation during the campaign."

After answering, "Etow! Etow!" in their language signifying approbation, they appeared to pay very great attention to the interpreter, eager to catch the General's instructions.

"I positively forbid bloodshed, when you are not opposed in arms.

"Aged men, women, children and prisoners must be held sacred from the knife or hatchet, even in the time of actual conflict.

"You shall receive compensation for the prisoners you take, but you shall be called to account for scalps.

"In conformity and indulgence of your customs, which have affixed an idea of honor to such badges of victory, you shall be allowed to take the scalps of the dead when killed by your fire and in fair opposition; but on no account, or pretence, or subtility, or prevarication, are they to be taken from the wounded or even dying; and still less pardonable, if possible, will it be held to kill men in that condition on purpose, and upon a supposition that this protection to the wounded would be thereby evaded.

"Base, lurking assassins, incendiaries, ravagers and plunderers of the country, to whatever army they may belong, shall be treated with less reserve; but the latitude must be given you by order, and I must be the judge on the occasion.

"Should the enemy, on their parts, dare to countenance acts of barbarity towards those who may fall into their hands, it shall be yours also to retaliate; but till this severity be thus compelled, bear immoveable in your hearts this solid maxim (it cannot be too deeply impressed): that the great essential reward, the worthy service of your alliance, the sincerity of your zeal to the King, your father and never-failing protector, will be examined and judged upon the test only of your steady and uniform adherence to the orders and counsels of those to whom his Majesty has entrusted the direction and honor of his arms."

After the General had finished his speech, they all of them, cried out, "Etow! Etow! Etow!" and after remaining some time in consultation, an old Chief of the Iroquois rose up and made the following answer:

"I stand up, in the name of all the nations present, to assure our father that we have attentively listened to his discourse. We receive you as our father, because when you speak we hear the voice of our great father beyond the great lake.

"We rejoice in the approbation you have expressed of our behaviour.

"We have been tried and tempted by the Bostonians; but we have loved our father, and our hatchets have been sharpened upon our affections.

"In proof of the sincerity of our professions, our whole villages able to go to war are come forth. The old and infirm, our infants and wives, alone remain at home.

"With one common assent we promise a constant obedience to all you have ordered and all you shall order, and may the father of days give you many, and success!"

After the Chief of the Iroquois had finished, they all, as before, cried out, "Etow! Etow! Etow!" and the meeting broke up.

2. BURGOYNE THREATENS DEVASTATION, FAMINE AND HORROR

Proclamation

By John Burgoyne, Esq; etc. etc. Lieut. General of his Majesty's Forces in America, Colonel of the Queen's Regiment of Light Dragoons, Governor of Fort-William in North-Britain, one of the Representatives of the Commons of Great-Britain in Parliament, and commanding an Army and Fleet in an Expedition from Canada etc. etc. etc.

The Forces entrusted to my Command are designed to act in concert, and upon a common Principle, with the numerous Armies and Fleets which already display, in every Quarter of America, the Power, the Justice, and, when properly sought, the Mercy of the King.

The Cause in which the British Arms are thus exerted, applies to the most affecting Interest of the human Heart: And the Military Servants of the Crown, at first called for the sole Purpose of restoring the Rights of the Constitution, now combine with the Love of their Country, and Duty to their Sovereign, the other extensive Incitements, which spring from a due Sense of the general Privileges of Mankind. To the Eyes and Ears of the temperate Part of the Public, and to the Breasts of suffering Thousands in the Provinces, be the melancholy Appeal—Whether the present unnatural Rebellion has not been made the Foundation of the compleatest System of Tyranny that ever God, in his Displeasure, suffered, for a Time, to be exercised over a froward and stubborn Generation.

Arbitrary Imprisonments, Confiscation of Property, Persecution and Torture, unprecedented in the Inquisitions of the Romish Church, are among the palpable Enormities that verify the Affirmative: These are inflicted by Assemblies and Committees, who dare to profess themselves Friends of Liberty, upon the most quiet Subject, without Distinction of Age or Sex, for the sole Crime, often the sole Suspicion, of having adhered in Principle to the Government under which they were born, and to which, by every Tie divine and human, they owe Allegiance. To consummate these shocking Proceedings the Profanation of Religion is added to the most profligate Prostitution of common Reason! The Consciences of Men are set at naught, and the Multitudes are compelled not only to bear Arms, but also to swear Subjection to an Usurpation they abhor.

Animated by these Considerations, at the Head of Troops in the full Powers of Health, Discipline and Valour, determined to strike where necessary, and anxious to save where possible, I, by these Presents, invite and exhort all Persons, in all Places where the Progress of this Army may point, and by the Blessing of God I will extend it FAR, to maintain such a Conduct as may justify me in protecting their Lands, Habitations, and Families. . . .

If notwithstanding these Endeavors and sincere Inclination to assist them, the Phrenzy of Hostility should remain, I trust I shall stand acquitted in the Eyes of God and Men in denouncing and executing the Vengeance of the State against the wilful Outcast. The Messengers of Justice and of Wrath await them in the Field, and Devastation, Famine, and every concomitant Horror that a reluctant but indispensable Prosecution of Military Duty must occasion, will bar the Way to their Return.

J. BURGoyNE

Camp at the River Bongrert [Bouquet] June 23rd. 1777.

By order of his Excellency the Lieutenant General

3. "I ISSUE THIS MY MANIFESTO"

(Attributed to Francis Hopkinson.)

By John Burgoyne and Burgoyne, John, Esq.,
And graced with titles still more higher,
For I'm Lieutenant-general, too,
Of George's troops both red and blue,
On this extensive continent;
And of Queen Charlotte's regiment
Of light dragoons the Colonel;
And Governor eke of Castle Wil—
And furthermore, when I am there,
In House of Commons I appear
(Hoping ere long to be a Peer),
Being a member of that virtuous band
Who always vote at North's command;
Directing too the fleet and troops
From Canada as thick as hops;
And all my titles to display,
I'll end with thrice et cetera.

The troops consigned to my command
Like Hercules to purge the land
Intend to act in combination
With th' other forces of the nation,
Displaying wide thro' every quarter
What Britain's justice would be after. . . .
Your ears and eyes have heard and seen
How causeless this revolt has been;
And what a dust your leaders kick up

In this rebellious civil hickup,
And how, upon this cursed foundation,
Was reared the system of vexation
Over a stubborn generation.

But now inspired with patriot love
I come th' oppression to remove;
To free you from the heavy clog
Of every tyrant demagogue,
Who for the most romantic story
Claps into limbo loyal Tory,
All hurly burly, hot and hasty,
Without a writ to hold him fast by; . . .
In short, the vilest generation
Which in vindictive indignation
Almighty vengeance ever hurled
From this to the infernal world. . . .
To petticoats alike and breeches
Their cruel domination stretches,
For the sole crime, or sole suspicion
(What worse is done by th' inquisition?)
Of still adhering to the crown,
Their tyrants striving to kick down,
Who, by perverting law and reason,
Allegiance construe into treason. . . .

By such important views there pres't to,
I issue this my manifesto.
I, the great knight of de la Mancha,
Without 'Squire Carleton, my Sancho,
Will tear you limb from limb asunder
With cannon, blunderbuss and thunder;
And spoil your feathering and your tarring;
And cagg you up for pickled herring.
In front of troops as spruce as beaux
And ready to lay on their blows,
I'll spread destruction far and near;
And where I cannot kill, I'll spare,
Inviting, by these presents, all,
Both young and old, and great and small,
And rich and poor, and Whig and Tory,
In cellar deep or lofty story;
Where'er my troops at my command
Shall swarm like locusts o'er the land
(And they shall march from the North Pole
As far, at least, as Pensacole)
To break off their communications,
That I can save their habitations;
For, finding that Sir William's plunders

Prove in the event apparent blunders,
 It is my full determination
 To check all kinds of depredation;
 But when I've got you in my power,
 Favored is he I last devour.

From him who loves a quiet life
 And keeps at home to kiss his wife, . . .
 I will not defalcate a groat,
 Nor force his wife to cut his throat;
 But with his doxy he may stay
 And live to fight another day; . . .

With the most Christian spirit fired,
 And by true soldiership inspired,
 I speak as men do in a passion
 To give my speech the more impression.
 If any should so hardened be
 As to expect impunity,
 Because procul a fulmine,
 I will let loose the dogs of Hell,
 Ten thousand Indians, who shall yell
 And foam and tear, and grin and roar,
 And drench their moccasins in gore;
 To these I'll give full scope and play
 From Ticonderog to Florida;
 They'll scalp your heads, and kick your shins,
 And rip your —, and flay your skins,
 And of your ears be nimble croppers,
 And make your thumbs tobacco-stoppers.
 If after all these loving warnings,
 My wishes and my bowels' yearnings,
 You shall remain as deaf as adder,
 Or grow with hostile rage the madder,
 I swear by George and by St. Paul
 I will exterminate you all.

Subscribed with my manual sign,

To test these presents, John Burgoyne.

III. THE FALL OF TICONDEROGA

Burgoyne began his campaign with an easy victory. His first objective was the strategic fortress of Ticonderoga on the western shores of Lake Champlain and commanding fleet movements both north and south on that lake. Despite frantic moves to fortify it, Ticonderoga quickly became indefensible when Burgoyne's men hauled their guns to the top of Mount Defiance, a 750-foot height that enfiladed the whole position. Through a combination of carelessness and a shortage of man power it had been left unde-fended. General Arthur St. Clair then evacuated both Fort Ticonderoga and Mount Independence, across the lake. His rear guard was routed by the British forces at Hubbardton. On the twelfth of July, St. Clair joined General Schuyler at Fort Edward.

St. Clair explained in a letter to James Bowdoin of July 9 that the loss of the post was infinitely preferable to the loss of the army. This was good logic, but did not satisfy the politicians. Schuyler, chief of the Northern Department, was the immediate scapegoat. But he himself had realized that he did not have enough at hand to defend Ticonderoga. On a visit to the fort before Burgoyne's action he reported that it was seriously undermanned and that many of the raw militia in its garrison were "mere boys, and one third of the whole force unfit for duty." Charged by Congress with "neglect of duty" at Ticonderoga, Schuyler was acquitted by a court-martial "with the highest honors."

The effect of the fall of Ticonderoga on Patriot morale was crushing. As Alexander Hamilton put it in a letter to John Jay of July 13:

All is mystery and dark beyond conjecture. But we must not be discouraged at a misfortune. We must rather exert ourselves the more vigorously to remedy the ill consequences of it. If the army gets off safe, we shall soon be able to recover the face of affairs. I am in hope that Burgoyne's success will precipitate him into measures that will prove his ruin. The enterprising spirit he has credit for, I suspect, may easily be fanned by his vanity into rashness. (Jay Papers, Columbia Univ. Lib.)

How accurate a prophet Hamilton was, military events would soon reveal.

1. "IN THIS CRUEL SITUATION WHAT CAN BE DONE?"

Colonel James Wilkinson of the Continental Army to General Horatio Gates.

Ticonderoga, June 25, 1777

The enemy by gradual movements, which have been duly transmitted to General Schuyler, last evening arrived at Crown Point with some vessels and a part of their army, who have encamped on Chimney Point. We are induced to believe from a morning gun, which was repeated down the lake, that their whole force is at hand, and as they have lately taken several prisoners, and the neighboring inhabitants have had free access to this camp, I am persuaded they will obtain a true state of our weakness, which will indubitably precipitate their operations: in which case the post is inevitably lost, for if we risk a battle the inferiority of our numbers (without a miracle, which we sinners have no right to expect) will subject us to defeat and captivity; and if we retire to Mount Independence, the scantiness of our provisions will subject us to reduction by famine, as the enemy, when in possession of this side of the lake, can easily remove the obstructions up the south bay, and by their fleet cut off our communications from Skenesborough.

The militia are at our command, but should we call them in, immediate starvation is the consequence, as General Schuyler has lately assured us that we have no right or reason to expect more than three hundred barrels of meat in addition, and we can not subsist our present small garrison longer than seven weeks with what is on the ground. The distance from whence our supplies are derived, and the difficulty of transportation, both tend to embarrass us.

In this cruel situation, what can be done? The most laudable measure, in my opinion, would be to remove our heavy artillery and stores, and the convalescents and invalids of the army, to Fort George. Being then light and unincumbered, we might, if hard pushed, effect a retreat to that post, which would enable us to check the enemy's progress; on the contrary, should we attempt to support this place in our present deficient situation, we lose all, and leave the country defenseless and exposed. What, then, will there be to obstruct their favorite scheme—a junction by the North River? Nothing that I can discern.

You remember the state of arms I transmitted you on my first arrival here; I am sorry to inform you that they are not now better in quality, or superior in number. Our men are harassed to extreme weakness by fatigue, and the strong guards which we are now obliged to establish will in a little time quite break up their spirits and constitutions. If fortitude, if enterprise, if perseverance or temerity could avail, I would not complain; but, in the name of Heaven, what can be expected from a naked, undisciplined, badly armed, unaccounted body of men, when opposed to a vast superiority of British troops?

What can be done, the great St. Clair will effect; but such is the weakness of our numbers that he can not form any plan of defense. Of the two, I prefer death to captivity; but be the event as it will, I shall not disgrace my acquaintance.

General Schuyler has been here a few days, but is now in Albany.

2. "ONE OF THE MOST PLEASING SPECTACLES I EVER BEHELD"

Letter of Thomas Anburey, Lieutenant in the British Army.

Camp at Crown Point, June 30, 1777

We are now within sight of the enemy, and their watch-boats are continually rowing about, but beyond the reach of cannon shot. Before I proceed farther, let me just relate in what manner the army passed the lake, which was by brigades, generally advancing from seventeen to twenty miles a day, and regulated in such a manner that the second brigade should take the encampment of the first, and so on successively, for each brigade to fill the ground the other quitted; the time for departure was always at day-break.

One thing appeared to me very singular, which I am not philosopher enough to account for: in sailing up the lake, on all the islands and points of land, the water seemed to separate the trees from the land, and to pass in a manner through them, having the appearance of small brush wood at a very little heighth from the water; nor do the trees appear to come in contact with the land till you approach within two or three miles of the object, when they show themselves to be distinctly joined.

I cannot forbear picturing to your imagination one of the most pleasing spectacles I ever beheld. When we were in the widest part of the lake, whose beauty and extent I have already described, it was remarkably fine and clear, not a breeze stirring, when the whole army appeared at one view in such perfect regularity as to form the most compleat and splendid regatta you can possibly conceive. A sight so novel and pleasing could not fail of fixing the admiration and attention of every one present.

In the front, the Indians went with their birch canoes, containing twenty or thirty in each; then the advanced corps in a regular line, with the gun-boats; then followed the Royal George and Inflexible, towing large booms, which are to be thrown across two points of land, with the other brigs and sloops following; after them the first brigade in a regular line; then the Generals Burgoyne, Phillips and Riedesel in their pinnaces; next to them were the second brigade, followed by the German brigades; and the rear was brought up with the sutlers and followers of the army.

Upon the appearance of so formidable a fleet, you may imagine they were not a little dismayed at Ticonderoga, for they were not apprized of our advance, as we every day could see their watch-boats. We had, it is certain, a very strong naval force, but yet it might have been greatly in the power of the Americans to have prevented our passing the lake so rapidly as we have done, especially as there are certain parts of it where a few armed vessels might have stopped us for some time: but it is an invariable maxim with the Americans, of which there are numberless instances in the last campaign, never to face an enemy but with very superior advantages and the most evident signs and prospects of success.

3. THE AMERICANS GIVE UP TICONDEROGA

Journal of Lieutenant William Digby of the Shropshire Regiment.

[July] 4th. Before day light, we shifted our camp farther back a small way from the range of their shot, until our 12-pounders could come up to play on them in return; by their not throwing shells, we supposed they had none, which from our camp being on a rocky eminence would have raked us much; as to their balls we did not much mind them being at too great a distance to suffer from any point blank shot from their cannon.

About noon we took possession of Sugar Loaf Hill [Fort Defiance] on which a battery was immediately ordered to be raised. It was a post of great consequence, as it commanded a great part of the works of Ticonderoga, all their vessels, and likewise afforded us the means of cutting off their communication with Fort Independent, a place also of great strength and the works very extensive. But here the commanding officer was reckoned guilty of a great oversight in lighting fires on that post, tho I am informed it was done by the Indians, the smোক of which was soon perceived by the enemy in the fort; as he should have remained undiscovered till night, when he was to have got two 12-pounders up, tho their getting there was almost a perpendicular ascent, and drawn up by most of the cattle belonging to the Army.

They no sooner perceived us in possession of a post which they thought quite impossible to bring cannon up to, than all their pretended boastings of holding out to the last, and choosing rather to die in their works than give them up, failed them, and on the night of the 5th they set fire to several parts of the garrison, kept a constant fire of great guns the whole night, and under the protection of that fire and clouds of smoke they evacuated the garrison, leaving all their cannon, amunition and a great quantity of stores. They embarked what baggage they could during the night in their battows, and sent them up to Skeensborough under the protection of five schooners, which Captain Carter of the Artillery with our gun boats followed and destroyed with all their baggage and provisions.

As I happened to be one of the lieutenants of the Grenadiers piquet that night, when we perceived the great fires in the fort, the general was immediately made acquainted with it and our suspicion of their abandoning the place, who with many other good officers imagined it was all a feint in them to induce us to make an attack, and seemingly with a great reason of probability, tho to me, who could be but a very poor judge, it seemed quite the contrary, as I never before saw such great fires.

About 12 o'clock we were very near committing a most dreadful mistake. At that hour of the night, as I was going my rounds to observe if all the sentrys were alert on their different posts, one sentry challenged a party of men passing under his post, which was situated on the summit of a ravine or gully, and also heard carriages dragging in the same place, who answered friends, but on his demanding the countersign, they did not give it, and by their hesitating appeared at a loss; when the fellow would have instantly fired upon them according to his orders, had not I come up at the time, on which I caused him to challenge them again; they not answering, I called to the piquet to turn out and stand to their arms, still lothe to fire. Just at the time, Captain Walker came up in great haste and told me it was a party of his Artillery with two 12-pounders going to take post on Sugar Loaf Hill, and his orders to them was to cause it to be kept as secret as possible, which by their too strictly attending to in not answering our challenge, which could never be the intention of their orders, was near involving us all in a scene of the greatest confusion, which must have arose from our piquet firing on them. I own I was somewhat alarmed, still thinking the great fires in their lines a feint and their coming to attack us with more security, imagining we gave in to that feint.

[July] 6th. At the first dawn of light, 3 deserters came in and informed that the enemy were retreating the other side of Mount Independent. The general was, without loss of time, made acquainted with it, and the picquets of the army were ordered to march and take possession of the garrison and hoist the King's colors, which was immediately done, and the Grenadiers and Light Infantry were moved under the command [of] Brigadier General Frazier, if possible to come up with them with the greatest expedition. From the fort we were obliged to cross over a boom of boats between that place and Mount Independent, which they, in their hurry, attempted to burn without effect, as the water quenched it, though in some places we could go but one abreast, and had they placed one gun so as the grape shot [could] take the range of the bridge—and which surprised us they did not, as two men could have fired it, and then made off—they would, in all probability, have destroyed all or most of us on the boom. We continued the pursuit the whole day without any sort of provisions, and, indeed, I may say, we had very little or none, excepting one cow we happened to kill in the woods, which, without bread, was next to nothing among so many for two days after; a few hours rest at night in the woods was absolutely necessary.

4. THE AMERICAN RETREAT TO FORT EDWARD

Journal of Dr. James Thacher, a doctor serving with the Continental Army.

[July] 14th.—By reason of an extraordinary and unexpected event, the course of my Journal has been interrupted for several days. At about 12 o'clock, in the night of the 5th instant, I was urgently called from sleep, and informed that our army was in motion, and was instantly to abandon Ticonderoga and Mount Independence. I could scarcely believe that my informant was in earnest, but the confusion and bustle soon convinced me that it was really true, and that the short time allowed demanded my utmost industry. It was enjoined on me immediately to collect the sick and wounded, and as much of the hospital stores as possible, and assist in embarking them on board the batteaux and boats at the shore.

Having with all possible despatch completed our embarkation, at 3 o'clock in the morning of the 6th, we commenced our voyage up the South bay to Skeenesborough, about 30 miles. Our fleet consisted of five armed gallies and two hundred batteaux and boats deeply laden with cannon, tents, provisions, invalids and women. We were accompanied by a guard of six hundred men, commanded by Colonel Long, of New Hampshire. The night was moon light and pleasant, the sun burst forth in the morning with uncommon lustre, the day was fine, the water's surface serene and unruffled. The shore on each side exhibited a variegated view of huge rocks, caverns and cliffs, and the whole was bounded by a thick, impenetrable wilderness. My pen would fail in the attempt to describe a scene so enchantingly sublime. The occasion was peculiarly interesting, and we could but look back with regret, and forward with apprehension. We availed ourselves, however, of the means of enlivening our spirits. The drum and fife afforded us a favorite music; among the hospital stores we found many dozens of choice wine, and we cheered our hearts with the nectareous contents.

At 3 o'clock in the afternoon, we reached our destined port at Skeenesborough, being the head of navigation for our gallies. Here we were unsuspecting of danger, but behold! Burgoyne himself was at our heels. In less than two hours we were struck with surprise and consternation by a discharge of cannon from the enemy's fleet on our gallies and batteaux lying at the wharf. By uncommon efforts and industry they had broken through the bridge, boom and chain, which cost our people such immense labor, and had almost overtaken us on the lake, and horridly disastrous indeed would have been our fate. It was not long before it was perceived that a number of their troops and savages had landed and were rapidly advancing towards our little party.

The officers of our guard now attempted to rally the men and form them in battle array; but this was found impossible, every effort proved unavailing, and in the utmost panic they were seen to fly in every direction for personal safety. In this desperate condition, I perceived our officers scampering for their baggage; I ran to the batteau, seized my chest, carried it a short distance, took from it a few articles, and instantly followed in the train of our retreating party. We took the route to Fort Ann through a narrow defile in the woods, and were so closely pressed by the pursuing enemy that we frequently heard calls from the rear to "march on, the Indians are at our heels." Having marched all night, we reached Fort Ann at 5 o'clock in the morning, where we found provisions for our refreshment. A small rivulet called Wood Creek is navigable from Skeenesborough to Fort Ann, by which means some of our invalids and baggage made their escape; but all our cannon [and] provisions and the bulk of our baggage, with several invalids, fell into the enemy's hands.

On the 7th instant, we received a small reenforcement from Fort Edward by order of Major General Schuyler, and on discovering that a detachment of the enemy under command of Colonel Hill had arrived in our vicinity, a party from our fort was ordered to attack them in their covert in the woods. The two parties were soon engaged in a smart skirmish, which continued for several hours and resulted greatly to our honor and advantage; the enemy, being almost surrounded, were on the point of surrendering, when our ammunition being expended, and a party of Indians arriving and setting up the war whoop, this being followed by three cheers from their friends the English, the Americans were induced to give way and retreat. One surgeon, with a wounded captain and twelve or fifteen privates, were taken and brought into our fort. The surgeon informed me that he was in possession of books, etc., taken from my chest at Skeensborough, and, singular to relate, some of the British prisoners obtained in the same manner, and had in their pockets, a number of private letters which I had received from a friend in Massachusetts, and which were now returned to me.

Fort Ann being a small picket fort of no importance, orders were given to set it on fire, and on the 8th we departed for Fort Edward, situated about 30 miles southward on the banks of the Hudson River.

General St. Clair, with his main army from Ticonderoga, took a circuitous route through the woods to Hubbardtown and Castleton, in the New Hampshire Grants, and being pursued by a strong detachment from Burgoyne's army, his rear guard, commanded by Colonel Francis, was overtaken, and on the 7th instant a very close and severe engagement took place, in which bloody conflict the brave Colonel Francis fell with other valuable officers, while fighting with distinguished gallantry. The Americans made an honorable defence, and finally a secure retreat. We lost in this action about three hundred, in killed, wounded and prisoners. The enemy, according to estimation, about two hundred. On the 12th, General St. Clair arrived here [Fort Edward] with the remains of his army, greatly distressed and worn down by fatigue.

General Schuyler is commander at this post; he has a small army of continentials and militia, and is making every possible exertion, by taking up bridges, throwing obstructions in the roads and passes by fallen trees, etc., to impede the march of Burgoyne's army towards Albany. He has also issued a spirited proclamation to counteract the effects of that from General Burgoyne.

The abandonment of Ticonderoga and Mount Independence has occasioned the greatest surprise and alarm. No event could be more unexpected nor more severely felt throughout our army and country. This disaster has given to our cause a dark and gloomy aspect, but our affairs are not desperate, and our exertions ought to be in proportion to our misfortunes and our exigencies. The conduct of General St. Clair on this occasion has rendered him very unpopular, and subjected him to general censure and reproach; there are some, indeed, who even accuse him of treachery; but time and calm investigation must decide whether he can vindicate himself as a judicious and prudent commander. There is much reason to suppose that neither the strength of Burgoyne's army nor the weakness of our garrison were properly considered or generally understood. It must be universally conceded that when the enemy had effected their great object by hoisting cannon from tree to tree till they reached the summit of Sugar-Loaf Hill, the situation of our garrison had become perilous in the extreme. General Schuyler is not altogether free from public reprehension, alleging that he ought in duty to have been present at Ticonderoga during the critical period.

It is predicted by some of our well informed and respectable characters that this event, apparently so calamitous, will ultimately prove advantageous, by drawing the British army into the heart of our country, and thereby place them more immediately within our power.

—THACHER, Military Journal, pp. 83-86.

IV. BURGOYNE'S FIRST SERIOUS BLUNDER

In his eagerness to catch up with the American forces at Fort Edward, Burgoyne plowed his way to Skenesborough, where he was induced by the Tory land proprietor, Philip Skene, to continue south on an overland route rather than return to Ticonderoga and approach Fort Edward by way of Lake George. His stores and heavy cannon were sent, however, by water. Perhaps Skene's advice was not unmotivated by his interest in having the British army build a road which would link his undeveloped property with the settlement to the south.

This was Burgoyne's first serious blunder. His march of 23 miles from Skenesborough to Ford Edward lay through a trackless wilderness, thick woods interspersed with streams and boggy marshland. Schuyler's woodmen contributed to stalling the British war machine by felling trees along the route. Burgoyne did not reach Fort Edward until July 30. It took him 24 days to travel 23 miles.

THE BRITISH FIND THAT NOT ALL THE REBELS ARE POLTROONS

Journal of Lieutenant James M. Hadden of the Royal Artillery.

July 12th. Brig. Gen'l Frazer and the corps detached at Castleton, etc., joined the army at Skeensborough. One German and one British regiment were left in garrison at Mount Independence and Tyconderoga. Governor Skeene was appointed to act as Commissioner and to administer the oaths of allegiance, and grant certificates to such inhabitants as sue properly for the same, and regulate all other matters relative to the supplies and assistances required from the country or voluntarily brought in. It was determined by Gen'l Burgoyne that all the provisions and stores, artillery, etc. (except one Light Brigade) should be passed over Lake George to the right, under the escort of one regiment and the corps of Royal Artillery; as the enemy had vessels on this lake, a sufficient number of the gun boats were kept armed and clear for action; the rest were loaded with stores and provisions. The army was to pass by Fort Anne carrying with them through Wood Creek as many batteaux as would be necessary to transport their provisions down the Hudsons River.

After the action at or near Fort Anne, the 9th Regiment were withdrawn and, joining the army at Skeensborough, no other detachment was sent out, and the enemy, though not victorious, were the real gainers by this affair; the advantage they made of it was to fell large trees across Wood Creek and the road leading by the side of it to Fort Anne, the clearing of which cost the army much labour and time, and gave the enemy spirrits and leisure to wait those reinforcements which enabled them to retire deliberately, always keeping near enough to prevent our sending out small detachments: a large corps advanced to Fort Anne (in place of the 9th Regiment) would have encreased the enemies fears and prevented these delays. The proper corps for this purpose had taken another route (General Frazer's), and whatever footing the general might wish to put the action near Huberton upon, that corps certainly discovered that neither they were invincible nor the Rebels all poltroons. On the contrary many of them acknowledged the enemy behaved well, and looked upon General Reidesel's fortunate arrival as a matter absolutely necessary.

This éclaircissement should have taken place when something more than honor was to be gained. We were now at Skeensborough, having lost near 200 men, and this post was gained with the loss of one officer and one volunteer, all our other posts being relinquished, and the communications in front to be repaired before we could proceed.

—HADDEN, Journal, pp. 93-95.

V. THE JENNY MCCREA ATROCITY

A few days before Burgoyne's army took over abandoned Fort Edward an atrocity was committed that did more to arouse the whole North Country against Burgoyne than any other incident of the campaign. A young woman named Jane McCrea was captured by some of Burgoyne's Indians, shot, scalped, and the clothing stripped from her body. Her murderer, reputed to be an Indian appropriately named Wyandot Panther, took the scalp to the British camp. Fearful that his Indians would desert were he to execute the culprit as he originally had intended, Burgoyne pardoned Wyandot. The fact that there were many other atrocities, involving whole families of setters, that Jane McCrea was a Tory sympathizer, and that she was affianced to an officer of Burgoyne's Tory contingent, did not in the least abate the indignation of the Patriots.

Upon relieving Schuyler of command, Gates filed a formal protest with Burgoyne. This was one of Gates's best efforts in the whole campaign and he was pleased with his handiwork. I "gave him [Burgoyne] a Tickler upon Scalping," he wrote Governor Trumbull on September 4. Burgoyne's disavowals were ineffectual. Washington saw to it that the story of Jenny McCrea was kept alive. He wrote urging the Massachusetts and Connecticut militia to "repel an enemy from your borders, who, not content with hiring mercenaries to lay waste your country, have now brought savages, with the avowed and expressed intention of adding murder to desolation."

1. A BRITISH OFFICER LAMENTS THE MURDER OF JENNY MCCREA

Journal of Lieutenant William Digby of the Shropshire Regiment.

July 24th. We marched from Skeensborough, and tho but 15 miles to Fort Anne, were two days going it, as the enemy had felled large trees over the river, which there turned so narrow as not to allow more than one battow abreast, from whence we were obliged to cut a road through the wood, which was attended with great fatigue and labour, for our wagons and artillery. Our heavy cannon went over Lake George, as it was impossible to bring them [over] the road we made, and were to join us near Fort Edward, in case the enemy were to stand us at that place, it being a good road for cannon and about 16 miles. Fort Anne is a place of no great strength, having only a block house, which though strong against small arms is not proof against cannon.

We saw many of their dead unburied, since the action of the 8th, which caused a violent stench. One officer of the 9th regiment, Lieut Westrop, was then unburied, and from the smell we could only cover him with leaves. At that action, the 9th took their colours, which were intended as a present to their Colonel Lord Ligonier. They were very handsome, a flag of the United States, 13 stripes alternate red and white, [with thirteen stars] in a blue field representing a new constellation.

In the evening, our Indians brought in two scalps, one of them an officer's which they danced about in their usual manner. Indeed, the cruelties committed by them were too shocking to relate, particularly the melancholy catastrophe of the unfortunate Miss McCrea, which affected the general and the whole army with the sincerest regret and concern for her untimely fate. This young lady was about 18, had a pleasing person, her family were loyal to the King, and she engaged to be married to a provincial officer in our army before the war broke out. Our Indians (I may well now call them Savages) were detached on scouting parties, both in our front and on our flanks, and came to the house where she resided; but the scene is too tragic for my pen. She fell a sacrifice to the savage passions of these blood thirsty monsters, for the particulars of which I shall refer the reader to General Burgoyne's letter, dated 3rd September, to General Gates. . . .

I make no doubt but the censorious world, who seldom judge but by outward appearances, will be apt to censure Gen Burgoyne for the cruelties committed by his Indians, and imagine he countenanced them in so acting. On the contrary, I am pretty certain it was always against his desire to give any assistance to the savages.

2. GATES AND BURGOTNE DEBATE THE RESPONSIBILITY FOR HER FATE

A. GENERAL HORATIO GATES TO BURGOTNE

U. S. Headquarters, September 2, 1777

Last Night I had the honor to receive Your Excellencys letter of the 1st instant. I am astonished you should mention inhumanity, or threaten retaliation; nothing happened in the action at Bennington but what is common when works are carried by assault.

That the savages of America should in their warfare mangle and scalp the unhappy prisoners who fall into their hands, is neither new nor extraordinary; but that the famous Lieutenant General Burgoyne, in whom the fine Gentleman is united with the Soldier and the Scholar, should hire the savages of America to scalp Europeans and the descendants of Europeans, nay more, that he should pay a price for each scalp so barbarously taken, is more than will be believed in Europe, untill authenticated facts shall, in every Gazette, convince mankind of the truth of the horrid fate.

Miss McCrea, a young lady lovely to the sight, of virtuous character and amiable disposition, engaged to be married to an officer in your Army, was with other women and children taken out of a house near Fort-Edward, carried into the woods, and there scalped and mangled in a most shocking manner. Two parents, with their six children, were all treated with the same inhumanity, while quietly residing in their once happy and peaceful dwelling. The miserable fate of Miss McCrea was particularly aggravated by her being dressed to receive her promised husband, but met her murderer employed by you. Upwards of one hundred men, women and children have perished by the hands of the ruffians to whom it is asserted you have paid the price of blood. [The next sentence, crossed out but still clearly legible, reads: "The law of retaliation is a just law, and you must expect to feel its force."]

Inclosed are letters from your wounded officers, prisoners in my hands. By them you will be informed of the generosity of their conquerors. Such money, cloathing, attendants and others necessities which your Excy pleases to send to the prisoners, shall be faithfully delivered. The late Colonel Baulm's servant is at Benington and would have come to Your Excellency's camp, but when I offered him a flagg, he was affraid to run the risque of being scalped, and declined going. When I know what surgeon and attendants Your Excellency is desirous of sending to Benington, I shall despatch an officer to your lines to conduct them to my camp.

B. GENERAL BURGOTNE TO GATES

September 6, 1777

I received your letter of the 2: instant and in consequence of your compliance with my proposal of sending a surgeon to visit the wounded officers in your hands, and some servants to carry money and necessities to their masters and to remain with them, I have now to desire the favor of you to dispatch the officer you design with a drum. . . .

It has happened that all my transactions with the Indian Nations, last year and this, have been open; clearly heard; distinctly understood; accurately minuted by very numerous and, in many part, very unprejudiced audiences. So diametrically opposite to truth is your assertion that I have paid a price for scalps that one of the first regulations established by me at the great Council in May, and repeated and enforced and invariably adhered to since, was that the Indians should receive compensation for prisoners because it would prevent cruelty, and that not only such compensation should be withheld, but a strict Account demanded, for scalps—those pledges of conquest, for such you well know they will ever esteem them—were solemnly and peremptorily prohibited to be taken from the wounded and even the dying, and the persons of aged men, women, children and prisoners were pronounced sacred even in assaults.

In regard to Miss McCrea, her fate wanted not of the tragic display you have labored to give it to make it as sincerely abhorred and lamented by me as it can be by the tenderest of her friends. The fact was no premeditated barbarity. On the contrary two chiefs who had brought her off for the purposes of security, not of violence to her person, disputed which should be her guard; and in a fit of savage passion in the one from whose hands she was snatched, the unhappy woman became the victim. Upon the first intelligence of this event I obliged the Indians to deliver the murderer into my hands; and tho to have punished him by our laws or principles of justice would have been perhaps unprecedented, he certainly should have suffered an ignominious death had I not been convinced by circumstances and observation, beyond the possibility of a doubt, that a pardon, under the forms which I prescribed and they accepted, would be more efficacious than an execution to prevent similar mischiefs.

The above instance excepted, your intelligence respecting cruelties of the Indians is false.

VI. THE ROUT OF ST. LEGER

While Burgoyne's ponderous war machine was lumbering southward through the forests, a mixed force of some 1,800 men, mostly Tories and Indians, under Colonel Barry St. Leger pushed eastward from Fort Oswego on Lake Ontario to rendezvous with Burgoyne in Albany. On the third of August St. Leger reached Fort Stanwix (renamed Fort Schuyler) on the Mohawk River, the present site of Rome, New York. The fall of that fortress would have opened the gates to Albany some 110 miles away and trapped the American army in between the two British expeditions.

Here St. Leger encountered his first serious resistance. He had not reckoned on the fighting spirit of Colonel Peter Gansevoort and the 750 men who manned the stronghold, nor on the caution and restlessness of his Indian allies. On August 6 General Nicholas Herkimer, with some 800 militiamen marching to the fort's relief, was caught in an ambush at Oriskany by a force of Indians and Tories led by the Mohawk chief Joseph Brant. Suffering at the outset of the battle a wound that was to prove fatal, Herkimer drew his men together on high ground and fought back fiercely. Total disaster was averted when the Indians, alarmed by firing from Fort Schuyler where the garrison had made a sortie against the British camp, broke off the engagement. The Indians, as the account of Lieutenant Bird reveals, had already proved restless and unreliable. Herkimer managed to retreat eastward with less than half his original strength.

Schuyler now dispatched Benedict Arnold from Stillwater with a force of 1,000 volunteers to relieve the desperately besieged garrison. Even though his men never caught up with the British expedition, Arnold was able to raise the siege and rout St. Leger. It so happened that an eccentric, half-mad inhabitant of the Mohawk Valley named Hon Yost Schuyler, whose father was a cousin of General Schuyler and whose mother was Herkimer's sister, was captured by Arnold's men while attempting a recruiting rally behind American lines. Sentenced to death as a spy, Hon Yost was let off on condition that he use his special powers among the red men (his notorious ravings had given him the status of a prophet) to make St. Leger's Indians desert. Hon Yost's deception came in the nick of time, for the British were close enough to the fort to begin digging a tunnel to place mines beneath the wall. Our old friend James Thacher tells the incredible story.

1. A "CONTINENTAL FLAG" DEFIANTLY FLOATS OVER FORT SCHUYLER

Journal of William Colbraith, a soldier in Colonel Gansevoort's regiment at Fort Schuyler.

Aug. 1st.—Three Oneida Indians came express from their castle informing us that they had seen three strange Indians, who told them that there were 100 more at the Royal Block House, and that they were to march for this place. Supposing them to be a party sent to cut off communications, the Colonel detached 100 men under command of Captain Beschoten and three subalterns to meet the bateaux that were hourly expected, in order to reinforce the guard sent with them from Fort Dayton.

Aug. 2d.—Four bateaux arrived, being those the party went to meet, having a guard of 100 men of Colonel Weston's regiment from Fort Dayton, under the command of Lieut. Col. Mellon of that regiment. The lading being brought safe into the fort, guard marched in, when our sentinels on the southwest bastion discovered the enemy's fires in the woods near Fort Newport, upon which the troops ran to their respective alarm posts; at this time we discovered some men running from the landing toward the garrison. On their coming they informed us that the bateaux men who had staid behind when the guard marched into the fort had been fired on by the enemy at the landing, that two of them were wounded, the master of the bateaux taken prisoner, and one man missing.

Aug. 3d.—Early this morning a Continental flag, made by the officers of Colonel Gansevoort's regiment, was hoisted and a cannon leveled at the enemy's camp was fired on the occasion. A small party was sent to the landing to see if the enemy had destroyed any of our bateaux last night. This party found the bateaux man that was missing, wounded through the brain, stabbed in the right breast and scalped. He was alive when found and brought to the garrison, but died shortly after. The bateaux lay at the landing no ways damaged. About 3 o'clock this afternoon the enemy showed themselves to the garrison on all sides, carried off some hay from a field near the garrison, at which a flag brought by Captain Tice came into the fort with a proffer of protection if the garrison would surrender, which was rejected with disdain.

Aug. 4th.—A continual firing of small arms was this day kept up by the enemy's Indians, who advanced within gunshot of the fort, in small parties under cover of bushes, weeds and potatoes in the garden. Colonel Mellon and his party of 100 men, who came from Fort Dayton as a guard to the bateaux, was to have returned this day, but we were now besieged and all communication cut off for the present. The firing ended with the close of the day, we having one man killed and six wounded. This night we sent out a party and brought 27 stacks of hay into the trench and set a barn and house on fire belonging to Mr. Roof.

Aug. 5th.—A continual firing was kept up by the savages. One of our men was shot dead on the northeast bastion. The enemy set fire to the new barracks standing about 100 yards from this fort, between four and five o'clock this afternoon.

Aug. 6th.—This morning the Indians were seen going off from around the garrison towards the landing; as they withdrew we had not much firing. Being uneasy lest the Tories should report that the enemy had taken the fort, Lieut. Diefendorf was ordered to get ready to set off for Albany this evening to inform General Schuyler of our situation, but between nine and ten this morning three militia men arrived here with a letter from General Harkeman [Herkimer] wherein he writes that he had arrived at Orisco [Oriskany] with 1,000 militia, in order to relieve the garrison and open communication, which was then entirely blocked up, and that if the colonel should hear a firing of small arms, desired he would send a party from the garrison to reinforce him. General Harkeman desired that the colonel would fire three cannon, if the three men got safe into the fort with his letter, which was done and followed by three cheers by the whole garrison.

According to General Harkeman's request the colonel detached two hundred men and one field piece under command of Lieut. Col. Willett with orders to proceed down the road to meet the General's party; having marched half a mile, they came upon an encampment of the enemy which they totally routed, and plundered them of as much baggage as the soldiers could carry. Their loss is supposed to be between fifteen and twenty killed. The number of wounded, who got off, is unknown. They took four prisoners, three of whom were wounded, and Mr. Singleton of Montreal, who says he is a lieutenant, without the loss of one man killed or wounded.

Our party returned immediately and brought in a number of blankets, brass kettles, powder and ball, a variety of clothes and Indian trinkets and hard cash, together with four scalps the Indians had lately taken, being entirely fresh and left in their camp. Two of the scalps taken are supposed to be those of the girls, being neatly dressed and the hair plaited. A bundle of letters was found in the enemy's camp, which had been sent by one Luke Cassidy for this garrison, who it is supposed is either killed or taken; the letters were not broke open. Four colours were also taken and immediately hoisted on our flagstaff under the Continental flag, as trophies of victory.

By our prisoners we learn that the enemy are 1210 strong, 250 British regulars, that they are all arrived and have with them two six-pounders, two three-pounders and four royals. We also learn that they were attacked by our militia on this side of Orisko, that they drove the militia back, killed some and took several prisoners, but the enemy had many killed.

2. HERKIMER'S RELIEF FORCE IS ROUTED AT ORISKANY

Lieutenant Colonel Barry St. Leger to General Burgoyne.

Oswego, August 27, 1777

On the 5th [of August], in the evening, intelligence arrived by my discovering parties on the Mohawk River, that a reinforcement of eight hundred militia, conducted by General Herkimer, were on their march to relieve the garrison, and were actually at that instant at Oriska, an Indian settlement twelve miles from the fort. The garrison being apprised of their march by four men, who were seen to enter the fort in the morning through what was thought an impenetrable swamp, I did not think it prudent to wait for them and thereby subject myself to be attacked by a sally from the garrison in the rear, while the reinforcement employed me in front. I therefore determined to attack them on the march, either openly or covertly, as circumstances should offer. At this time I had not two hundred and fifty of the King's troops in camp, the various and extensive operations I was under an absolute necessity of entering into having employed the rest; and therefore could not send above eighty white men, rangers and troops included, with the whole corps of Indians.

Sir John Johnson put himself at the head of this party, and began his march that evening at five o'clock, and met the rebel corps at the same hour next morning. The impetuosity of the Indians is not to be described; on the sight of the enemy (forgetting the judicious disposition formed by Sir John, and agreed to by themselves, which was to suffer the attack to begin with the troops in front, while they should be on both flanks and rear), they rushed in, hatchet in hand, and thereby gave the enemy's rear an opportunity to escape.

In relation to the victory, it was equally complete as if the whole had fallen; nay, more so, as the two hundred who escaped only served to spread the panic wider; but it was not so with the Indians; their loss was great (I must be understood Indian computation, being only about thirty killed, and the like number wounded, and in that number some of their favorite chiefs and confidential warriors were slain). On the enemy's side, almost all their principal leaders were slain. General Herkimer has since died of his wounds.

It is proper to mention that the four men detached with intelligence of the march of the reinforcement set out the evening before the action, and consequently the enemy could have no account of the defeat, and were in possession only of the time appointed for their arrival; at which, as I suspected, they made a sally with two hundred and fifty men towards Lieutenant Bird's post, to facilitate the entrance of the relieving corps, or bring on a general engagement, with every advantage they could wish.

Captain Hoyes was immediately detached to cut in upon their rear, while they engaged the lieutenant. Immediately upon the departure of Captain Hoyes, having learned that Lieutenant Bird, misled by the information of a cowardly Indian that Sir John was pressed, had quitted his post to march to his assistance, I marched the detachment of the King's Regiment in support of Captain Hoyes by a road in sight of the garrison, which, with executive fire from his party, immediately drove the enemy into the fort, without any farther advantage than frightening some squaws and pilfering the packs of the warriors which they left behind them.

After this affair was over, orders were immediately given to compleat a two-gun battery and mortar beds, with three strong redoubts in their rear, to enable me, in case of another attempt to relieve the garrison by their regimented troops, to march out a larger body of the King's troops.

3. THE COUNTERATTACK TO RELIEVE HERKIMER

Narrative of Colonel Marinus Willett, Gansevoort's second in command.

German Flatts, August 11, 1777

About eleven o'clock [Wednesday, August 6th] three men got into the fort [Schuyler], who brought a letter from General Harkaman of the Tryon County militia, advising us that he was at Eriska (8 miles off) with part of his militia, and proposed to force his way to the fort for our relief. In order to render him what service we could in his march, it was agreed that I should make a sally from the fort with 250 men, consisting of one half Gansevoort's, one half Massachusetts ditto, and one field piece (an iron three-pounder).

. . . Nothing could be more fortunate than this enterprise. We totally routed two of the enemy's encampments, destroyed all the provisions that were in them, brought off upwards of 50 brass kettles and more than 100 blankets (two articles which were much needed), with a quantity of muskets, tomahawks, spears, ammunition, clothing, deerskins, a variety of Indian affairs and 5 colours. . . . The Indians took chiefly to the woods, the rest of the troops then at their posts to the river. . . . I was happy in preventing the men from scalping even the Indians, being desirous, if possible, to teach even the savages humanity; but the men were much better employed, and kept in excellent order. . . .

From these prisoners [some Oneida Indians] we received the first accounts of General Harkaman's militia being ambushed on their march, and of a severe battle they had with them about two hours before, which gave reason to think they had for the present given up their design of marching to the fort.

4. "WE WILL DEFEND THE FORT TO THE LAST EXTREMITY"

Journal of William Colbraith.

Aug. 8th.—The enemy threw some shells at us to-day, but did no damage, and in order to return the compliment, they were saluted with a few balls from our cannon. About 5 o'clock this evening Colonel Butler, with a British captain and a doctor from the enemy, came to the garrison with a flag, whose message from Gen. St. Leger was that the Indians, having lost some of their chiefs in a skirmish with our party that sallied out on the 6th inst., were determined to go down the Mohawk River and destroy the women and children; also that they would kill every man in the garrison when they got in; that Gen. St. Leger had held a council with them for two days in order to prevent them, but all to no purpose, unless we would surrender. The general therefore, as an act of humanity, and to prevent the effusion of blood, begged we would deliver up the fort, and promised if we did, not a hair of our heads should be hurt. A letter also came by them (as they say) from Mr. Fry and Colonel Bellinger, whom they took in the fray with the militia, begging us to surrender, telling us our communication was cut off, that the enemy had a large parcel of fine troops and an excellent park of artillery, and further, that they expected General Burgoyne was in Albany, and could see no hopes of our having any succor, as the militia had many killed and taken.

The answer to the general's tender and compassionated (?) letter was deferred until to-morrow morning at 9 o'clock, and a cessation of arms agreed to by both parties till then. Late this evening a party was sent to get water for the garrison, with a guard. One of the guards deserted from us, but left his firelock behind. One of our sentinels fired at him but missed him. Our guard heard the enemy's sentinels challenge him twice and fire on him. Colonel Willett and Lieutenant Stockwell went out of the garrison at one o'clock in the morning on a secret expedition.

Aug. 9th.—Agreeable to the proposals of yesterday between Colonel Gansevoort and Brigadier General St. Leger, a flag was sent out to him requesting him to send his demand in writing and the Colonel would send him an answer, which request he agreed to. The demands in writing was the same in substance with that verbally delivered yesterday by Colonel Butler, to which the Colonel returned for answer: That he was determined to defend the fort in favor of the United States to the last extremity.*

Upon receiving the answer hostilities again commenced by a number of shot and small arms on their side which were not suffered with impunity on ours. This day the Colonel ordered all the provisions to be brought upon the parade for fear of shells setting fire to the barracks and destroying it; also all the public papers and money in the hands of Mr. Hansen and the papers in the hands of Mr. Van Veghten belonging to the paymaster to be lodged in the bombproof in the S. W. bastion. The enemy began to bombard us at half past ten this evening and continued till daylight; their shells were very well directed. They killed one man and wounded another, both of our regiment. None killed or wounded through the day.

* Gansevoort's exact words: "I have only to say that it is my determined resolution, with the forces under my command, to defend this fort, at every hazard, to the last extremity, in behalf of the United American States, who have placed me here to defend it against all their enemies."—W. W. Campbell. Annals of Tryon County, p. 80.

5. THE INDIANS LEAVE THEIR ALLY IN THE LURCH

Journal of James Thacher, doctor with the Continental Army.

[August, 1777]. An object which cannot be accomplished by force is often obtained by means of stratagem. Lieutenant Colonel John Brooks, an intelligent officer from Massachusetts, being in advance [of Arnold's party marching to relieve Fort Schuyler] with a small detachment, fortunately found one Major Butler, a noted officer among the Indians, endeavoring to influence the inhabitants in their favor, and he was immediately secured. A man also by the name of Cuyler [Hon Yost Schuyler], who was proprietor of a handsome estate in the vicinity, was taken up as a spy.

Colonel Brooks proposed that he should be employed as a deceptive messenger to spread the alarm and induce the enemy to retreat. General Arnold soon after arrived and approved the scheme of Colonel Brooks; it was accordingly agreed that Cuyler should be liberated and his estate secured to him on the condition that he would return to the enemy and make such exaggerated report of General Arnold's force as to alarm and put them to flight. Several friendly Indians being present, one of their head men advised that Cuyler's coat should be shot through in two or three places to add credibility to his story.

Matters being thus adjusted, the impostor proceeded directly to the Indian camp, where he was well known, and informed their warriors that Major Butler was taken, and that himself narrowly escaped, several shots having passed through his coat, and that General Arnold with a vast force was advancing rapidly towards them. In aid of the project, a friendly Indian followed and arrived about an hour after with a confirmation of Cuyler's report.

This stratagem was successful: the Indians instantly determined to quit their ground and make their escape, nor was it in the power of St. Leger and Sir John [Johnson] with all their art of persuasion to prevent it. When St. Leger remonstrated with them, the reply of the chiefs was, "When we marched down, you told us there would be no fighting for us Indians; we might go down and smoke our pipes; but now a number of our warriors have been killed, and you mean to sacrifice us." The consequence was that St. Leger, finding himself deserted by his Indians, to the number of seven or eight hundred, deemed his situation so hazardous that he decamped in the greatest hurry and confusion, leaving his tents with most of his artillery and stores in the field. General Arnold with his detachment was now at liberty to return to the main army at Stillwater; and thus have we clipped the right wing of General Burgoyne.

In the evening, while on their retreat, St. Leger and Sir John got into a warm altercation, criminating each other for the ill success of their expedition. Two Sachems, observing this, resolved to have a laugh at their expense. In their front was a bog of clay and mud; they directed a young warrior to loiter in the rear, and then on a sudden run as if alarmed, calling out, "They are coming, they are coming." On hearing this, the two commanders in a fright took to their heels, rushing into the bog, frequently falling and sticking in the mud, and the men threw away their packs and hurried off. This and other jokes were several times repeated during the night for many miles.

VII. THE HESSIAN DISASTER AT BENNINGTON

As Burgoyne's lines of communication lengthened, the obstacles which Schuyler's men had placed in the way of the British advance and the scorched-earth policy which the Yorker had put into effect began to yield rich dividends but before he could enjoy the fruit of his victory, Schuyler was removed from command largely as a result of dissatisfaction with him on the part of New Englanders in Congress and not a little as a result of the intrigues of Horatio Gates, who now replaced him. In a letter to his friend Gouverneur Morris, member of the Council of Safety, Schuyler compared his treatment at the hands of Congress with that of "a young Jewess" before the Spanish Inquisition.

Meantime Burgoyne's supply problem had become alarming. Learning that the Americans had collected horses at the village of Bennington in near-by Vermont, Burgoyne dispatched some 700 men, mostly Hessians and Indians, under the command of Lieutenant Colonel Friedrich Baum, to capture them, particularly to seize horses for the footsore Hessian dragoons. Burgoyne had not reckoned on the appearance of a new American military luminary, General John Stark, nor on the gullibility of his Hessian commander. Fortunately, as events turned out, Stark, who regarded his New Hampshire brigade as an independent force, had flatly refused to march his troops to reinforce Schuyler. Now they were available where they could do the most damage.

The battle, brilliantly described by a Hessian officer, was disastrous to Burgoyne, as virtually Baum's entire force, save for the Indians who fled, were killed or captured. Reinforcements for Baum under Lieutenant Colonel Breymann came up too late. They in turn were attacked by Stark, now reinforced by Seth Warner, leading 400 veteran Massachusetts troops. With the loss of a third of his 650 men, Breymann fell back on Burgoyne.

An aged veteran of the Battle of Bennington described how the provincial New England soldiers must have looked to the smartly dressed Hessian horseless dragoons:

To a man, they wore small-clothes, coming down and fastening just below the knee, and long stockings with cowhide shoes ornamented by large buckles, while not a pair of boots graced the company. The coats and waistcoats were loose and of huge dimensions, with colors as various as the barks of oak, sumach and other trees of our hills and swamps could make them, and their shirts were all made of flax and, like every other part of the dress, were homespun. On their heads was worn a large round-top and broad-brimmed hat. Their arms were as various as their costume. Here an old soldier carried a heavy Queen's Arm, with which he had done service at the conquest of Canada twenty years previous, while by his side walked a stripling boy, with a Spanish fusee not half its weight or calibre, which his grandfather may have taken at the Havana, while not a few had old French pieces that dated back to the reduction of Louisburg. Instead of the cartridge box, a large powder horn was slung under the arm, and occasionally a bayonet might be seen bristling in the ranks. Some of the swords of the officers had been made by our Province blacksmiths, perhaps from some farming utensil; they looked serviceable, but heavy and uncouth. [Frederic Kidder, History of New Ipswich, p. 95.]

An odd ensemble, indeed, but to the surprised Hessians the effect was lethal. As an unnamed American correspondent, reported in Almon's Remembrancer, put it, Saturday August 16 was a "memorable" day in American military annals, and "General Starke will be endeared to us forever." After rain had intervened to prevent any more than skirmishing on the fifteenth, the Yankee leader was reputed to have declared he would beat the invader or "before night Molly Stark would be a widow." The pledge was kept.

1. "MY CRIME CONSISTS IN NOT BEING A NEW ENGLAND MAN"

General Philip Schuyler to Gouverneur Morris.

Albany, September 7, 1777

The day before yesterday I was favored with yours of the 24th August. I thank you for sympathizing with me on my removal from the command in this department at a time when our affairs were at the worst and when no change could happen but what must be for the best. Congress I find faults me for painting in strong colours the situation we were in, and yet I dare say if I had not done it and any capital misfortune had happened they would have asked why they had not been truly informed. But my crime consists in not being a New England man in principle, and unless they alter theirs I hope I never shall be. Gen. Gates is their idol because he is at their direction.

If an enquiry into my conduct had not been ordered I should have resigned the moment Gates relieved me, but as soon as that has taken place I shall certainly quit. Of this I have advised Congress. I believe a certain set will wish that they had not urged for an enquiry. I shall make my defense in such a manner as that the public may see what has been my conduct, and what that of others, and then they may judge for themselves, and I trust they will easily discover that the cause of our misfortunes in this department has originated where they perhaps little expect it did.

When Gen. Gates took the command I informed him that I had advised Congress that I should remain some time in the department to afford him any assistance in my power and intreated he would call upon whomever he thought proper. He has however not done it. He sent for Gen. Ten Broeck from town to a council of war but not for me. After that I could not with propriety give him my opinion of what ground he ought to possess if Burgoyne should retreat. What I intended to have done had I remained in the command and [been] reinforced I fully communicated to him, and shewed the order I had given Generals Lincoln and Arnold. Hitherto he has not, as I am informed, made any other disposition with the force he has which daily increases. He may certainly immediately oblige General Burgoyne to retire or oblige him to fight with great disadvantage, but Gates is totally ignorant of the country, and altho he may get people that can give him the best information, yet it falls vastly short of being personally well acquainted with the passes and profiles, of which every country has more or less. From this defect I fear every advantage will not be taken that might be. . . .

I am just now informed that Burgoyne has drawn all his troops from Skenesborough and Fort Ann. This with the bridge he has thrown over Hudson's River indicates that he means to attack our army. If Lincoln is within a day's march of Saratoga and is ordered that way, I wish Burgoyne may advance, and Gates too. If the latter takes post at Stillwater Lincoln might be [in] the rear of Burgoyne before he could attack Gates, in which case the British army must be totally ruined. Nor need we apprehend a want of provisions should Burgoyne be so posted as to render it imprudent to attack him, for there are means of sending on the supplies. If they escape the attention of Gates I will point them out.

2. BURGOYNE DISPATCHES HIS HESSIANS TO BENNINGTON

Account of the expedition by a Hessian officer named Glich.

August 16, 1777

That these advantages [resulting from St. Leger's advance], trifling as they were, might not be wholly wasted, it became incumbent on Gen. Burgoyne to advance without delay; whilst the deplorable deficiency in the means of transport, under which he labored, seemed to render all attempts at moving the army fruitless. Though our troops had toiled without intermission during three whole weeks, there was in camp no greater stock of provisions than sufficed for four days consumption; and to move forward with a supply so slender into a desert country appeared to a leader of the old school little better than insanity.

I have called it a desert country, not only with reference to its natural sterility—and heaven knows it was sterile enough—but because of the pains which were taken, and unfortunately with too great success, to sweep its few cultivated spots of all articles likely to benefit the invaders. In doing this the enemy showed no decency either to friend or foe. All the fields of standing corn were laid waste, the cattle were driven away, and every particle of grain, as well as morsel of grass, carefully removed; so that we could depend for subsistence, both for men and horses, only upon the magazines which we might ourselves establish. But our draft animals were so inadequate to the conveyance of stores that no magazine had as yet been formed farther in advance than Fort George; and Fort George was too much in the rear to be of service as a base of operations, after we should have quitted the position which we now occupied.

I have said that the American army retreated as we advanced, cutting up the roads and devastating the face of the country over which they passed. They were now, according to the best accounts which we could receive, at Saratoga, a hamlet, or rather farm, on the left bank of the Hudson and about half way between Fort Edward and the Mohawk. It seemed advisable to General Burgoyne to threaten them there; for if they wished an action, he had no apprehension as to the result; if they retired, Col. St. Ledger would be in their rear; and should they succeed in escaping both divisions, then was the road to Albany thrown open, and the principal design of the inroad attained. Increased exertions were accordingly used to bring a flotilla from the lakes to the nearest navigable point in the river; and so unremitting were they that before the close of the first week in August a considerable number of boats and barges, laden with such stores as could be forwarded, were launched upon the stream and ready to accompany the army.

Whilst these projects were in contemplation, and the above means adopted for bringing them to an issue, a piece of information was obtained at headquarters which promised to bring about the happiest results, by relieving us at once from all the embarrassments attendant upon meagre supplies and inadequate means of transport. About twenty miles to the eastward of the Hudson lies the obscure village of Bennington, a cluster of poor cottages situated in a wild country between the forks of the Hosac. Here the enemy had gathered together a considerable depot of cattle, cows, horses and wheel carriages, most of which were drawn across the Connecticut River from the provinces of New England; and as it was understood to be guarded by a party of militia only, an attempt to surprise it seemed by no means unjustifiable. It is true that between Fort Edward and Bennington the means of communication were exceedingly defective. One prodigious forest, bottomed in swamps and morasses, covered the whole face of the country, through which no body of men, unless accustomed to such expeditions, could hope to make their way, at all events with celerity. But the necessities of the army were pressing; the state of the campaign was a critical one; and the risk, though doubtless great, was considered by no means to outweigh the advantages to be derived from success. General Burgoyne determined to incur it; and a few hours sufficed for the final arrangement of his plan and drawing up of his instructions.

There were attached to our little army two hundred German dragoons, men of tried valor and enterprise, but destitute of horses. These the General selected as part of the force to be employed in the surprise of Bennington, not only because he entertained the most perfect confidence in their steadiness, but because he conceived that, in the country which they were about to penetrate, they might be able to pick up a sufficient number of horses for their own use. In addition to these, the Canadian rangers, a detachment of provincials, about one hundred Indians and Capt. Fraser's marksmen, with two pieces of small cannon, were allotted to their service; and the whole, amounting to five hundred men, were placed under the orders of Lieut. Col. Baume. The latter officer received special instructions to proceed with extreme caution. He was particularly enjoined to keep his dragoons together, and feel his way, foot by foot, with his light troops alone; and whilst it was broadly hinted that he might look for recruits among the well-disposed inhabitants, the greatest care was taken to impress him with the conviction that they were not to be implicitly trusted. It would have been well, both for himself and his followers, had these advices been somewhat more carefully remembered. But there was a fatality attending all our measures which soon began to develop itself; and perhaps the fate of the present expedition ought to have been taken as a fair warning of the destiny which awaited the army at large.

3. HOW A "LITTLE ARMY" OF FARMERS BEAT PROFESSIONAL TROOPS

General John Stark to General Horatio Gates.

Bennington, August 22, 1777

... I shall now give Your Honour a short and brief account of the action on the 13th inst. I was informed that there was a party of Indians in Cambridge on their march to this place. I sent Lieut. Colonel Greg of my brigade to stop them with 200 men. In the night I was informed by express that there was a large body of the enemy on their march in the rear of the Indians. I rallied all my brigade and what Militia was at this place in order to stop their proceedings. Likewise sent to Manchester to Colonel Warner's regiment that was stationed there; also sent expresses for the Militia to come in with all speed to our assistance, which was punctually obeyed. I then marched in company with Colonels Warner, Williams, Herrick and Brush, with all the men that were present. About 5 miles from this place I met Colonel Greg on his retreat and the enemy in close pursuit after him.

I drew up my little army in order of battle, but when the enemy hove in sight, they halted on a very advantageous hill or piece of ground. I sent out small parties in their front to skirmish with them, which scheme had a good effect. They killed and wounded thirty of the enemy without any loss on our side, but the ground that I was upon did [not] suit for a general action. I marched back about one mile and incamped. Called a counsel, and it was agreed that we should send two detachments in their rear, while the others attacked them in front. But the 15th it rained all day; therefore, had to lay by, could do nothing but skirmish with them.

On the 16th in the morning was joined by Colonel Simons with some Militia from Berkshire County. I pursued my plan, detached Colonel Nichols with 200 men to attack them in the rear. I also sent Colonel Herrick with 300 men in the rear of their right, both to join, and when joined to attack their rear. I likewise sent the Colonels Hubbard and Whitney with 200 men on their right, and sent 100 men in their front, to draw away their attention that way, and about 3 o'clock we got all ready for the attack. Colonel Nichols began the same, which was followed by all the rest. The remainder of my little army I pushed up in the front, and in a few minutes the action began. In general it lasted 2 hours, the hottest I ever saw in my life. It represented one continued clap of thunder. However the enemy was obliged to give way, and leave their field pieces and all their baggage behind them. They were all invironed within two breastworks, with their artillery. But our martial courage proved too hard for them.

I then gave orders to rally again, in order to secure the victory, but in a few minutes was informed that there was a large reinforcement on their march within two miles of us. Lucky for us, that moment Colonel Warner's regiment came up fresh, who marched on and began the attack afresh. I pushed forward as many of the men as I could to their assistance. The battle continued obstinate on both sides till sunset. The enemy was obliged to retreat. We pursued them till dark. But had daylight lasted one hour longer, we should have taken the whole body of them. We recovered 4 pieces of brass cannon, some hundred stands of arms, 8 brass barrells, drums, several Hessian swords, about seven hundred prisoners. 207 dead on the spot. The number of wounded is as yet unknown. That part of the enemy that made their escape marched all night, and we returned to our camp.

Too much honor cannot be given to the brave officers and soldiers for gallant behaviour. They fought through the midst of fire and smoke, mounted two breastworks that was well fortified and supported with cannon. I can't particularize any officer as they all behaved with the greatest spirit and bravery.

Colonel Warner's superior skill in the action was of extraordinary service to me. I would be glad he and his men could be recommended by Congress.

As I promised in my orders that the soldiers should have all the plunder taken in the enemy's camp, would be glad your Honour would send me word what the value of the cannon and the other artillery stores above described may be. Our loss was inconsiderable, about 40 wounded and thirty killed. I lost my horse, bridle and saddle in the action.

4. A HESSIAN OFFICER TELLS WHY THEY LOST THE BATTLE.

The Hessian Glich resumes his story of Bennington.

[August 16, 1777]. . . . The morning of the sixteenth rose beautifully serene; and it is not to the operation of the elements alone that my expression applies. All was perfectly quiet at the outposts, not an enemy having been seen nor an alarming sound heard for several hours previous to sunrise. So peaceable, indeed, was the aspect which matters bore that our leaders felt warmly disposed to resume the offensive without waiting the arrival of the additional corps for which they had applied; and orders were already issued for the men to eat their breakfasts, preparatory to more active operations. But the arms were scarcely piled and the haversacks unslung when symptoms of a state of affairs different from that which had been anticipated began to show themselves, and our people were recalled to their ranks in all haste, almost as soon as they had quitted them. From more than one quarter scouts came in to report that columns of armed men were approaching—though whether with friendly or hostile intention, neither their appearance nor actions enabled our informants to ascertain.

It has been stated that during the last day's march our little corps was joined by many of the country people, most of whom demanded and obtained arms, as persons friendly to the royal cause. How Colonel Baume became so completely duped as to place reliance on these men, I know not; but having listened with complacency to their previous assurances that in Bennington a large majority of the populace were our friends, he was somehow or other persuaded to believe that the armed bands, of whose approach he was warned, were loyalists on their way to make tender of their services to the leader of the king's troops. Filled with this idea, he dispatched positive orders to the outposts that no molestations should be offered to the advancing columns, but that the pickets retiring before them should join the main body, where every disposition was made to receive either friend or foe. Unfortunately for us, these orders were but too faithfully obeyed. About half past nine o'clock, I, who was not in the secret, beheld, to my utter amazement, our advanced parties withdraw without firing a shot from thickets which might have been maintained for hours against any superiority of numbers; and the same thickets occupied by men whose whole demeanor, as well as their dress and style of equipment, plainly and incontestably pointed them out as Americans.

I cannot pretend to describe the state of excitation and alarm into which our little band was now thrown. With the solitary exception of our leader, there was not a man among us who appeared otherwise than satisfied that those to whom he had listened were traitors, and that unless some prompt and vigorous measures were adopted, their treachery would be crowned with its full reward. . . .

We might have stood about half an hour under arms, watching the proceedings of a column of four or five hundred men, who, after dislodging the pickets, had halted just at the edge of the open country, when a sudden trampling of feet in the forest on our right, followed by the report of several muskets, attracted our attention. A patrol was instantly sent in the direction of the sound, but before the party composing it had proceeded many yards from the lines, a loud shout, followed by a rapid though straggling fire of musketry, warned us to prepare for a meeting the reverse of friendly. Instantly the Indians came pouring in, carrying dismay and confusion in their countenances and gestures. We were surrounded on all sides; columns were advancing everywhere against us, and those whom we had hitherto trusted as friends had only waited till the arrival of their support might justify them in advancing.

There was no falsehood in these reports, though made by men who spoke rather from their fears than their knowledge. The column in our front no sooner heard the shout than they replied cordially and loudly to it; then, firing a volley with deliberate and murderous aim, rushed furiously towards us. Now then, at length, our leader's dreams of security were dispelled. He found himself attacked in front and flanked by thrice his number, who pressed forward with the confidence which our late proceedings were calculated to produce, whilst the very persons in whom he had trusted, and to whom he had given arms, lost no time in turning them against him. These followers no sooner heard their comrades' cry than they deliberately discharged their muskets among Reidesel's dragoons and, dispersing before any steps could be taken to seize them, escaped, excepting one or two, to their friends.

If Col. Baume had permitted himself to be duped into a great error, it is no more than justice to confess that he exerted himself manfully to remedy the evil and avert its consequences. Our little band, which had hitherto remained in column, was instantly ordered to extend, and the troops lining the breast-works replied to the fire of the Americans with extreme celerity and considerable effect. So close and destructive, indeed, was our first volley that the assailants recoiled before it, and would have retreated, in all probability, within the woods; but ere we could take advantage of the confusion produced, fresh attacks developed themselves, and we were warmly engaged on every side and from all quarters. It became evident that each of our detached posts were about to be assailed at the same instant. No one of our dispositions had been concealed from the enemy, who, on the contrary, seemed to be aware of the exact number of men stationed at each point, and they were one and all threatened with a force perfectly adequate to bear down opposition, and yet by no means disproportionately large or such as to render the main body inefficient. All, moreover, was done with the sagacity and coolness of veterans, who perfectly understood the nature of the resistance to be expected and the difficulties to be overcome, and who, having well considered and matured their plans, were resolved to carry them into execution at all hazards and at every expense of life.

It was at this moment, when the heads of columns began to show themselves in rear of our right and left, that the Indians, who had hitherto acted with spirit and something like order, lost all confidence and fled. Alarmed at the prospect of having their retreat cut off, they stole away, after their own fashion, in single files, in spite of the strenuous remonstrances of Baume and of their own officers, leaving us more than ever exposed by the abandonment of that angle of the intrenchments which they had been appointed to maintain. But even this spectacle, distressing as it doubtless was, failed in affecting our people with a feeling at all akin to despair.

The vacancy which the retreat of the savages occasioned was promptly filled up by one of our two field pieces, whilst the other poured destruction among the enemy in front, as often as they showed themselves in the open country or threatened to advance. In this state of things we continued upwards of three quarters of an hour. Tho' repeatedly assailed in front, flank and rear, we maintained ourselves with so much obstinacy as to inspire a hope that the enemy might even yet be kept at bay till the arrival of Breyman's corps, now momentarily expected; when an accident occurred, which at once put an end to this expectation and exposed us, almost defenceless, to our fate.

The solitary tumbril which contained the whole of our spare ammunition became ignited and blew up with a violence which shook the very ground under our feet and caused a momentary cessation in firing, both on our side and that of the enemy. But the cessation was only for a moment. The American officers, guessing the extent of our calamity, cheered their men to fresh exertions. They rushed up the ascent with redoubled ardor, in spite of the heavy volley which we poured in to check them, and, finding our guns silent, they sprang over the parapet and dashed within our works.

For a few seconds the scene which ensued defies all power of language to describe. The bayonet, the butt of the rifle, the sabre, the pike, were in full play, and men fell, as they rarely fall in modern war, 'under the direct blows of their enemies. But such a struggle could not, in the nature of things, be of long continuance. Outnumbered, broken and somewhat disheartened by late events, our people wavered and fell back, or fought singly and unconnectedly, till they were either cut down at their posts, obstinately defending themselves, or compelled to surrender. Of Reidesel's dismounted dragoons, few survived to tell how nobly they had behaved; Col. Baume, shot through the body by a rifle ball, fell mortally wounded; and all order and discipline being lost, flight or submission was alone thought of.

For my own part, whether the feeling arose from desperation or accident I cannot tell, but I resolved not to be taken. As yet I had escaped almost unhurt, a slight flesh wound in the left arm having alone fallen to my share; and gathering around me about thirty of my comrades, we made a rush where the enemy's ranks appeared weakest, and burst through. This done, each man made haste to shift for himself without pausing to consider the fate of his neighbor; and losing one third of our number from the enemy's fire, the remainder took refuge, in groups of two or three, within the forest.

VIII. SARATOGA: THE FIRST PHASE: FREEMAN'S FARM

On July 17 Howe wrote Burgoyne: "My intention is for Pennsylvania, where I expect to meet Washington, but if he goes to the northward contrary to my expectations, and you can keep him at bay, be assured I shall soon be after him to relieve you." The day the letter was written Howe had already embarked his troops for the Chesapeake, and by the time it reached Burgoyne, Howe's fleet was south of the Delaware capes. Although Burgoyne kept his own counsel, he recognized his situation as desperate. Feeling that his orders left him no alternative but to push southward to Albany, he determined to cross to the west side of the Hudson River. There his path was blocked by Gates's army which held a commanding position at Bemis Heights, where fortifications had been erected and trenches dug under the direction of the Polish engineer Kosciuszko. Pausing for reinforcements of guns, stores and provisions from Lake George, Burgoyne, once they had reached him, crossed the Hudson to Saratoga on September 13.

Burgoyne's thrust south was blocked by Gates's army on the plateau of Bemis Heights. On September 18 the British seized the heights to the north. Burgoyne's plan was to get into the rear of the American left by a flanking movement. For this purpose he sent his right column under Fraser, supported by Breymann's Hessian riflemen and covered by a mixed force of Indians, Loyalists and Canadians. Meanwhile the British general personally led the center in a frontal attack, supported on his left by the Hessian Baron Friederich von Riedesel and Major General William Phillips.

The "old midwife," as Burgoyne called Gates, was strangely inert, trusting to his fortified position rather than taking the initiative and splitting up Burgoyne's widely spaced forces. Arnold, on the other hand, anticipated the movement to turn the American left, and argued vehemently with Gates, who finally dispatched Morgan's riflemen and Dearborn's light infantry to check it. There the battle ebbed and flowed until sundown, while Arnold fell upon the enemy's center with the view to separating Burgoyne and Fraser.

From one point of view Freeman's Farm was a drawn battle. Neither side gained ground. The American suffered some 300 casualties, the British double that number. But the American, rapidly being reinforced, could afford the losses; Burgoyne could not. For him time was running out. His retreat was virtually cut off by Patriot forces in his rear, and the early winter in the north country would have made a withdrawal extremely hazardous under any conditions. With proper reinforcements Arnold might have broken the enemy's line and gained the complete victory. "I trust we have convinced the British butchers that the 'cowardly' Yankees can, and when there is a call for it, will fight," observed Major Henry Dearborn, one of the participants in the Battle of Freeman's Farm.

Freeman's Farm set off a furious quarrel between Arnold and Gates. The latter, in his report to Congress, failed to mention Arnold's personal participation in the battle. Some historians, drawing on pro-Gates and anti-Arnold contemporaries such as the unreliable Wilkinson and the scandalmongering Gordon, have contended that Arnold was not in the battle at all. But the overwhelming evidence is the other way.

The immediate effect of the breach was serious. Arnold was relieved of his command and barred from headquarters.

1. BURGoyNE REALIZES HIS PERIL, BUT GERMAIN DOES NOT

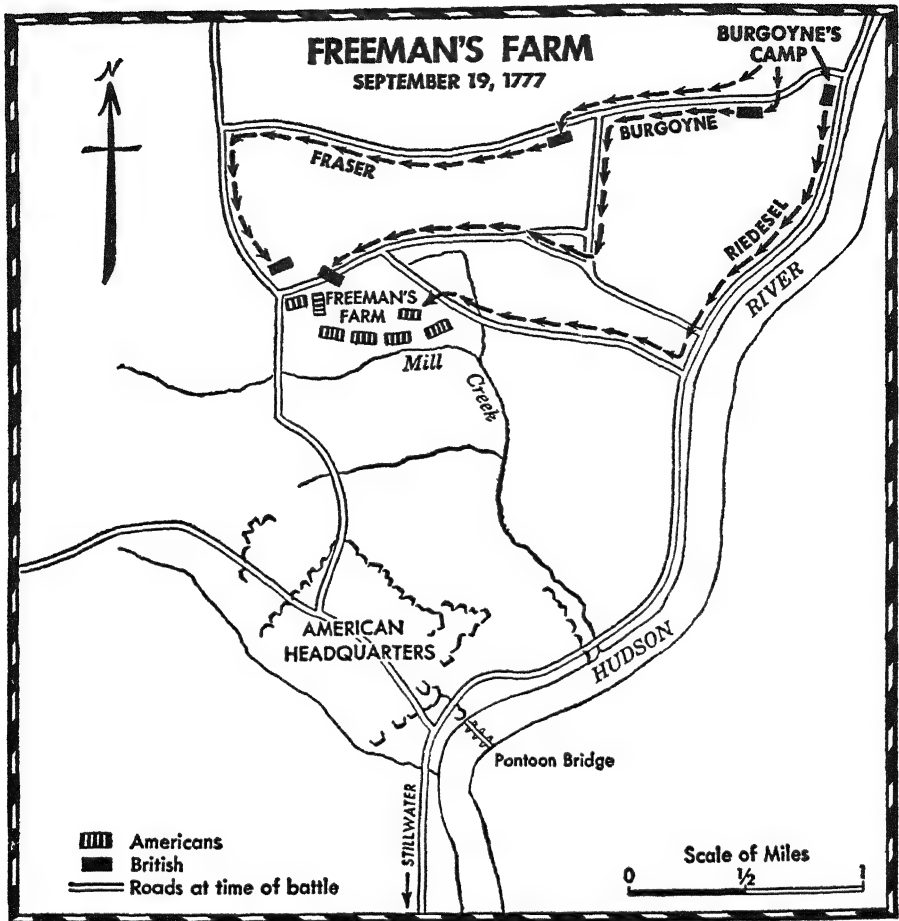

A. GENERAL BURGoyNE TO LORD GEORGE GERMAIN

Camp near Saratoga, August 20, 1777

The consequences of this affair [the Battle of Bennington], my Lord, have little effect upon the strength or spirits of the army; but the prospect of the campaign in other respects is far less prosperous than when I wrote last. In spite of St. Leger's victory, Fort Stanwix holds out obstinately.

I am afraid the expectations of Sir J. Johnson greatly fail in the rising of the country. On this side I find daily reason to doubt the sincerity of the resolution of the professing Loyalists. I have about 400 (but not half of them armed) who may be depended upon; the rest are trimmers, merely actuated by interest. The great bulk of the country is undoubtedly with the Congress, in principle and in zeal; and their measures are executed with a secrecy and dispatch that are not to be equalled. Wherever the King's forces point, militia, to the amount of three or four thousand, assemble in twenty-four hours; they bring with them their subsistence, etc., and, the alarm over, they return to their farms. The Hampshire Grants in particular, a country unpeopled and almost unknown in the last war, now abounds in the most active and most rebellious race of the continent, and hangs like a gathering storm upon my left. In all parts the industry and management in driving cattle and removing corn are indefatigable and certain; and it becomes impracticable to move without portable magazines.

Another most embarrassing circumstance is the want of communication with Sir William Howe; of the messengers I have sent, I know of two being hanged, and am ignorant whether any of the rest arrived. The same fate has probably attended those dispatched by Sir William Howe, for only one letter is come to hand, informing me that his intention is for Pennsylvania; that Washington has detached Sullivan, with 2500 men, to Albany; that Putnam is in the Highlands with 4000 men; that after my arrival at Albany the movements of the enemy must guide mine; but that he wished the enemy might be driven out of the province before any operation took place against the Connecticut; that Sir Henry Clinton remained in the command in the neighbourhood of New-York, and would act as occurrences might direct.

No operation, my Lord, has yet been undertaken in my favour: the Highlands have not been threatened. The consequence is that Putnam has detached two brigades to Mr. Gates, who is now strongly posted near the mouth of the Mohawk-River, with an army superior to mine in troops of the Congress and as many militia as he pleases. He is likewise far from being deficient in artillery, having received all the pieces that were landed from the French ships which got into Boston.

Had I a latitude in my orders, I should think it my duty to wait in this position, or perhaps as far back as Fort Edward, where my communication with Lake George would be perfectly secure, till some event happened to assist my movement forward; but my orders being positive to "force a junction with Sir William Howe," I apprehend I am not at liberty to remain inactive longer than shall be necessary to collect twenty-five days provision, and to receive the reinforcement of the additional companies, the German drafts and recruits now (and unfortunately only now) on Lake Champlain. The waiting the arrival of this reinforcement is of indispensable necessity, because from the hour I pass the Hudson's River and proceed towards Albany, all safety of communication ceases. I must expect a large body of the enemy from my left will take post behind me.

I have put out of the question the waiting longer than the time necessary for the foregoing purposes, because the attempt, then critical, depending on adventure and the fortune that often accompanies it, and hardly justifiable but by orders from the state, would afterwards be consummately desperate. I mean, my Lord, that by moving soon, though I should meet with insurmountable difficulties to my progress, I shall at least have the chance of fighting my way back to Ticonderoga, but the season a little further advanced, the distance increased, and the march unavoidably tardy because surrounded by enemies, a retreat might be shut in by impenetrable bars of the elements, and at the same time no possible means of existence remain in the country.

When I wrote more confidently, I little foresaw that I was to be left to pursue my way through such a tract of country and hosts of foes, without any co-operation from New-York; nor did I then think the garrison of Ticonderoga would fall to my share alone; a dangerous experiment would it be to leave that post in weakness, and too heavy a drain it is upon the lifeblood of my force to give it due strength.

I yet do not despond. Should I succeed in forcing my way to Albany, and find that country in a state to subsist my army, I shall think no more of a retreat, but at the worst fortify there and await Sir W. Howe's operations.

Whatever may be my fate, my Lord, I submit my actions to the breast of the King, and to the candid judgment of my profession, when all the motives become public; and I rest in the confidence that, whatever decision may be passed upon my conduct, my good intent will not be questioned.

I cannot close so serious a letter without expressing my fullest satisfaction in the behaviour and countenance of the troops, and my compleat confidence that in all trials they will do whatever can be expected from men devoted to their King and country.

B. GERMAIN TO WILLIAM KNOX, UNDERSECRETARY OF STATE FOR THE COLONIES

September 29, 1777

I am sorry the Canada army will be disappointed in the junction they expect with Sir William Howe, but the more honour for Burgoyne if he does the business without any assistance from New York.

C. GERMAIN TO KNOX

October 31, 1777

I am sorry to find that Burgoyne's campaign is so totally ruined; the best wish I can form is that he may have returned to Ticonderoga without much loss. His private letter to me, being dated the 20th of August, contains nothing material about the affair near Bennington but military reasoning about the propriety of that attack; but what alarms me most is that he thinks his orders to go to Albany to force a junction with Sir William Howe are so positive that he must attempt at all events the obeying them, tho' at the same time he acquaints me that Sir William Howe has sent him word that he has gone to Philadelphia, and indeed nothing that Sir William says could give him reason to hope that any effort would be made in his favor.

2. MORGAN'S SHARPSHOOTERS PICK OFF THE BRITISH OFFICERS

Journal of Lieutenant William Digby of the Shropshire Regiment.

[September] 19th. At day break intelligence was received that Colonel Morgan, with the advance party of the enemy consisting of a corps of rifle men, were strong about 3 miles from us; their main body amounting to great numbers encamped on a very strong post about half a mile in their rear; and about 9 o'clock we began our march, every man prepared with 60 rounds of cartridge and ready for instant action. We moved in 3 columns, ours to the right on the heights and farthest from the river in thick woods. A little after 12 our advanced picquets came up with Colonel Morgan and engaged, but from the great superiority of fire received from him—his numbers being much greater—they were obliged to fall back, every officer being either killed or wounded except one, when the line came up to their support and obliged Morgan in his turn to retreat with loss.

About half past one, the fire seemed to slacken a little; but it was only to come on with double force, as between 2 and 3 the action became general on their side. From the situation of the ground, and their being perfectly acquainted with it, the whole of our troops could not be brought to engage together, which was a very material disadvantage, though everything possible was tried to remedy that inconvenience, but to no effect. Such an explosion of fire I never had any idea of before, and the heavy artillery joining in concert like great peals of thunder, assisted by the echoes of the woods, almost deafened us with the noise. To an unconcerned spectator, it must have had the most awful and glorious appearance, the different battalions moving to relieve each other, some being pressed and almost broke by their superior numbers. The crash of cannon and musketry never ceased till darkness parted us, when they retired to their camp, leaving us masters of the field; but it was a dear-bought victory if I can give it that name, as we lost many brave men. The 62nd had scarce 10 men a company left, and other regiments suffered much, and no very great advantage, honor excepted, was gained by the day.

On its turning dusk we were near firing on a body of our Germans, mistaking their dark clothing for that of the enemy. General Burgoyne was every where and did every thing [that] could be expected from a brave officer, and Brig. Gen. Frazier gained great honour by exposing himself to every danger. During the night we remained in our ranks, and tho we heard the groans of our wounded and dying at a small distance, yet could not assist them till morning, not knowing the position of the enemy, and expecting the action would be renewed at day break. Sleep was a stranger to us, but we were all in good spirits and ready to obey with cheerfulness any orders the general might issue before morning dawned.

3. "NOTHING COULD EXCEED THE BRAVERY OF ARNOLD ON THIS DAY"

Recollections of Captain E. Wakefield of the American Army.

A persistent effort has been made from the day of the battle to rob Arnold of the glory. Being attached to Dearborn's Light Infantry, which had a conspicuous part in the battles of the 19th of September and the 7th of October, I had the opportunity of witnessing the principal movements of both, and therefore speak from personal knowledge.

I shall never forget the opening scene of the first day's conflict. The riflemen and light infantry were ordered to clear the woods of the Indians. Arnold rode up, and with his sword pointing to the enemy emerging from the woods into an opening partially cleared, covered with stumps and fallen timber, addressing Morgan, he said, "Colonel Morgan, you and I have seen too many redskins to be deceived by that garb of paint and feathers; they are asses in lions' skins, Canadians and Tories; let your riflemen cure them of their borrowed plumes."

And so they did; for in less than fifteen minutes the "Wagon Boy," with his Virginia riflemen, sent the painted devils with a howl back to the British lines. Morgan was in his glory, catching the inspiration of Arnold, as he thrilled his men; when he hurled them against the enemy, he astonished the English and Germans with the deadly fire of his rifles.

Nothing could exceed the bravery of Arnold on this day; he seemed the very genius of war. Infuriated by the conflict and maddened by Gates' refusal to send reinforcements, which he repeatedly called for, and knowing he was meeting the brunt of the battle, he seemed inspired with the fury of a demon.

4. THE BREAK BETWEEN ARNOLD AND GATES

A. GENERAL ARNOLD TO GENERAL GATES

Camp at Stillwater, September 22, 1777

When I joined the army at Vanschaak's Island the first inst. you were pleased to order me to Londons Ferry to take the command of Generals Poor and Learned's Brigades and Colonel Morgan's battalion of rifle men and light infantry. Your command was immediately obeyed. I have repeatedly since received your orders respecting those corps as belonging to my division, which has often been mentioned in General Orders, and the gentlemen commanding those corps have understood themselves as in my division. On the 9th inst. you desired me to annex the New York and Connecticut Militia to such brigades as I thought proper in my division, which I accordingly did and ordered the New York Militia to join Genl. Poor's brigade, and the Connecticut Militia General Learned's. The next day, I was surprised to observe in General Orders the New York Militia annexed to General Glover's brigade, which placed me in the ridiculous light of presuming to give orders I had no right to do, and having them publicly contradicted, which I mentioned to you as I thought it a mistake of the Dep'y Adjutant General. You then observed the mistake your own and that it should be mentioned as such in the ensuing orders, which has never been done.

On the 19th inst. when advice was received that the enemy were approaching, I took the liberty to give it as my opinion that we ought to march out and attack them. You desired me to send Colonel Morgan and the light infantry and support them. I obeyed your orders, and before the action was over, I found it necessary to send out the whole of my division to support the attack. No other troops were engaged that day except Colonel Marshall's regiment of General Pattison's brigade.

I have been informed that in the returns transmitted to Congress of the killed and wounded in the action the troops were mentioned as a detachment from the army, and in the orders of this day I observe it is mentioned that Colonel Morgan's corps not being in any brigade or division of this army are to make returns and reports only to head quarters, from whence they are alone to receive orders, altho it is notorious to the whole army they have been in and done duty with my division for some time past.

When I mentioned these matters to you this day you were pleased to say, in contradiction to your repeated orders, you did not know I was a Major General or had any command in the army. I have ever supposed a Major General's command of four thousand men a proper division and no detachment, when composed of whole brigades forming one wing of the army, and that the general and troops if guilty of misconduct or cowardly behaviour in time of action were justly chargeable as a division, and that if, on the other hand, they behave with spirit and firmness in action they were justly initiated to the applause due to a brave division, not detachment, of the army. Had my division behaved ill the other divisions of the army would have thought it extremely hard to have been amenable for their conduct. I mentioned these matters as I wish justice due to the division, as well as particular regiments or persons.

From what reason I know not, as I am conscious of no offence or neglect of duty, but I have lately observed little or no attention paid to any proposals I have thought it my duty to make for the public service, and when a measure I have proposed has been agreed to it has immediately been contradicted. I have been received with the greatest coolness at head quarters, and often treated in such a manner as must mortify a person with less pride than I have, and in my station in the army. You observed you expected General Lincoln in a day or two when I should have no command of a division, that you thought me of little consequence to the army, and that you would with all your heart give me a pass to leave it whenever I thought proper. As I find your observation very just that I am not, or that you wish me of little consequence in the army, and as I have the interest and safety of my country at heart, I wish to be where I can be of the most service to them. I therefore, as General Lincoln is arrived, have to request your pass to Philadelphia with my two aid de camps and three servants, where I propose to join General Washington, and may possibly have it in my power to serve my country, tho I am thought of no consequence in this Department.

—Gates Papers, Box VII, No. 195.

B. GATES TO ARNOLD

Headquarters, September 23, 1777

You wrote me nothing last Night but what had been sufficiently altered between us in the Evening. I then gave such Answers to all your Objections as I think were satisfactory. I know not what you mean by insult or Indignity. I made you such replies only as I conceived proper. As to the Opened Letter I sent you to Mr Hancock, it was the Civilest method I could devise of acquainting Congress with your leaving The Army, and is to all intents and purposes as full a pass as can be desired. I sent it unsealed, as being the more complaisant to You and is what is commonly done upon such Occasions. That not being so agreeable to you as a common pass, I send You one enclosed.

5. "TO ARNOLD ALONE IS DUE THE HONOUR OF OUR VICTORY"

A. COLONEL HENRY BROCKHOLST LIVINGSTON OF THE CONTINENTAL ARMY
TO GENERAL SCHUYLER

Camp on Behmus Heights, September 23, 1777

I am much distressed at Gen. Arnold's determination to retire from the army at this important crisis. His presence was never more necessary. He is the life and soul of the troops. Believe me, Sir, to him and to him alone is due the honor of our late victory. Whatever share his superiours may claim they are entitled to none. He enjoys the confidence and affection of officers and soldiers. They would, to a man, follow him to conquest or death. His absence will dishearten them to such a degree as to render them of but little service.

The difference between him and Mr Gates has arisen to too great a height to admit of a compromise. I have, for some time past, observed the great coolness and, in many instances, even disrespect with which Gen. Arnold has been treated at Head Quarters. His proposals have been rejected with marks of indignity, his own orders have frequently been contravened, and himself set in a ridiculous light by those of the Commander in Chief. His remonstrances, on those occasions, have been termed presumptuous. In short he has pocketed many insults for the sake of his country, which a man of less pride would have resented.

The repeated indignities he received at length roused his spirit and determined him again to remonstrate. He waited on Mr Gates in person last evening. Matters were altercationed in a very high strain. Both were warm, the latter rather passionate and very assuming. Towards the end of the debate Mr Gates told Arnold, "He did not know of his being a Major General. He had sent his resignation to Congress. He had never given him the command of any division of the army. Genl. Lincoln would be here in a day or two, that then he should have no occasion for him, and would give him a pass to go to Philadelphia, whenever he chose it."

Arnold's spirit could not brook this usage. He returned to his quarters, represented what had passed in a letter to Mr Gates and requested his permission to go to Philadelphia. This morning, in answer to his letter, he received a permit, by way of a letter directed to Mr Hancock. He sent this back and requested one in proper form, which was complied with. Tomorrow he will set out for Albany.

The reason of the present disagreement between two old cronies is simply this—Arnold is your friend. I shall attend the general down. Chagrining as it may be for me to leave the army at a time when an opportunity is offering for every young fellow to distinguish himself, I can no longer submit to the command of a man whom I abhor from my very soul. This conduct is disgusting to every one but his flatterers and dependents, among whom are some who profess to be your friends. A cloud is gathering and may ere long burst on his head.

—Schuyler Papers, N.Y. Public Lib., Box 33, No. 1191.

B. LIVINGSTON TO SCHUYLER

September 24, 1777

Gen. Arnold's intention to quit this department is made public and has caused great uneasiness among the soldiery. To induce him to stay, General Poor proposed an Address from the general officers and colonels of his division, returning him thanks for his past service and particularly for his conduct during the late action and requesting his stay. The Address was framed, and consented to by Poor's officers. Those of Gen. Learned refused. They acquiesced in the propriety of the measure, but were afraid of giving umbrage to General Gates.

—Schuyler Papers, N.Y. Public Lib., Box 33, No. 1192.

C. COLONEL RICHARD VARICK TO SCHUYLER

Camp Still Water, September 22, 1777

This I am certain of, that Arnold has all the credit of the action on the 19th, for he was ordering out troops to it, while the other [Gates] was in Dr. Pott's tent backbiting his neighbours.

6. THE INDIANS AND TORIES FADE AWAY

[1811]

• Memoirs of R. Lamb, Sergeant of the Welsh Fusiliers.

Taking all the results of this battle, if we had reason to boast of it, our advantages from it were few indeed. In fact, difficulty and danger appeared to grow out of it. The intricacy of the ground before us increased at every step. Our scouting, reconnoitring and foraging parties encountered perils uncalculated and unseen before. Our enemy, being at home, was well used to the places, and thus possessed of every local advantage that favours an army.

To procure provisions and forage, without sending out large parties or bodies of soldiers, became impossible, and, therefore, the Indians themselves, who were attached to march with and reinforce us, began to desert. Plunder and free-booting was greatly their object, and to be debarred from that, as they found themselves, they turned away from privations and regular warfare, which they were disused to maintain. Of this we had evidence, for as a party of our troops posted near a wood were severely galled on the right of our line by the fire of the enemy, the Indians who accompanied us seemed to hold a consultation among themselves, precipitately retreated, and abandoned the army altogether.

In this circumstance of our military affairs, the Canadians and Colonists reinforcing us afforded no effectual assistance; they evidently betrayed their wishes of withdrawing from our forces, not being previously made up in mind for the severity and hardships of war, in the inveterate and wasting progress of its continuance, which, instead of favouring them with comfortable prospects of a returning tranquillity, assumed day by day a more ferocious and unpromising aspect. Such then being the gloomy face of affairs in the great cause at issue, and the Colonial armies becoming daily stronger and more formidable opponents to us, it was not surprising that the tribes of Indians and the corps of loyal Colonists along with us should feel disheartened and relax their efforts in his Majesty's service.

—LAMB, Memoir of His Own Life, pp. 194-195.

IX. SIR HENRY CLINTON'S RELIEF EXPEDITION

It was now increasingly clear that if Burgoyne were to get out of his entrapment he would have to get aid from Howe's forces. Howe had other ideas, however, and had already embarked on his expedition to conquer Pennsylvania, leaving in command of the garrison in New York a reticent, inhibited, inordinately touchy personality, Sir Henry Clinton, who accurately described himself as "a shy bitch," and, he might have added, an excessively cautious one, too. Clinton had the faculty of never getting along with his commander and never working in harmony with his principal subordinate officer.

Now the great decision to relieve Burgoyne was up to him, and his self-defeating caution greatly contributed to the collapse of Burgoyne's flamboyant campaign. Late in July or early August, Clinton wrote an undated letter to Burgoyne describing Howe's move on Philadelphia. When it is covered by an hourglass-shaped mask, which was sent by separate messenger, it reads as follows:

Sir W. Howe is gone to the Cheasapeak Bay with the greatest part of the army. I hear he is landed but am not certain. I am left to command here with too small a force to make any effectual diversion in your favour. I shall try something at any rate. It may be of use to you. I own to you I think Sir W.'s move just at this time the worst he could take.

That small diversion was the best Clinton could do. Fearing that Washington would attack New York he kept the larger part of his forces tied down to the defense of the city. Finally, on October 3 when Burgoyne's situation was desperate if not already hopeless, he dispatched a force of 3,000 men on an expedition up the Hudson River. Fort Montgomery fell to his men easily. Fort Clinton fell after bitter resistance, and on the east bank of the river Tryon forced the abandonment of Fort Constitution. Clinton was momentarily buoyant. "Nous y voici," he wrote Burgoyne, "and nothing now between us but Gates." Burgoyne had asked him whether he should proceed to Albany or retreat, pointing out that he could not stay longer than October 12, if he were to do the latter. Unfortunately for Burgoyne, Clinton's messenger was captured by the Patriots, who forced him to vomit up the silver bullet containing the message. Just at this time Howe called upon Clinton for reinforcements. Clinton stopped his advance and soon afterward abandoned the forts. If Burgoyne had any hope of relief, it was cruelly dissipated by Sir Henry's letter to him of October 6, in which Clinton stated that "he thinks it impossible General Burgoyne could really suppose Sir Henry Clinton had any idea of penetrating to Albany with the small force he mentioned to him in his letter of the 11th September."

Having under his command a force of some 7,000, he could have launched a full-scale rescue expedition had he been willing to take the risks which a commander must be expected to assume. But Clinton, as was his wont, put the blame on someone else, in this case on Howe.

1. THE FALL OF FORTS CLINTON AND MONTGOMERY

Governor George Clinton to the Council of New York.

New Windsor, October 7, 1777

The extreme fatigue I have undergone this three days past and the want of rest for an equal number of nights renders me unfit to write you matters of so serious consequence to this State as I have to communicate. I am able only briefly to inform you that yesterday about ten o'clock A.M. an advanced party was attacked by the enemy at Doodle Town about 2½ miles from Fort Montgomery. They consisted of about 30 men; the enemy, by appearance and accounts after received, of 5000. They received the Enemies fire, returned it and retreated to Fort Clinton.

Soon after [I] received intelligence that the enemy were advancing on the west side of the mountain with design to attack us in rear. Upon this I ordered out Lieut. Colo. Brown and McClaghey with upwards of 1900 men towards Doodle Town, and a brass field piece with a detachment of 60 men to a very advantageous post in the road to the furnace. They were not long out before they were both attacked by the enemy with their whole force. Our people behaved with spirit and must have made great slaughter of the enemy. I strengthened the party in the furnace road to upwards of 100 but they were obliged to give way to so superior a force as the enemy brought against them. They kept their field piece in full play at them till the men who worked it were drove with fix bayonets, then spiked it and retreated with great good order to a 12-pounder which I had ordered to cover them and from thence in the fort. I immediately posted my men in the most advantageous manner for the defence of the post and it was not many minutes before as well our post as Fort Clinton were invaded on all sides and in a most incessant fire kept up till night and even after dusk, when the enemy forced our lines and redoubts at both posts, and the garrisons were obliged to fight their way out—as many as could as were determined not to surrender—and many have escaped.

I was summoned sun an hour high to surrender in five minutes and thereby prevent the effusion of blood. I sent Lieut. Colo. Livingston to receive the flag, who informed them that he [had] no orders to treat with them except to receive their proposals if they meant to surrender themselves prisoners of war in which case he was impowered to assure them good usage. About 10 minutes after they made a general and desperate attack on both posts which was resisted with great spirit, but we were at length overpowered by numbers and they gained possession of both posts. Officers and men behaved with great spirit, as well Continental troops as Militia. Our loss in slain cannot be great considering the length of the action. My brother Genl. Clinton is wounded and I believe made prisoner. This is the case with Major Logan. The number of missing I cannot ascertain. The ships are both burnt and Fort Constitution demolished by our people without my orders but I can't as yet condemn the measure. The officers all say it was right. I am clear it was as to the fort after removing artillery and stores which has not been done. The ships I hoped might have been saved.

Genl. Putnam will retreat to near Capt. Hights about 3 miles from Mr Van Wyck and I mean to rally my broken but brave forces and advance tomorrow on Butter Hill. Genl. Putnam is to send Colo. Webb's regiment to join me.

I begg you will give the substance of this account to Genl. Gates in answer to his letter to me. I have only to add that I greatly respect the loss of these posts but I am consoled with the full perswasion that they have bought them dear and that I have done the most in my power to save them.

2. THE SILVER BULLET AND THE INTERCEPTED MESSAGE

Journal of Dr. James Thacher, serving with the Continental Army.

October 14, 1777: It is the prevalent opinion here [at Albany] that by taking advantage of wind and tide, it is in the power of Sir Henry Clinton to convey his forces to this city within the space of five or six hours, and having arrived here, a march of about twenty miles will carry him without opposition to Stillwater, which must involve General Gates in inexpressible embarrassment and difficulty by placing him between two armies, and thereby extricating Burgoyne from his perilous situation.

We have been trembling alive to this menacing prospect, but our fears are in a measure allayed by the following singular incident. After the capture of Fort Montgomery, Sir Henry Clinton despatched a messenger by the name of Daniel Taylor to Burgoyne with the intelligence; fortunately he was taken on his way as a spy, and finding himself in danger, he was seen to turn aside and take something from his pocket and swallow it. General George Clinton, into whose hands he had fallen, ordered a severe dose of emetic tartar to be administered. This produced the happiest effect as respects the prescriber; but it proved fatal to the patient. He discharged a small silver bullet, which being unscrewed, was found to enclose a letter from Sir Henry Clinton to Burgoyne. "Out of thine own mouth thou shalt be condemned." The spy was tried, convicted and executed. The following is an exact copy of the letter inclosed:

"Fort Montgomery, October 8th, 1777.

"Nous voici—and nothing between us but Gates. I sincerely hope this little success of ours may facilitate your operations. In answer to your letter of the 28th of September by C. C. I shall only say, I cannot presume to order, or even advise, for reasons obvious. I heartily wish you success.

"Faithfully yours,

"H. CLINTON

"To General Burgoyne."

3. SIR HENRY CLINTON COMES TO THE END OF THE LINE

There not being now a gun left in the Highlands, all the rebel craft on the river destroyed, and a fair prospect opening of our being able to remove every obstruction as far as Albany, I began to extend my views beyond the limits they were at first confined to. However, the small number of men which would remain to me for further operations after garrisoning the extensive posts I had taken—which I was obliged either to defend or dismantle—and securing my communications with New York, precluded every idea for the present of penetrating to Albany, especially as my total ignorance of the situation and strength of Mr. Washington's army prevented my forming a judgment how far it might be practicable for him to detach in force to Stony Point and thereby force me down the river. Therefore, to obviate the latter, I lost no time in ordering the engineer to carefully examine that ground, that with the Commodore's assistance measures might be taken for securing it. And as a remedy for the former I took the precaution, by dismantling Fort Montgomery and strengthening Fort Clinton, so to reduce our defenses in the Highlands as to be able to hold this strong position with a few men. I proposed likewise to leave General Vaughan with a sufficient corps at Verplanck's or on the Croton, from whence he might readily either succor the Highlands or fall back to King's Bridge, as emergencies should require.

But, happening to receive a letter about this time from General Pigot informing me he could spare 1000 men from the defense of Rhode Island, I began to entertain hopes that I should even be able to support General Burgoyne, should he incline to force his way to Albany. Therefore, while Sir James Wallace was employed in exploring a passage through the chevaux- de-frise and removing the booms across the river, I went back to Kings Bridge to make some arrangements respecting the command there which required my presence. [Nobody but drunken General Schmidt to trust the foreposts to; I therefore determined to return myself.—Memoranda] And, availing myself of General Pigot's offer by requesting him to send 1000 men to New York, I ordered the Second Battalion of Anspach, Koeler's Grenadiers and the Forty-fifth Regiment to proceed from thence to the Highlands, and six months' provisions for five thousand men to be directly put on board vessels of proper draft for running up the river to Albany. After making this arrangement I immediately returned, and detached General Vaughan with nearly 2000 men under the escort of Sir James Wallace with the galleys up the Hudson, giving him orders to feel his way to General Burgoyne and do his utmost to assist his operations, or even join him if required.

This little armament got up to Esopus [Kingston] on the 15th; and General Vaughan informed me he judged it proper to stop and destroy the place, lest the works and troops there might interrupt his communication with Fort Clinton or harass him on his return. He afterward proceeded to Livingston's Manor, about forty-five miles from Albany, where the vessels were obliged to come to anchor by the pilots' absolutely refusing to take charge of them further. From hence the General sent me information that he had not been able to communicate with General Burgoyne, as Putnam with 5000 men had taken posts on his right and Parsons with 1500 on his left, but that all accounts agreed in representing his situation as desperate.

Though this intelligence destroyed all my hopes of being in the least serviceable to the northern army, whose fate I now feared was inevitable, it yet was very much my wish to be able to retain the footing we were now possessed of in the Highlands. Every view of that sort was, however, dissipated by my next dispatches from the Commander in Chief, as I was thereby ordered to send him "without delay the Seventh, Twenty-sixth and Sixty-third Regiments, two battalions of Anspach and [the] Seventeenth Dragoons, together with all the recruits and recovered men belonging to the southern army and the Jägers and artillerymen which came by the English fleet—even notwithstanding I might be gone up the North River, agreeable to the intimation I had given him of my intentions in my letter of the 29th of September—except I should be on the eve of accomplishing some very material and essential stroke, being left at liberty in that case to proceed upon it provided I judged it might be executed in a few days after the receipt of his letters."

These orders being too explicit to be misunderstood or obedience to them even delayed, and several of the corps with General Vaughan being particularized in them, I wrote to that general officer on the 22d of October to direct him to return with all speed. And, receiving soon afterward another order from Sir William Howe to dismantle Fort Clinton, I was under the mortifying necessity of relinquishing the Highlands and all the other passes over the Hudson, to be reoccupied by the rebels whenever they saw proper. For, even had General Burgoyne been fortunately in a situation to have availed himself of my success and been tempted to trust to my support at the time I received these orders, I believe there is no military man who will not allow that I should have had no small difficulty in reconciling the delay an effort of that consequence must have necessarily occasioned with the obedience I owed to so explicit and pressing an order from my Commander in Chief.

X. SARATOGA: THE LAST PHASE: BEMIS HEIGHTS

The climactic phase of the battle of Saratoga occurred on October 7. Burgoyne could no longer afford to await the result of Clinton's push northward. In the meantime detachments of Lincoln's forces operating from Vermont in Burgoyne's rear had seriously threatened the British army's line of retreat and Stark had taken Ft. Edward. While Burgoyne had used the time after the Battle of Freeman's Farm to construct extensive entrenchments and redoubts, Gates's forces were strengthened by the arrival of Lincoln's army and by militiamen who, singly or in groups, were now flocking to Bemis Heights. By the seventh Gates's forces numbered 11,000; Burgoyne's were down to 5,000.

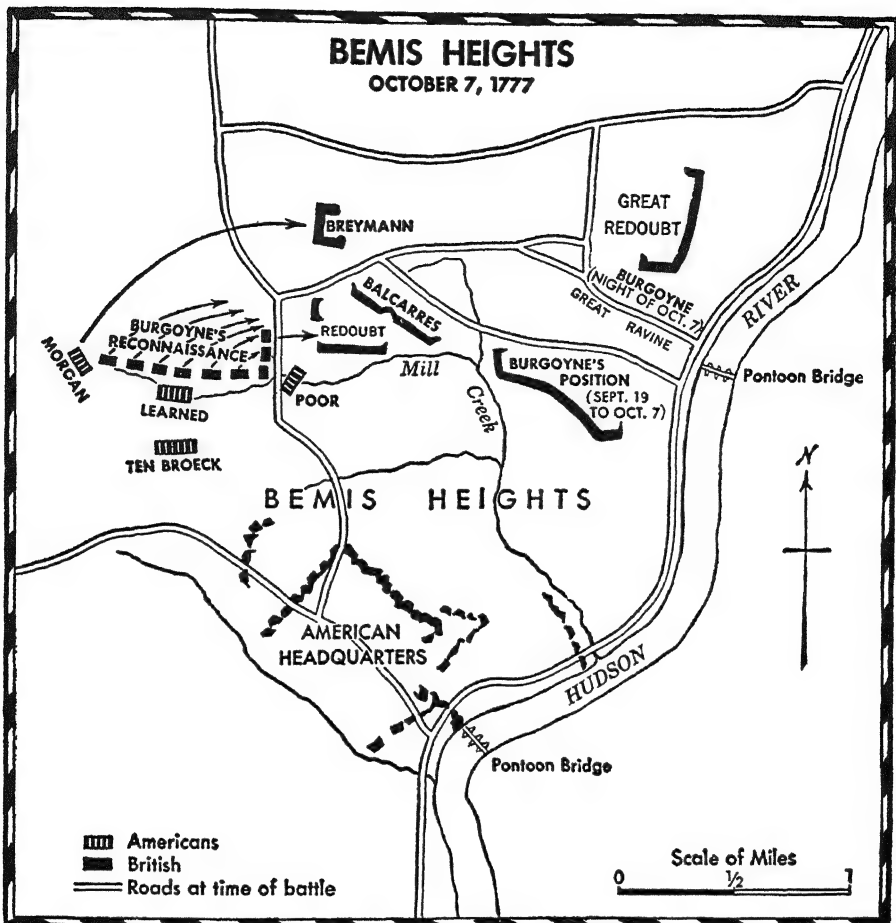

The battle started with a reconnaissance in force by 1,650 of Burgoyne's troops, the right led by Lord Balcarres, the center by the Hessian General von Riedesel, and the left under Major Acland. In a countermove Gates dispatched Morgan to attack the British right and Poor the enemy's left. While Poor's men rushed the grenadiers and took the wounded Acland prisoner, Morgan, who had made a wide circuit around the enemy's right to get into the woods on the flank and the rear of the British, poured a deadly fire on Balcarres' troops and forced them to retreat to their own lines.

What James Wilkinson curiously omits from his narrative is the role of Arnold. When the enemy retreated to the shelter of their breastworks, Arnold, in disgrace and without command that day, led some of Paterson's and Glover's men against the works held by Balcarres, and when Learned's men appeared off to the left, marching toward the extreme British right, Arnold galloped straight across the line of fire, took charge of Learned's men and led a frontal assault on Breymann's redoubt. There his horse was shot down and he himself received a bullet in his leg. The fortifications had now been breached and that night Burgoyne retired to the protection of redoubts on the bluffs along the river's edge; then, fearing an attack on his rear, he withdrew his shattered army the next evening to the heights of Saratoga. He had lost 600 men, many of them officers, four times the casualties suffered by the Americans.

1. "ORDER ON MORGAN TO BEGIN THE GAME"

Memoirs of Colonel James Wilkinson of the Continental Army.

On the afternoon of the 7th October, the advanced guard of the centre beat to arms; the alarm was repeated throughout the line, and the troops repaired to their alarm posts. I was at head quarters when this happened, and with the approbation of the General mounted my horse to inquire the cause;

but on reaching the guard where the beat commenced, I could obtain no other satisfaction but that some person had reported the enemy to be advancing against our left. I proceeded over open ground, and ascending a gentle acclivity in front of the guard, I perceived, about half a mile from the line of our encampment, several columns of the enemy, 60 or 70 rods from me, entering a wheat field which had not been cut and was separated from me by a small rivulet; and without my glass I could distinctly mark their every movement. After entering the field, they displayed, formed the line, and sat down in double ranks with their arms between their legs. Foragers then proceeded to cut the wheat or standing straw, and I soon after observed several officers, mounted on the top of a cabin, from whence with their glasses they were endeavouring to reconnoitre our left, which was concealed from their view by intervening woods.

Having satisfied myself, after fifteen minutes attentive observation, that no attack was meditated, I returned and reported to the General, who asked me what appeared to be the intentions of the enemy.

"They are foraging, and endeavouring to reconnoitre your left; and I think, Sir, they offer you battle."

"What is the nature of the ground, and what your opinion?"

"Their front is open, and their flanks rest on woods, under cover of which they may be attacked; their right is skirted by a lofty height. I would indulge them."

"Well, then, order on Morgan to begin the game."

I waited on the Colonel, whose corps was formed in front of our centre, and delivered the order; he knew the ground and inquired the position of the enemy: they were formed across a newly cultivated field, bordering on a wood and a small ravine formed by the rivulet before alluded to; their light infantry on the right, covered by a worm fence at the foot of the hill before mentioned, thickly covered with wood; their centre composed of British and German battalions. Colonel Morgan, with his usual sagacity, proposed to make a circuit with his corps by our left, and under cover of the wood to gain the height on the right of the enemy, and from thence commence his attack, so soon as our fire should be opened against their left; the plan was the best which could be devised, and no doubt contributed essentially to the prompt and decisive victory we gained.

This proposition was approved by the General, and it was concerted that time should be allowed the Colonel to make the proposed circuit and gain his station on the enemy's right before the attack should be made on their left; Poor's brigade was ordered for this service, and the attack was commenced in due season on the flank and front of the British grenadiers, by the New Hampshire and New York troops. True to his purpose, Morgan at this critical moment poured down like a torrent from the hill, and attacked the right of the enemy in front and flank. Dearborn, at the moment when the enemy's light infantry were attempting to change front, pressed forward with ardour and delivered a close fire; then leapt the fence, shouted, charged and gallantly forced them to retire in disorder. Yet, headed by that intrepid soldier the Earl of Balcarras, they were immediately rallied and reformed behind a fence in rear of their first position; but being now attacked with great audacity in front and flanks by superior numbers, resistance became vain, and the whole line, commanded by Burgoyne in person, gave way and made a precipitate and disorderly retreat to his camp, leaving two twelve and six six-pounders on the field with the loss of more than 400 officers and men killed, wounded and captured, and among them the flower of his officers, viz. Brigadier-general Frazer, Major Ackland commanding the grenadiers, Sir Francis Clark, his first aid-de-camp, Major Williams commanding officer of the artillery, Captain Money, deputy quartermaster general, and many others.

After delivering the order to General Poor and directing him to the point of attack, I was peremptorily commanded to repair to the rear and order up Ten Broeck's brigade of York militia 3000 strong; I performed this service, and regained the field of battle at the moment the enemy had turned their backs, fifty-two minutes after the first shot was fired.

The ground which had been occupied by the British grenadiers presented a scene of complicated horror and exultation. In the square space of twelve or fifteen yards lay eighteen grenadiers in the agonies of death, and three officers propped up against stumps of trees, two of them mortally wounded, bleeding and almost speechless; what a spectacle for one whose bosom glowed with philanthropy, and how vehement the impulse which can excite men of sensibility to seek such scenes of barbarism!

I found the courageous Colonel Cilley astraddle on a brass twelve-pounder and exulting in the capture—whilst a surgeon, a man of great worth who was dressing one of the officers, raising his blood-besmeared hands in a frenzy of patriotism, exclaimed, "Wilkinson, I have dipt my hands in British blood!" He received a sharp rebuke for his brutality, and with the troops I pursued the hard-pressed flying enemy, passing over killed and wounded until I heard one exclaim, "Protect me, Sir, against this boy."

Turning my eyes, it was my fortune to arrest the purpose of a lad, thirteen or fourteen years old, in the act of taking aim at a wounded officer who lay in the angle of a worm fence. Inquiring his rank, he answered, "I had the honour to command the grenadiers." Of course, I knew him to be Major Ackland, who had been brought from the field to this place on the back of a Captain Shrimpton of his own corps, under a heavy fire, and was here deposited, to save the lives of both. I dismounted, took him by the hand and expressed hopes that he was not badly wounded.

"Not badly," replied this gallant officer and accomplished gentleman, "but very inconveniently. I am shot through both legs. Will you, Sir, have the goodness to have me conveyed to your camp?"

I directed my servant to alight, and we lifted Ackland into his seat, and ordered him to be conducted to head-quarters.

2. MORGAN'S SHARPSHOOTERS PICK OFF THE GALLANT FRASER

Recollections of Samuel Woodruff, a volunteer under Gates.

... Soon after the commencement of the action, General Arnold, knowing the military character and efficiency of General Frazer, and observing his motions in leading and conducting the attack, said to Colonel Morgan, "That officer upon a grey horse is of himself a host, and must be disposed of—direct the attention of some of the sharp-shooters among your riflemen to him."

Morgan nodding his assent to Arnold, repaired to his riflemen, and made known to them the hint given by Arnold. Immediately upon this, the crupper of the grey horse was cut off by a rifle bullet, and within the next minute another passed through the horse's mane a little back of his ears.

An aid of Frazer, noticing this, observed to him, "Sir, it is evident that you are marked out for particular aim; would it not be prudent for you to retire from this place?"

Frazer replied, "My duty forbids me to fly from danger," and immediately received a bullet through his body. A few grenadiers were detached to carry him to the Smith [Taylor] house.

3. ARNOLD ATTACKS BREYMANN'S REDOUBT

Ebenezer Mattoon, a Continental officer, to General Philip Schuyler.

October 7, 1835

... About one o'clock of this day, two signal guns were fired on the left of the British army which indicated a movement. Our troops were immediately put under arms, and the lines manned. At this juncture Gens. Lincoln and Arnold rode with great speed towards the enemy's lines. While they were absent, the picket guards on both sides were engaged near the river. In about half an hour, Generals Lincoln and Arnold returned to headquarters, where many of the officers collected to hear the report, General Gates standing at the door.

Gen. Lincoln says, "Gen. Gates, the firing at the river is merely a feint; their object is your left. A strong force of 1500 men are marching circuitously, to plant themselves on yonder height. That point must be defended, or your camp is in danger."

Gates replied, "I will send Morgan with his riflemen, and Dearborn's infantry."

Arnold says, "That is nothing; you must send a strong force."

Gates replied, "Gen. Arnold, I have nothing for you to do; you have no business here."

Arnold's reply was reproachful and severe.

Gen. Lincoln says, "You must send a strong force to support Morgan and Dearborn, at least three regiments."

Two regiments from Gen. Larned's brigade, and one from Gen. Nixon's, were then ordered to that station and to defend it at all hazards. Generals Lincoln and Arnold immediately left the encampment and proceeded to the enemy's lines.

In a few minutes, Capt. Furnival's company of artillery, in which I was lieutenant, was ordered to march towards the fire, which had now opened upon our picket in front, the picket consisting of about 300 men. While we were marching, the whole line, up to our picket or front, was engaged. We advanced to a height of ground which brought the enemy in view, and opened our fire. But the enemy's guns, eight in number, and much heavier than ours, rendered our position untenable.

We then advanced into the line of infantry. Here Lieutenant M'Lane joined me. In our front there was a field of corn, in which the Hessians were secreted. On our advancing towards the corn field, a number of men rose and fired upon us. M'Lane was severely wounded. While I was removing him from the field, the firing still continued without abatement.

During this time, a tremendous firing was heard on our left. We poured in upon them our canister shot as fast as possible, and the whole line, from left to right, became engaged. The smoke was very dense, and no movements could be seen; but as it soon arose, our infantry appeared to be slowly retreating, and the Hessians slowly advancing, their officers urging them on with their hangers. . . .

The troops continuing warmly engaged, Col. Johnson's regiment, coming up, threw in a heavy fire and compelled the Hessians to retreat. Upon this we advanced with a shout of victory. At the same time Auckland's corps gave way. We proceeded but a short distance before we came upon four pieces of brass cannon, closely surrounded with the dead and dying; at a few yards further we came upon two more. Advancing a little further, we were met by a fire from the British infantry, which proved very fatal to one of Col. Johnson's companies, in which were killed one sergeant, one corporal, fourteen privates—and about twenty were wounded.

They advanced with a quick step, firing as they came on. We returned them a brisk fire of canister shot, not allowing ourselves time even to sponge our pieces. In a short time they ceased firing and advanced upon us with trailed arms. At this juncture Arnold came up with a part of Brooks's regiment, and gave them a most deadly fire, which soon caused them to face about and retreat with a quicker step than they advanced.

The firing had now principally ceased on our left, but was brisk in front and on the right. At this moment Arnold says to Col. Brooks (late governor of Massachusetts), "Let us attack Balcarras's works."

Brooks replied, "No. Lord Auckland's detachment has retired there, we can't carry them."

"Well, then, let us attack the Hessian lines."

Brooks replies, "With all my heart."

We all wheeled to the right and advanced. No fire was received, except from the cannon, until we got within about eight rods, when we received a tremendous fire from the whole line. But a few of our men, however, fell. Still advancing, we received a second fire, in which a few men fell, and Gen. Arnold's horse fell under him, and he himself was wounded. He cried out, "Rush on, my brave boys!" After receiving the third fire, Brooks mounted their works, swung his sword, and the men rushed into their works. When we entered the works, we found Col. Bremen dead, surrounded with a number of his companions, dead or wounded. We still pursued slowly, the fire, in the mean time, decreasing. Nightfall now put an end to this day's bloody contest. During the day we had taken eight cannon and broken the centre of the enemy's lines.

We were ordered to rest until relieved from the camps. The gloom of the night, the groans and shrieks of the wounded and dying, and the horrors of the whole scene baffle all description.

4. "ALL OF THE INFANTRY HAD GONE TO THE DEVIL OR RUN AWAY"

Journal of Captain Georg Pausch of the Hanau Artillery.

[October 7, 1777] At this junction, our left wing retreated in the greatest possible disorder, thereby causing a similar rout among our German command, which was stationed behind the fence in line of battle. They retreated—or to speak more plainly—they left their position without informing me, although I was but fifty paces in advance of them. Each man for himself, they made for the bushes. Without knowing it, I kept back the enemy for a while with my unprotected cannon loaded with shells. How long before this the infantry had left its position, I cannot tell, but I saw a great number advance towards our now open left wing within a distance of about 300 paces. I looked back towards the position still held, as I supposed, by our German infantry, under whose protection I, too, intended to retreat—but not a man was to be seen. They had all run across the road into the field and thence into the bushes, and had taken refuge behind the trees. Their right wing was thus in front of the house I have so often mentioned, but all was in disorder, though they still fought the enemy which continued to advance.

In the mean time, on our right wing, there was stubborn fighting on both sides, our rear, meanwhile, being covered by a dense forest, which, just before, had protected our right flank. The road by which we were to retreat lay through the woods and was already in the hands of the enemy, who accordingly intercepted us. Finding myself, therefore, finally in my first mentioned position—alone, isolated, and almost surrounded by the enemy, and with no way open but the one leading to the house where the two 12-pound cannon stood, dismounted and deserted—I had no alternative but to make my way along it with great difficulty if I did not wish to be stuck in a damned crooked road.

After safely reaching the house under the protection of a musketry fire—which, however, owing to the bushes, was fully as dangerous to me as if the firing came from the enemy—I presently came across a little earth-work, 18 feet long by 5 feet high. This I at once made use of by posting my two cannon, one on the right, and the other on the left, and began a fire alternately with balls and with shells, without, however, being able to discriminate in favor of our men who were in the bushes; for the enemy, without troubling them, charged savagely upon my cannon, hoping to dismount and silence them. . . .

A brave English Lieutenant of Artillery, by the name of Schmidt, and a sergeant were the only two who were willing to serve the cannon longer. He came to me and asked me to let him have ten artillery-men and one subaltern from my detachment to serve these cannon. But it was impossible for me to grant his request, no matter how well disposed I might have been towards it. Two of my men had been shot dead; three or four were wounded; a number had straggled off, and all of the infantry detailed for that purpose either gone to the devil or run away. Moreover, all I had left, for the serving of each cannon, were four or five men and one subaltern. A six-pound cannon, also, on account of its rapidity in firing, was more effectual than a twelve-pounder, with which only one-third the number of shots could be fired; and furthermore, I had no desire to silence my own cannon, which were still in my possession, and thereby contribute to raise the honors of another corps. Three wagons of ammunition were fired away by my cannon, which became so heated that it was impossible for any man to lay his hands on them. In front, and also to the right and left of my guns, I had conquered, for myself and for those who were in the same terrain, a pretty comfortable fort. But this state of things lasted only a short time, the fire behind us coming nearer. Finally, our right wing was repulsed in our rear; its infantry, however, fortunately retreating in better order than our left wing had done.

I still could see, as far as the plain and clearing reached, the road, on which I had marched to this second position, open, and a chance, therefore, to retreat. Accordingly, myself, the artillery-man Hausemann and two other artillery-men, hoping to save one of the cannon, dragged it towards this road. The piece of wood on the cannon made the work for us four men very difficult and, in fact, next to impossible. Finally, a subaltern followed with the other cannon and placed it on the carriage. We now brought up the other carriage, on which I quickly placed the remaining gun, and marched briskly along the road, hoping to meet a body of our Infantry and with them make a stand. But this hope proved delusive and was totally dispelled; for some ran in one, and others in another direction; and by the time that I came within gunshot of the woods, I found the road occupied by the enemy. They came towards us on it; the bushes were full of them; they were hidden behind the trees; and bullets in plenty received us.

Seeing that all was irretrievably lost, and that it was impossible to save anything, I called to the few remaining men to save themselves. I myself took refuge through a fence, in a piece of dense underbrush on the right of the road, with the last ammunition wagon, which, with the help of a gunner, I saved with the horses. Here I met all the different nationalities of our division running pell-mell—among them Capt. Schoel, with whom there was not a single man left of the Hanau Regiment. In this confused retreat all made for our camp and our lines. The entrenchment of Breymann was furiously assailed; the camp in it set on fire and burned, and all the baggage-horses and baggage captured by the enemy. The three 6-pound cannon of my brigade of artillery were also taken, the artillery-men, Wachler and Fintzell, killed, and artillery-man Wall (under whose command were the cannon) severely, and others slightly, wounded. The enemy occupied this entrenchment and remained in it during the night. The approaching darkness put an end to further operations on the part of the Americans.

5. THE DECIMATION IN BURGOYNE'S RANKS

Journal of Lieutenant William Digby of the Shropshire Regiment.

[October 7, 1777]. Brigadier General Frazier was mortally wounded, which helped to turn the fate of the day. When General Burgoyne saw him fall, he seemed then to feel in the highest degree our disagreeable situation. He was the only person we could carry off with us. Our cannon were surrounded and taken—the men and horses being all killed—which gave them additional spirits, and they rushed on with loud shouts, when we drove them back a little way with so great loss to ourselves that it evidently appeared a retreat was the only thing left for us.

They still advanced upon our works under a severe fire of grape shot, which in some measure stopped them by the great execution we saw made among their columns; during which another body of the enemy stormed the German lines after meeting with a most shameful resistance, and took possession of all their camp and equipage, baggage, etc., etc., Colo. Bremen fell nobly at the head of the foreigners, and by his death blotted out part of the stain his countrymen so justly merited from that day's behaviour.

On our retreating, which was pretty regular, considering how hard we were pressed by the enemy, General Burgoyne appeared greatly agitated as the danger to which the lines were exposed was of the most serious nature at that particular period. . . . He said but little, well knowing we could defend the lines or fall in the attempt. Darkness interposed (I believe fortunately for us), which put an end to the action.

General Frazier was yet living, but not the least hopes of him. He that night asked if Genl. Burgoyne's army were not all cut to pieces, and being informed to the contrary, appeared for a moment pleased, but spoke no more. Capt. Wight (53rd Grenadiers), my captain, was shot in the bowels early in the action. In him I lost a sincere friend. He lay in that situation between the two fires, and I have been since informed lived till the next day and was brought into their camp. Major Ackland was wounded and taken prisoner with our Quartermaster General and Major Williams of the Artillery. Sir Francis Clerk fell, Aid de camp to the general, with other principal officers. Our grenadier company, out of 20 men going out, left their captain and 16 men on the field.

Some here did not scruple to say General Burgoyne's manner of acting verified the rash stroke hinted at by General Gates in his orders of the 26th; but that was a harsh and severe insinuation, as I have since heard his intended design was to take post on a rising ground, on the left of their camp—the 7th—with the detachment, thinking they would not have acted on the offensive, but stood to their works, and on that night our main body was to move, so as to be prepared to storm their lines by day break of the 8th; and it appears by accounts since that Gen Gates would have acted on the defensive, only for the advice of Brigadier General Arnold, who assured him from his knowledge of the troops a vigorous sally would inspire them with more courage than waiting behind their works for our attack, and also their knowledge of the woods would contribute to ensure the plan he proposed.

During the night we were employed in moving our cannon, baggage, etc., nearer to the river. It was done with silence, and fires were kept lighted to cause them not to suspect we had retired from our works where it was impossible for us to remain, as the German lines commanded them, and were then in possession of the enemy, who were bringing up cannon to bear on ours at day break. It may easily be supposed we had no thought for sleep, and some time before day we retreated nearer to the river. Our design of retreating to Ticonderoga then became public.

XI. THE SURRENDER OF BURGOYNE

Abandoned by his would-be rescuers, cut off in the rear, decimated in numbers and desperately short of provisions, Burgoyne, unanimously supported by his ranking officers, decided to ask for terms. Gates first demanded an unconditional surrender. When Burgoyne rejected that, Gates, in a curiously craven or strangely conciliatory mood, then accepted the terms virtually dictated by the defeated British general. Apparently fearing that the small detachment under General Vaughan dispatched by Sir Henry Clinton might reach Albany and try to effect a juncture with Burgoyne, Gates foolishly made extraordinary concessions.

By the terms of the Saratoga Convention of October 16, Burgoyne's troops were permitted to march out of camp with the honors of war, their arms "to be piled by word of command of their own officers." "A free passage" to Great Britain was to be granted to Burgoyne's army "on condition of not serving again in North America during the present contest," and they were to march to Boston by the most expeditious route and to be quartered and provisioned in the vicinity of that port until transports came to convey them home. Burgoyne's army was broadly interpreted to include seamen, batteauxmen, artificers and even camp followers, and special provision was made for the Canadians, who were to be conducted to Lake George, and bound by the same conditions as the British army. As Burgoyne put it, in his letter to Germain of October 20, "I call it saving the army, because if sent home, the State is thereby enabled to send forth the troops now destined for her internal defence; if exchanged, they become a force to Sir William Howe, as effectually as if any other junction had been made." For himself, however, Burgoyne confessed he was "sunk in mind and body."

Two important truths Burgoyne had painfully discovered as a result of his campaign: first, that "the panic of the rebel troops is confined, and of short duration; the enthusiasm is extensive and permanent"; second, that no reliance could be placed on the Loyalists. Subjected to an examination by Parliament on his return from America, Burgoyne asked his hearers:

Would the Tories have risen? Why did they not rise round Albany and below it, at the time they found Mr. Gates's army increasing? . . . Why did they not rise in that populous and, as supposed, well affected district, the German Flats, at the time St. Leger was before Fort Stanwix? A critical insurrection from any one point of the compass within distance to create a diversion, would probably have secured the success of the campaign.

His demand for a court-martial denied, "Gentleman Johnny" was never given another command.

In a letter to his wife written three days after the surrender Gates summed up the lesson of Saratoga: "If old England is not by this lesson taught humility, then she is an obstinate old slut, bent upon her ruin."

1. "THE STATE OF OUR ARMY WAS TRULY CALAMITOUS"

Letter of Thomas Anburey, British lieutenant.

Cambridge, Massachusetts, November 15, 1777

The state and situation of our army was truly calamitous!—worn down by a series of incessant toils and stubborn actions; abandoned in our utmost distress by the Indians; weakened by the desertion, and disappointed as to the efficacy of the Canadians and Provincials by their timidity; the regular troops reduced, by the late heavy losses of many of our best men and distinguished officers, to only 3500 effective men, of which number there were not quite 2000 British:—in this state of weakness, no possibility of retreat, our provisions nearly exhausted, and invested by an army of four times our number that almost encircled us, who would not attack us from a knowledge of our situation, and whose works could not be assaulted in any part. In this perilous situation the men lay continually upon their arms, the enemy incessantly cannonading us, and their rifle and cannon shot reaching every part of our camp.

True courage submits with great difficulty to despair, and in the midst of all those dangers and arduous trials, the valor and constancy of the British troops were astonishing: they still retained their spirits, in hopes that either the long-expected relief would arrive from New-York, which the army implicitly believed from an order that had been given out at our camp at Still-Water, stating that powerful armies were to act in co-operation with ours, or that the enemy would attack us, which was most fervently wished for, as it would have given us an opportunity of dying gallantly or extricating ourselves with honor.

After waiting the whole of the 13th day of October in anxious expectation of what it would produce, and to which time it had been resolved to endure all extremities in maintaining our ground against the enemy—no prospect of assistance appearing, and no rational ground of hope remaining, it was thought proper, in the evening, to take an exact account of the provisions left, which amounted to no more than three days short allowance.

In this state of distress, a council of war was called, to which all the Generals, Field-officers and commanding officers of corps were summoned, when it was unanimously agreed that in the present circumstances we could do no other than treat with the enemy.

2. BARONESS VON RIEDESEL DESCRIBES THE HORRORS OF THE BATTLE

Journal of General Riedesel's wife for the month of October 1777.

Toward evening [of October '9], we at last came to Saratoga, which was only half an hour's march from the place where we had spent the whole day. I was wet through and through by the frequent rains, and was obliged to remain in this condition the entire night, as I had no place whatever where I could change my linen. I, therefore, seated myself before a good fire, and undressed my children; after which, we laid ourselves down together upon some straw. I asked General Phillips, who came up to where we were, why we did not continue our retreat while there was yet time, as my husband had pledged himself to cover it and bring the army through.

"Poor woman," answered he, "I am amazed at you! completely wet through, have you still the courage to wish to go further in this weather! Would that you were only our commanding general! He halts because he is tired, and intends to spend the night here and give us a supper."

In this latter achievement, especially, General Burgoyne was very fond of indulging. He spent half the nights in singing and drinking, and amusing himself with the wife of a commissary, who was his mistress, and who, as well as he, loved champagne.

On the 10th, at seven o'clock in the morning, I drank some tea by way of refreshment; and we now hoped from one moment to another that at last we would again get under way. General Burgoyne, in order to cover our retreat, caused the beautiful houses and mills at Saratoga, belonging to General Schuyler, to be burned. An English officer brought some excellent broth, which he shared with me, as I was not able to refuse his urgent entreaties.

Thereupon we set out upon our march, but only as far as another place not far from where we had started. The greatest misery and the utmost disorder prevailed in the army. The commissaries had forgotten to distribute provisions among the troops. There were cattle enough, but not one had been killed. More than thirty officers came to me, who could endure hunger no longer. I had coffee and tea made for them, and divided among them all the provisions with which my carriage was constantly filled; for we had a cook who, although an arrant knave, was fruitful in all expedients, and often in the night crossed small rivers in order to steal from the country people sheep, poultry and pigs. He would then charge us a high price for them—a circumstance, however, that we only learned a long time afterward. . . .

The whole army clamored for a retreat, and my husband promised to make it possible, provided only that no time was lost. But General Burgoyne, to whom an order had been promised if he brought about a junction with the army of General Howe, could not determine upon this course, and lost every thing by his loitering.

About two o'clock in the afternoon, the firing of cannon and small arms was again heard, and all was alarm and confusion. My husband sent me a message telling me to betake myself forthwith into a house which was not far from there. I seated myself in the calash with my children, and had scarcely driven up to the house when I saw on the opposite side of the Hudson River five or six men with guns, which were aimed at us. Almost involuntarily I threw the children on the bottom of the calash and myself over them. At the same instant the churls fired, and shattered the arm of a poor English soldier behind us, who was already wounded, and was also on the point of retreating into the house.

Immediately after our arrival a frightful cannonade began, principally directed against the house in which we had sought shelter, probably because the enemy believed, from seeing so many people flocking around it, that all the generals made it their headquarters. Alas! it harbored none but wounded soldiers, or women! We were finally obliged to take refuge in a cellar, in which I laid myself down in a corner not far from the door. My children lay down on the earth with their heads upon my lap, and in this manner we passed the entire night. A horrible stench, the cries of the children, and yet more than all this, my own anguish, prevented me from closing my eyes. On the following morning the cannonade again began, but from a different side. I advised all to go out of the cellar for a little while, during which time I would have it cleaned, as otherwise we would all be sick. They followed my suggestion, and I at once set many hands to work, which was in the highest degree necessary; for the women and children, being afraid to venture forth, had soiled the whole cellar.

After they had all gone out and left me alone, I for the first time surveyed our place of refuge. It consisted of three beautiful cellars, splendidly arched. I proposed that the most dangerously wounded of the officers should be brought into one of them; that the women should remain in another; and that all the rest should stay in the third, which was nearest the entrance. I had just given the cellars a good sweeping, and had fumigated them by sprinkling vinegar on burning coals, and each one had found his place prepared for him—when a fresh and terrible cannonade threw us all once more into alarm. Many persons, who had no right to come in, threw themselves against the door. My children were already under the cellar steps, and we would all have been crushed, if God had not given me strength to place myself before the door, and with extended arms prevent all from coming in; otherwise every one of us would have been severely injured.

Eleven cannon balls went through the house, and we could plainly hear them rolling over our heads. One poor soldier, whose leg they were about to amputate, having been laid upon a table for this purpose, had the other leg taken off by another cannon ball, in the very middle of the operation. His comrades all ran off, and when they again came back they found him in one corner of the room, where he had rolled in his anguish, scarcely breathing. I was more dead than alive, though not so much on account of our own danger as for that which enveloped my husband, who, however, frequently sent to see how I was getting along, and to tell me that he was still safe. . . .

Our cook saw to our meals, but we were in want of water; and in order to quench thirst, I was often obliged to drink wine and give it, also, to the children. It was, moreover, the only thing that my husband could take, which fact so worked upon our faithful Rockel that he said to me one day, "I fear that the general drinks so much wine because he dreads falling into captivity, and is therefore weary of life." The continual danger in which my husband was encompassed was a constant source of anxiety to me. I was the only one of all the women whose husband had not been killed or wounded, and I often said to myself—especially since my husband was placed in such great danger day and night—"Shall I be the only fortunate one?" He never came into the tent at night, but lay outside by the watch fires. This alone was sufficient to have caused his death, as the nights were damp and cold.

As the great scarcity of water continued, we at last found a soldier's wife who had the courage to bring water from the river, for no one else would undertake it, as the enemy shot at the head of every man who approached the river. This woman, however, they never molested; and they told us afterward that they spared her on account of her sex.

I endeavored to divert my mind from my troubles by constantly busying myself with the wounded. I made them tea and coffee, and received in return a thousand benedictions. Often, also, I shared my noonday meal with them. One day a Canadian officer came into our cellar who could scarcely stand up. We at last got it out of him that he was almost dead with hunger. I considered myself very fortunate to have it in my power to offer him my mess. This gave him renewed strength, and gained for me his friendship. Afterward, upon our return to Canada, I learned to know his family. One of our greatest annoyances was the stench of the wounds when they began to suppurate. . . .

In this horrible situation we remained six days. Finally, they spoke of capitulating, as by temporizing for so long a time our retreat had been cut off. A cessation of hostilities took place, and my husband, who was thoroughly worn out, was able, for the first time in a long while, to lie down upon a bed. In order that his rest might not be in the least disturbed, I had a good bed made up for him in a little room; while I, with my children and both my maids, lay down in a little parlor close by. But about one o'clock in the night some one came and asked to speak to him. It was with the greatest reluctance that I found myself obliged to awaken him. I observed that the message did not please him, as he immediately sent the man back to headquarters and laid himself down again considerably out of humor.

Soon after this General Burgoyne requested the presence of all the generals and staff officers at a council of war, which was to be held early the next morning; in which he proposed to break the capitulation, already made with the enemy, in consequence of some false information just received. It was, however, finally decided that this was neither practicable nor advisable; and this was fortunate for us, as the Americans said to us afterwards that had the capitulation been broken we all would have been massacred; which they could have done the more easily as we were not over four or five thousand men strong, and had given them time to bring together more than twenty thousand. . . .

At last my husband sent to me a groom with a message that I should come to him with our children. I, therefore, again seated myself in my dear calash; and in the passage through the American camp I observed with great satisfaction that no one cast at us scornful glances. On the contrary, they all greeted me, even showing compassion on their countenances at seeing a mother with her little children in such a situation. I confess that I feared to come into the enemy's camp, as the thing was so entirely new to me.

When I approached the tents, a noble-looking man came toward me, took the children out of the wagon, embraced and kissed them, and then with tears in his eyes helped me also to alight. "You tremble," said he to me. "Fear nothing."

"No," replied I, "for you are so kind, and have been so tender toward my children, that it has inspired me with courage."

He then led me to the tent of General Gates, with whom I found Generals Burgoyne and Phillips, who were upon an extremely friendly footing with him.

Burgoyne said to me, "You may now dismiss all your apprehensions, for your sufferings are at an end."

I answered him that I should certainly be acting very wrongly to have any more anxiety when our chief had none, and especially when I saw him on such friendly footing with General Gates. All the generals remained to dine with General Gates.

The man who had received me so kindly came up and said to me, "It may be embarrassing to you to dine with all these gentlemen; come now with your children into my tent, where I will give you, it is true, a frugal meal, but one that will be accompanied by the best of wishes."

"You are certainly," answered I, "a husband and a father, since you show me so much kindness."

I then learned that he was the American General Schuyler. He entertained me with excellent smoked tongue, beefsteaks, potatoes, good butter and bread. Never have I eaten a better meal. I was content. I saw that all around me were so likewise; but that which rejoiced me more than every thing else was that my husband was out of all danger. As soon as we had finished dinner, he invited me to take up my residence at his house, which was situated in Albany, and told me that General Burgoyne would, also, be there. I sent and asked my husband what I should do. He sent me word to accept the invitation; and as it was two days' journey from where we were, and already five o'clock in the afternoon, he advised me to set out in advance, and to stay over night at a place distant about three hours' ride. General Schuyler was so obliging as to send with me a French officer, who was a very agreeable man and commanded those troops who composed the reconnoitering party of which I have before made mention. As soon as he had escorted me to the house where we were to remain, he went back. . . .

The day after this we arrived at Albany, where we had so often longed to be. But we came not, as we supposed we should, as victors! We were, nevertheless, received in the most friendly manner by the good General Schuyler, and by his wife and daughters, who showed us the most marked courtesy, as, also, General Burgoyne, although he had—without any necessity it was said—caused their magnificently built houses to be burned. But they treated us as people who knew how to forget their own losses in the misfortunes of others.

Even General Burgoyne was deeply moved at their magnanimity and said to General Schuyler, "Is it to me, who have done you so much injury, that you show so much kindness!"

"That is the fate of war," replied the brave man; "let us say no more about it."

We remained three days with them, and they acted as if they were very reluctant to let us go.

3. "THUS ENDED ALL OUR HOPES OF VICTORY, HONOR, GLORY"

Journal of Lieutenant William Digby of the Shropshire Regiment.

Gen. Burgoyne desired a meeting of all the officers early that morning, at which he entered into a detail of his manner of acting since he had the honour of commanding the army; but he was too full to speak; heaven only could tell his feelings at this time. He dwelled much on his orders to make the wished-for junction with General Clinton, and as to how his proceedings had turned out, we must (he said) be as good judges as himself. He then read over the Articles of Convention, and informed us the terms were even easier than we could have expected from our situation, and concluded with assuring us he never would have accepted any terms, had we provisions enough, or the least hopes of our extricating ourselves any other way.

About 10 o'clock we marched out, according to treaty, with drums beating and the honours of war, but the drums seemed to have lost their former inspiriting sounds, and though we beat the Grenadiers march, which not long before was so animating, yet then it seemed by its last feeble effort as if almost ashamed to be heard on such an occasion.

As to my own feelings, I cannot express them. Tears (though unmanly) forced their way, and if alone, I could have burst to give myself vent. I never shall forget the appearance of their troops on our marching past them; a dead silence universally reigned through their numerous columns, and even then they seemed struck with our situation and dare scarce lift up their eyes to view British troops in such a situation. I must say their decent behaviour during the time (to us so greatly fallen) meritted the utmost approbation and praise.

The meeting between Burgoyne and Gates was well worth seeing. He paid Burgoyne almost as much respect as if he was the conqueror; indeed, his noble air, tho prisoner, seemed to command attention and respect from every person. A party of light dragoons were ordered as his guard, rather to protect his person from insults than any other cause.

Thus ended all our hopes of victory, honour, glory, etc. Thus was Burgoyne's Army sacrificed to either the absurd opinions of a blundering ministerial power, the stupid inaction of a general [Howe], who, from his lethargic disposition, neglected every step he might have taken to assist their operations, or lastly, perhaps, his own misconduct in penetrating so far as to be unable to return, and tho I must own my partiality to him is great, yet if he or the army under his command are guilty, let them suffer to the utmost extent, and by an unlimited punishment in part blot out and erase, if possible, the crime charged to their account.

CHAPTER FOURTEEN

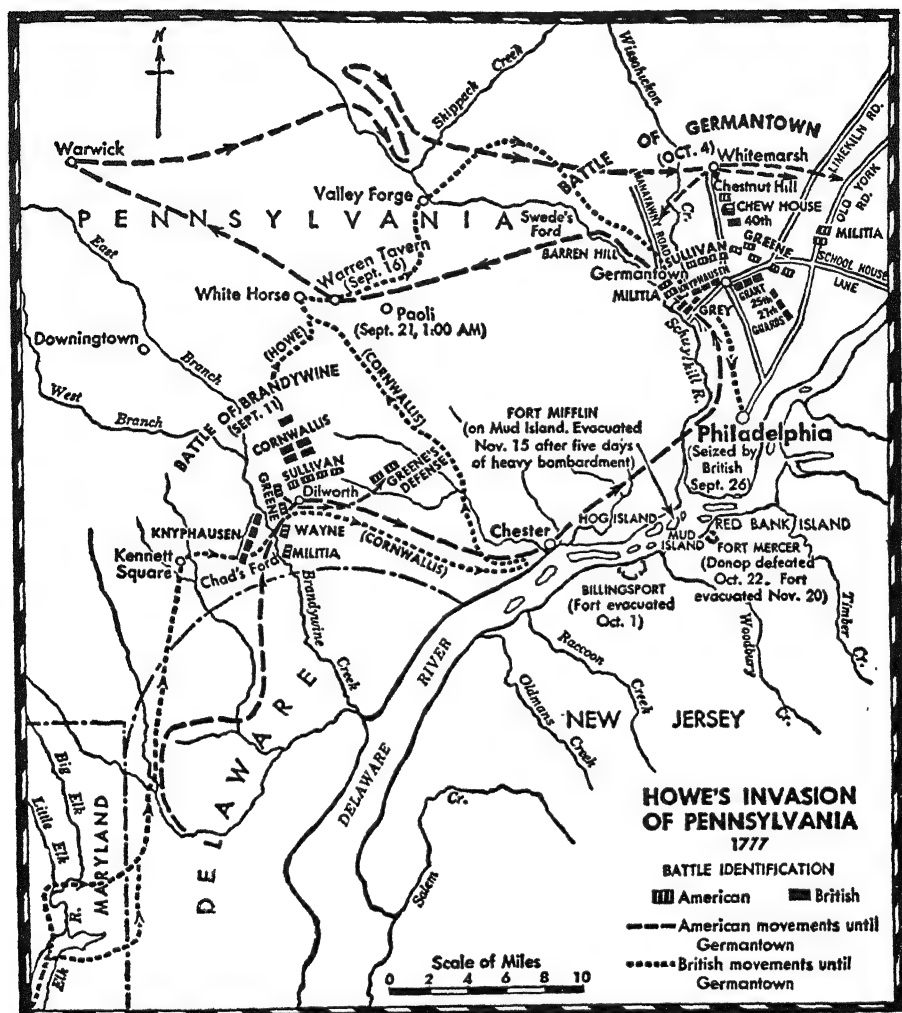

Howe Invades Pennsylvania

ALL BRITISH generals in America were hypnotized by the notion that some place other than where they happened to be located at the moment was the seedbed of loyalism and awaiting deliverance at the hands of the British armed forces. Disappointed in his expectations of the New York campaign, Sir William Howe now considered Pennsylvania to be a major objective of the war. To seize it would be to divide the colonies and to be in control of the leading metropolis of the continent, a center of wealth and culture and a notorious stronghold of loyalism and neutralism.

Howe's plan for an attack on Philadelphia was approved by Germain as early as March 3, 1777. Howe then decided to invade it by sea rather than by land. The British commander was optimistic that this move would end the war. He was convinced that public opinion in Pennsylvania favored the British cause, that the capture of the province would be easy, and that by drawing Washington into Pennsylvania he would be materially aiding Burgoyne's advance, which was essential to final victory. In guessing Washington's probable moves he was not mistaken, for the American commander might have moved his entire army north, where he could probably have crushed Burgoyne much more quickly than Gates did, and then swung south to meet Howe. Instead, he weakened himself by sending substantial troops to Gates, and for this and other reasons was forced to yield Philadelphia, the main objective of Howe's expedition.

Howe had counted on a quick victory, but as usual his timetable proved his greatest enemy. He had not counted on Washington's keeping the main American army in Pennsylvania nor on the stubborn character of the resistance. In fact, at Brandywine and Germantown it was touch and go. Either side could have won. In both battles faulty intelligence lost the day for Washington. Nevertheless the defenses of the Delaware proved so formidable that it was not until the end of November that the Delaware as far north as Philadelphia was clear for British vessels, more than a month after Burgoyne surrendered his army at Saratoga.

Howe's strategy had failed. He did not destroy Washington's army, but in fact found a second formidable army in the North now arrayed against the British. He did not seize and occupy the interior of the state. He did not move quickly enough to rescue Burgoyne and salvage something from Britain's boldest effort of the war. Since winter campaigns were not fashionable the British bedded down in snug Philadelphia quarters for the season. With spring came word of the French entry into the war. Then it was decided to abandon Philadelphia and not risk dividing the British forces. Another elaborate campaign had failed, and its failure left thousands of disillusioned Tories to make their peace with a returning Patriot army.

The Pennsylvania campaign revealed, on the one hand, Washington's inadequacies as a battle commander and, on the other, his inspired qualities of courage, candor, and dedication to the cause in the face of overwhelming discouragement. While he was losing Philadelphia, Gates was conquering an entire British army. It was only natural that dissatisfaction with his leadership should arise. Whether the dissatisfaction was conspiratorial or spontaneous is of no consequence. What was important for final victory was Washington's ability to vanquish his enemies in Congress and in the army and to keep his hold upon the affections of his troops.

I. PHILADELPHIA IS THE OBJECTIVE

By early April 1777 word had spread in the Patriot camp that Howe had begun to embark his troops in New York aboard transports. Where would he strike? Strike he would, and soon, Washington believed. On April 3 he wrote General Parsons, "The campaign is opening, and we have no men for the field." Any idea that Howe was planning a frontal attack on the main American army was dissipated when word came on June 21 that Howe was withdrawing from Brunswick. Washington planned to fall upon Howe's rear, but the British general managed to elude the Patriots and move his forces to Amboy, and then transport them to Staten Island.

Would Howe now try to form a junction with Burgoyne or move swiftly against Philadelphia? Logic dictated the former move, but the British general disdained logic. His troops boarded transports at Sandy Hook and on the morning of July 31 an express from the President of Congress reached Washington with the news that the British fleet had appeared off the capes of Delaware Bay the preceding day. Washington quickly put his army in motion toward Philadelphia.

Howe began his operations in his characteristic but plodding fashion. His fleet with 15,000 troops did not embark from New York until July 23. When the British finally got under way, they began the campaign with a capital blunder. Instead of moving the fleet directly up the Delaware to Philadelphia, Howe was persuaded that the navigation of that river was too hazardous and its defenses impressive, and chose to go around Cape Charles and up the Chesapeake, a very long route indeed between New York and the Quaker City. Instead of landing at New Castle, 33 miles from Philadelphia, the British forces disembarked at Head of Elk, 55 miles from their objective. Washington moved down to meet them. His brilliant young aide, Alexander Hamilton, approved this strategy. "I would not only fight them, but I would attack them," he wrote Gouverneur Morris and Robert R. Livingston on September 1, "for I hold it an established maxim that there is three to one in favor of the party attacking."

1. "THIS REBELLION WILL BE CRUSHED IN THE PRESENT CAMPAIGN"

Ambrose Serle to the Earl of Dartmouth.

New York, May 20, 1777

... The army is not yet in motion, though preparing to move. I hear that the want of tents and some other military stores, daily expected, has retarded the commencement of the operations. Your Lordship will perceive by the inclosed papers that there are positive accounts among the Rebels of the Northern Army being at or near Ticonderoga.

The destruction of the late magazines, at this season of the year, has proved a very severe blow to the Rebels: and it has given them the more concern as they know their inability to replace most of the stores and military equipage.

By confirmed intelligence just received from the Rebel-Quarters, we find that Washington's whole force, which is all the force he has been able to collect by every means, does not amount to 7000 men, which are distributed at Bound-brook, Morris Town, Princeton, and all prepared to decamp at a minute's warning; that (as one of the parties learnt by an immediate communication from one of Washington's own family) he himself is frequently shut up from all company, looks extremely dejected, and is sometimes surprised in tears; that the New England Provinces have sent him few or no men, of which he has made very particular complaints; that his reinforcements and succors from the southward have been very slow and very small; that the Rebels, among themselves, confess that they are unable to defend Philadelphia; that all the necessities of life, and especially salt, are advanced to an extravagant price; and that the country in general is groaning under the tyranny and difficulties brought upon them, and longing for deliverance and peace. I have examined minutely into these general circumstances from several informants, and find them consistent with or rather corroborating each other.

This being the case, in addition to their numerous losses by sea, we may venture to think that, by the blessing of Providence, this ungrateful rebellion will be crushed in the course of the present campaign. But the Northern Army must descend—descend in force too, and perhaps with force of every kind. There needs no cruelty in that event, but there must be determination and vigor. Afterwards, in their proper place, there will be room for the exercise of compassion and mercy.

2. THE BRITISH LAND AT HEAD OF ELK

Journal of Captain John Montresor of the Royal Engineers.

Sunday 25th. This day August 25th, 1777, landed at head of Elk. This morning at ½ past 9 the van of the fleet came to an anchor opposite Cecil Court House and Elk Ferry, and in half an hour after the flat bottomed boats made good their landing at the ferry house called Elk Ferry in the Province of Maryland, the rebels, consisting only of 4 companies militia under a Colonel Rumsey, fled without firing a shot. The troops huddled with rails and Indian corn stocks, no baggage or camp equipage admitted. Came on about 10 this night a heavy storm of rain, lightning and thunder. The wind being southerly brought up the fleet a short time after the landing. The army surprisingly healthy after so long a voyage and in such a climate—the return of the sick are about four to each battalion, very little fresh stock collected, and imperfect accounts of the situation of the enemy. Inhabitants in numbers and well dressed at Cecil Court House Point. Troops landed with sixty rounds per man.

26th. No motion—no inhabitants having deserted their houses and drove off their stock. Orders this evening for the troops to march to-morrow morning at 3 o'clock. A very heavy storm all this night of thunder, lightning and rain at north east. The shoalness of the Elk convinced the Rebels that our fleet would never navigate it, but through the great abilities of our naval officers it was happily effected as the bottom was muddy and the ships on it were cutting channels through it for each other. . . .

28th. The army moved between 3 and 4 this morning. The weather extremely fine which dried the roads, which would have been otherwise impassible; the medium 12-pounders proved to be most difficult to pass through the sloughs. Two houses got on fire after quitting the quarters but appeared to me to have been done on purpose. About 9 o'clock this morning our army arrived at the town of Elk consisting of about 40 well built brick and stone houses; our march hither about 7½ miles. Very few shots exchanged this day with the enemy. One thousand men under a Colonel Paterson and the Philadelphia Light Horse fled from this town on our approach, part to Gray's hill 2½ miles beyond the town, which the rebels likewise quitted; as we reached the summit we could observe them but not within cannon shot.

3. WASHINGTON ADVANCES TO MEET THE BRITISH

Captain Walter Stewart of the Continental Army to General Gates.

New Port, September 2, 1777

We arrived about two miles below this place, the day after the enemy had effected a landing for about four thousand men at a place called Charles Town; from which they the day after pushed for and took possession of Gray's Hill, at the distance of about seven miles in a strait line to Philadelphia; at this place contrary to our expectations they have since remained, as they have had orders at two different times to march at three in the morning; they will now however find it a difficult matter to advance as Genl. Washington has pushed down a light corps, consisting of about three thousand men mostly with rifles, together with the Malitia and Light Horse, to a post about a mile from them, called Iron Hill; here the country is, one would imagine, formed by Nature for defence, having a great quantity of woods, large morasses they must pass through, and many commanding hills, which the Malitia may take post upon.

Shortly after their landing we got a good many prisoners, generally twenty each day, but they are now grown vastly more cautious, and tis very hard to meet with any of them; their pickets are not farther distant from the main body than three hundred yards; indeed all their actions tend to make us imagine they are much afraid of us.

From the best accounts we can gather they consist of about 9000 men, in general very healthy; only 140 of the horses brought with them (as light horse) now exist, having lost 150 the day after they landed by turning them into a corn field, where they were so very voracious that they eat until they dropt dead in the field: this we have from eight or ten people, who were eye witnesses of the matter.

Our army are in amazing high spirits, and very healthy. Wishing earnestly for their approach we were drawn here in order to support the Malitia who are all pushed down between the enemy and us, but believe the General will soon have the greatest part of the army down on Iron Hill, as he has this morning ordered another detachment to join the Light Corps, and I imagine will still be stealing them on in this manner.

We are throwing up a few works at Wilmington, where Wayne is like a mad bear, it falling to his brigade; I believe he heartily wishes all engineers at the devil.

I do assure you, your successes to the northward add vastly to our spirits.

II. BRANDYWINE

The British moved cautiously up both sides of the Elk. Washington had Brigadier General William Maxwell post his men on the upper waters of the Christina River, a tributary to the Delaware. The British began their forward move on September 2, when they forced back Maxwell's men. To meet a flanking move around his right and rear, Washington then withdrew his forces to Chad's Ford on the Brandywine. Brandywine Creek was a logical place to stop the enemy. Unless he was checked there, there were no obstacles in his way until he reached the Schuylkill. By the tenth the British army had been assembled at Kennett Square, just across Delaware's border in Pennsylvania.

Brandywine was an extraordinary repeat performance of the battle of Long Island. The British advanced their forces toward Chad's Ford on the morning of September 11 and tried to cross the creek under fire from Maxwell's men, but were forced back. Here they seemed to be reinforcing their position on the west bank, and both sides engaged in a furious artillery barrage. About 11 o'clock report came from Colonel Moses Hazen upstream that the British were moving to the forks of the creek to turn the American right flank. Then Sullivan reported to Washington that he had contrary intelligence "so that Colonel Hazen's information must be wrong." Washington, who had intended an offensive at Chad's Ford against what was in fact the weakest link in the British line, hesitated while precious time was lost. Early in the afternoon a farmer rode up to Washington's headquarters to tell the general that unless the army moved immediately it would be surrounded. This was confirmed by Colonel Bland. Sullivan was ordered to march at once to meet the column advancing on his rear. Washington waited impatiently, and finally had a guide take him to the scene of the firing. When he came up he saw that Sullivan had made a faulty disposition of his troops and that the whole line was beginning to break. Washington and Lafayette tried to rally the fleeing army, and among the whistling bullets one lodged in Lafayette's leg. The troops in withdrawal were horribly tangled up and it took until nearly midnight to get them into a semblance of order. The Americans suffered a thousand casualties, the British only half that number.

The defeat must be attributed to a lack of knowledge of the ground and inadequate reconnaissance. Sullivan was the chief scapegoat, but the truth is that Washington himself did not operate on the battlefield that day with his customary alertness and had signally failed to use his cavalry on the right flank. These mistakes opened the back door to Philadelphia.

1. CHAD'S FORD: "THE EVENT FELL LITTLE SHORT OF THE PROJECT"

Journal of Major John André, Adjutant General in the British Army.

Sept. 10th and 11th. The army marched in two columns under Lord Cornwallis and General Knyphausen (Sir William Howe was with the former) and proceeded to the forks of Brandywine, crossed the ford there and by a circuit of about fifteen miles came upon the enemy's right flank, near Birmingham Meeting House. The latter took the straight road to Chad's Ford, opposite to which the Rebel army lay.

The design, it seemed, was that General Knyphausen, taking post at Chad's Ford, should begin early to cannonade the enemy on the opposite side, thereby to take up his attention and make him presume an attack was then intended with the whole army, whilst the other column should be performing the détour. Lord Cornwallis's wing being engaged was to be the signal for the troops under General Knyphausen to cross the ford when they were to push their advantage.

The event fell little short of the project. General Knyphausen posted himself early in the day on the heights opposite the Rebel army. This was distributed on all the most advantageous eminences overlooking the ford which lay beneath. On one of these hills they had thrown up a small breast-work with two guns, one a 12-pounder, and beneath this, flanking the ford and road, another battery of three guns and a howitzer. Felled trees obstructed the passage at other fords near this place. It was not without some opposition that General Knyphausen took up his ground, and whilst he was there a body of 2000 men crossed the river and came upon his right. They were driven back by one or two regiments.

On the left, Sir William Howe, drawing near Birmingham, found the Rebels posted on the heights to oppose him. Washington had drawn part of his army here about two hours before, on receiving the first intimation of General Howe's approach. At about 4 o'clock the attack began near the Meeting House. The Guards were formed upon the right, the British Grenadiers in the centre, and the Light Infantry and Chasseurs on the left. The Hessian Grenadiers supported the Guards and British Grenadiers, and the 4th Brigade supported the Light Infantry and the left of the Grenadiers. The 3d Brigade under General Grey was the reserve. The Guards met with very little resistance and penetrated to the very height overlooking the 4-gun battery of the Rebels at Chad's Ford, just as General Knyphausen had crossed. The Hessian Grenadiers were to their left and not so far advanced. The British Grenadiers divided after passing Birmingham Meeting House, the 1st Battalion inclining to the right and the 2d pushing about a mile beyond the village of Dilworth. The Light Infantry and Chasseurs inclined to the left, and by this means left an interval which was filled up by part of the 4th Brigade. The Light Infantry met with the chief resistance at a hill on which the Rebels had four pieces of cannon. At the end of the day the 2d Battalion Grenadiers received a very heavy fire; the 64th Regiment, which was near them, was engaged at the same time. The Rebels were driven back by the superior fire of the troops, but these were too much exhausted to be able to charge or pursue. The reserve moved centrically in the rear of the whole and inclined successively to the parts most engaged.

General Knyphausen, as was preconceived, passed the ford upon hearing the other column engaged, and the troops under him pushed the enemy with equal success. Night and the fatigue the soldiers had undergone prevented any pursuit. It is remarkable that after reconnoitering after the action, the right of General Howe's camp was found close on General Knyphausen's left, and nearly in a line, and in forming the general camp next day scarce any alteration was made.

2. "IT WAS FORTUNATE THAT THE NIGHT CAME ON"

Journal of Colonel Timothy Pickering of Massachusetts.

September 11th.—This morning a cannonade took place, the enemy having advanced to the heights opposite to those occupied by us, on the other side of the ford. A hot skirmish took place between our light troops, under Maxwell, and a party of Hessians, in which the latter were chiefly killed and wounded, not thirty running away, it being judged by Maxwell that three hundred of them were killed and wounded. The enemy made no attempt to cross at this place. The cannonade was mutual; theirs did us no harm, save killing one man.

The enemy remaining paraded on the distant heights, and continuing the cannonade, induced me to think they did not intend to cross at Chad's Ford, but only to amuse us while their main army crossed at some other place. The event proved the conjecture right. The enemy's main body crossed the Brandywine six or eight miles above, on our right. The General had intelligence of this by some messengers; but it was contradicted by others; and, the information remaining a long time surprisingly uncertain, it was late before a disposition was made to receive the enemy on that quarter. The consequence was that the divisions first engaged, being too far distant to be supported by others, were repulsed; and this laid the foundation for a final defeat. Nevertheless, Weedon's brigade, which got up a little before night, fought bravely and checked the pursuit of the enemy, and gave more time for the others to retreat. This engagement on the right began about half after three P.M., or four, and lasted till night.

When the battle raged most on the right, and the Continental troops were all, save Wayne's division, drawn off to the right, the enemy opposite Chad's Ford began a most furious cannonade, which was as warmly returned from the park of artillery. But at length the enemy pushed over, and, after an obstinate engagement with our artillery and Wayne's division, the latter retreated.

The whole army this night retired to Chester. It was fortunate for us that the night came on, for under its cover the fatigued stragglers and some wounded made their escape.

3. A PRINCETON BOY REPORTS, "OUR ARMY WAS SOMETHING BROKE"

Diary of Joseph Clark.

Sept. 11, [1777]. The cannonading began in the morning. At the upper ford the enemy sent a great part of their force about noon. Three divisions of our army were sent immediately to oppose them, viz: Sterling's, Sullivan's and Stephens'; but as there were no heights at this ford, on our side, to prevent their landing by cannon from batteries, we were obliged to oppose them after they had crossed; but as their number was larger than was expected, they stretched their line beyond ours and flanked our right wing shortly after the action began.

This occasioned the line to break, to prevent being surrounded, though the firing, while the action lasted, was the warmest, I believe, that has been in America since the war began; and, as our men on the left of the line were pretty well stationed, they swept off great numbers of the enemy before they retreated, and from the best accounts I could collect from the officers in the action, the enemy must have suffered very much from our people before they broke, though, indeed, our people suffered much in this action, and would have suffered more if Gen'l Green had not been detached to their assistance, by whose timely aid they made a safe retreat of the men, though we lost some pieces of artillery; he, however, got up too late to form in a proper line and give our party that was broken time to recover. Notwithstanding this repulse, which was the most severe upon the 3d Virginia Regiment, who, through mistake, was fired upon by our own men, our whole body got off with but an inconsiderable loss in men, though something considerable in artillery.

When the action began at the upper ford, the batteries at the middle ford opened upon each other with such fury as if the elements had been in convulsions; the valley was filled with smoke, and now I grew seriously anxious for the event. For an hour and a half this horrid sport continued, and about sunset I saw a column of the enemy advance to one of our batteries and take it. Under cover of their cannon they had crossed at the ford, and were advancing in a large body. What we lost at our batteries I have not yet heard. As all our militia were at the lower ford, where was no action, and Gen'l Green sent to reinforce at the upper ford, we had not a very large party to oppose the enemy at the middle ford. The body stationed across the valley drew off to the right, and formed farther back on an eminence, when an engagement began with musketry, and the enemy gave way; but, as night was spreading its dusky shade through the gloomy valley, and our army was something broke, it was necessary to leave the field of action and take care of the troops.

Accordingly, after sunset, the party at the middle ford drew off and marched down to Chester, where the whole army, by appointment, met. The sun was set when I left the hill from whence I saw the fate of the day. His Excellency I saw within 200 yards of the enemy, with but a small party about him, and they drawing off from their station, our army broke at the right, and night coming on, adding a gloom to our misfortunes, amidst the noise of cannon, the hurry of people, and wagons driving in confusion from the field, I came off with a heart full of distress. In painful anxiety I took with hasty step the gloomy path from the field, and travelled 15 miles to Chester, where I slept two hours upon a couple of chairs. . . .

4. AN ELDERLY FARMER WARNS WASHINGTON OF HIS PERIL

William Darlington to Thomas Wharton, Jr.

November 29, 1845

. . . General Washington's headquarters were at Benjamin Ring's tavern, about three quarters of a mile east of Chadd's ford. He was there, and there about, all the fore part of the day of the battle. When he ascertained that the main body of the enemy were at Birmingham Meeting House and engaged our troops, he was anxious to proceed thither by the shortest and speediest route. He found a resident of the neighborhood, named Joseph Brown, and asked him to go as a guide. Brown was an elderly man, and extremely loth to undertake that duty. He made many excuses, but the occasion was too urgent for ceremony. One of Washington's suite dismounted from a fine charger, and told Brown if he did not instantly get on his horse and conduct the General by the nearest and best route to the place of action, he would run him through on the spot.

Brown thereupon mounted and steered his course direct towards Birmingham Meeting House with all speed—the General and his attendants being close at his heels. He said the horse leapt all the fences without difficulty, and was followed in like manner by the others. The head of Gen. Washington's horse, he said, was constantly at the flank of the one on which he was mounted; and the General was continually repeating to him, "Push along, old man—Push along, old man." When they reached the road, about half a mile west of Dilworthstown, Brown said the bullets were flying so thick that he felt very uncomfortable; and as Washington now no longer required nor paid attention to his guide, the latter embraced the first opportunity to dismount and make his escape.

5. WASHINGTON LAYS THE DEFEAT TO CONTRADICTIONARY INTELLIGENCE

George Washington to the President of Congress.

At Midnight, Chester, September 11, 1777

Sir: I am sorry to inform you, that in this day's engagement, we have been obliged to leave the enemy masters of the field.

Unfortunately the intelligence received of the enemy's advancing up the Brandywine, and crossing at a ford about six miles above us, was uncertain and contradictory, notwithstanding all my pains to get the best. This prevented my making a disposition, adequate to the force with which the Enemy attacked us on the right; in consequence of which the troops first engaged, were obliged to retire before they could be reinforced. In the midst of the attack on the right, that body of the Enemy which remained on the other side of Chad's Ford, crossed it, and attacked the division there under the command of General Wayne and the light troops under General Maxwell who, after a severe conflict, also retired. The Militia under the command of Major Genl. Armstrong, being posted at a ford, about two miles below Chad's, had no opportunity of engaging.

But though we fought under many disadvantages, and were from the causes, above mentioned obliged to retire, yet our loss of men is not, I am persuaded, very considerable, I believe much less than the enemy's. We have also lost about seven or eight pieces of cannon, according to the best information I can at present obtain. The baggage having been previously moved off, is all secure, saving the men's Blankets, which being at their backs, many of them doubtless are lost.

I have directed all the Troops to Assemble behind Chester, where they are now arranging for this Night. Notwithstanding the misfortune of the day, I am happy to find the troops in good spirits; and I hope another time we shall compensate for the losses now sustained.

The Marquis La Fayette was wounded in the leg, and Gen. Woodford in the hand. Divers other Officers were wounded and some Slain, but the number of either cannot now be ascertained.

6. GENERAL SULLIVAN, "WHOSE EVIL CONDUCT WAS FOREVER PRODUCTIVE OF MISFORTUNES"

Thomas Burke, member of the Congress from North Carolina, to General Sullivan.

York, Pennsylvania, October 12, 1777

I was present at the action of Brandiwine and saw and heard enough to convince me that the fortune of the day was injured by miscarriages where you commanded.

I understood you were several days posted with the command on the right wing, that you were cautioned by the Commander in Chief early in the day to be particularly attentive to the enemys' motions who he supposed would attempt to cross higher up the creek and attack your flank, that you were furnished with proper troops for reconnotring, and yet you were so ill informed of the enemy's motions that they came up at a time and by a rout which you did not expect. That you conveyed intelligence to the Commander in Chief which occasioned his countermanding the dispositions he had made for encountering them on the rout by which it afterwards appeared they were actually advancing. That when at length the mistake was discovered you brought up your own division by an unnecessary circuit of two miles, and in the greatest disorder, from which they never recovered, but fled from the fire of the enemy without resistance. That the miscarriages on that wing made it necessary to draw off a great part of the strength from the center which exposed General Wayne to the superiority of the enemy.

I heard officers on the field lamenting in the bitterest terms that they were cursed with such a commander and I overheard numbers during the retreat complain of you as an officer whose evil conduct was forever productive of misfortunes to the army.

From these facts I concluded that your duty as a general was not well performed. Otherwise the enemy's motions on the wing where you particularly commanded would not have been unknown to you during great part of the day of action, nor could they have advanced by an unknown and unexpected rout, for you ought to have made yourself well acquainted with the ground. Nor would you have brought up your troops by an unnecessary circuit and in disorder, which exposed them to be surprised and broken.

I also concluded that the troops under your command had no confidence in your conduct, and from the many accounts I had officially received of your miscarriages, I conceived, and am still possessed of an opinion, that you have not sufficient talents for your rank and office, tho I believe you have strong dispositions to discharge your duty well.

I consider it as one essential part of my duty to attend to the appointments of the army, and where I perceive that any person so unqualified as I deem you to be has got into a command where incompetence may be productive of disasters and disgrace, it is my duty to endeavour at removing him. In discharge of this I gave to Congress all the information I was able, carefully distinguishing what I saw, what I heard, and from whom, as far as I was acquainted with persons. I urged your recall with all the force I could, and thought it, and still do think it, necessary for the public good because, in all your enterprises and in every part of your conduct, even as represented by yourself, you seem to be void of judgement and foresight in concerting, of deliberate vigor in executing, and of presence of mind under accidents and emergencies—and from these defects seem to me to arise your repeated ill success.

These seem to me to form the great essentials of a military character—nor do I think you the only officer in our army who is deficient in them. Nor were my endeavours to free the army from insufficient officers intended to be confined to you. I scarcely know your person, and was not conscious of any injury from you. For a particular reason I should have had great pleasure in justly forming a better opinion of you, but no reason can induce me to overlook the defects of officers on whom so much depends. Nor will any thing deter me from pursuing the measures suggested by my own judgement.

I have now related every thing which I acted with relation to you in Congress together with my motives. I have set down every intelligence, and the opinion I gave concerning you. What hills you struggled for, what fires you sustained, I neither saw or heard of. Your personal courage I meddled not with. I had no knowledge of it, and I was cautious to say nothing unjust or unnecessary. My objection to you is want of sufficient talents, and I consider it as your misfortune, not fault. It is my duty, as far as I can, to prevent its being the misfortune of my country.

—HAMMOND, ed., Letters and Papers of Sullivan, I, 534-537.

III. THE FALL OF PHILADELPHIA

Washington was now in retreat toward Chester. Near White Horse Tavern, twenty miles from Philadelphia, he made a sally against the British, on September 16, but heavy rains which drenched his ammunition prevented a full-scale engagement. Washington withdrew across the Schuylkill, but dispatched Anthony Wayne to the neighborhood of Warren Tavern to be in a position to attack the enemy's rear guard and baggage train. Wayne took up a post near Paoli in secrecy, but his whereabouts were quickly discovered by the Tories. Shortly after midnight of September 21, Wayne's camp was surprised by a detachment under Major General Grey. Leaping forward with unloaded rifles, Grey's men used the bayonet at close quarters; the Patriot defenders drawn up by the light of the campfires were standing targets for the British. The Americans suffered several hundred wounded, and some seventy taken prisoner, the British a mere six or seven casualties. Known as the "Paoli Massacre," the incident led to Wayne's court-martial, from which he was exonerated with the highest honor.

Now free to move as he wished, Howe turned north and crossed the Schuylkill at Swede's Ford, driving a wedge between Washington and the capital city. Congress, heeding Alexander Hamilton's warning, fled to Lancaster, conferring upon Washington dictatorial powers. Washington encamped his army temporarily at Germantown, and on September 26 Cornwallis, with a detachment of British and Hessian grenadiers, entered Philadelphia with bands playing.

Philadelphia had fallen. Most military men were resigned to the event, although some Patriots were disheartened. Not so Franklin in Paris, who, when informed that Howe had taken Philadelphia, rejoined, "No, Philadelphia has captured Howe!"

1. A VIOLENT RAIN DRENCHES THE PATRIOT AMMUNITION

Colonel Henry Knox to his wife.

Pottsgrove, September 24, 1777

I wrote you on the 13th. The same day we crossed the Schuylkill, in order to try the issue of another appeal to Him who directs all human events. After some days' manoeuvring, we came in sight of the enemy, and drew up in order of battle, which the enemy declined; but a most violent rain coming on obliged us to change our position, in the course of which nearly all the musket cartridges of the army that had been delivered to the men were damaged, consisting of about 400,000. This was a most terrible stroke to us, and owing entirely to the badness of the cartouch-boxes which had been provided for the army.

This unfortunate event obliged us to retire, in order to get supplied with so essential an article as cartridges, after which we forded the Schuylkill, in order to be opposite to the enemy; accordingly we took post at a place called Flatland Ford.

A defensive war is the most difficult to guard against, because one is always obliged to attend to the feints of the enemy. To defend an extensive river when it is unfordable is almost impossible; but when fordable in every part, it becomes impracticable. On the afternoon of the 21st the enemy made a most rapid march of ten or twelve miles to our right: this obliged us to follow them. They kindled large fires, and in the next night marched as rapidly back and crossed at a place where we had few guards, and pushed towards Philadelphia, and will this morning enter the city without opposition. We fought one battle for it, and it was no deficiency in bravery that lost us the day. Philadelphia, it seems, has been their favorite object. Their shipping has not joined them there. They will first have to raise the chevaux de frise in the Delaware, and defeat the naval force there, which is considerable.

The troops in this excursion of ten days without baggage suffered excessive hardships—without tents in the rain, several marches of all night, and often without sufficient provision. This they endured with the perseverance and patience of good soldiers. Generals Smallwood, Wayne, McDougall, and a considerable body of militia, will join us to-day and to-morrow. This day we shall move towards Philadelphia, in order to try the fortune of another battle, in which we devoutly hope the blessing of Heaven. I consider the loss of Philadelphia as only temporary—to be recovered when expedient. It is no more than the loss of Boston, nor, in my opinion, half so much, when the present trade of the latter be considered. It is situated on a point of land formed by the rivers Delaware and Schuylkill, so that it would [have] been highly improper to have thrown ourselves into it.

If the enemy do not get their shipping up soon, and go into Philadelphia, they will be in a very ineligible situation. I do not in the present circumstances consider Philadelphia of so much consequence as the loss of reputation to our arms; but I trust in God we shall soon make up that matter. Billy is well, and undergoes the hardships of the campaign surprisingly well, and they are neither few nor small.

2. THE HARDSHIPS OF THE RETREAT ACROSS THE SCHUYLKILL

Captain Enoch Anderson of Delaware to his nephew.

May 27, 1819

[After the Battle of Brandywine] we marched from Chester to the heights of Darby, seven miles from old Chester, and here our dispersed army made a gathering to collect its forces. Our army then marched on towards Philadelphia—came within three miles of the city—turned to the left (keeping on the west bank of the River Schuylkill)—and with a veering to the left and some miles from the river we encamped at night, perhaps twenty miles from the battleground. Our loss was greater than that of the British, though the loss in our regiment was small, considering the heavy firing we had come through. It was supposed this was due to the British having shot too high.

I was this night ordered on duty here with one hundred and fifty men—mostly of the Maryland line—with three captains, and the suitable number of subalterns. I, being the eldest captain, had the command. . . .

After dark we began our march and by daybreak we reached Darby [Creek] and a little after sunrise came to old Chester. Here I planted my own sentinels, separate from the Germans. They also did the same, separate from mine. Soon after this was done, the British drums beat about a mile west from us. We were certainly in a dangerous situation—on the bank of the Delaware, the enemy close by, and we were in the land of the Tories. The British were on the march, bearing northwardly. We marched on all this day, keeping near the British army. When they marched, we marched; when they stopped, we stopped. Our guide was the beating of the drums. Night came on, there was no house we dare go into; we had no tents. I had no blanket even and must make no fire. Some had blankets however. The night was very cold. I kept myself tolerably comfortable by walking about, but was very sleepy and could not sleep for the cold.

The British drums beat by daybreak and we were off again. A little before sundown we saw the British in a body coming through a meadow ahead of us. At about twelve o'clock at night we made a short cut to the left, but the next day by sunrise we were again near the British Army. We had heavy rains, were exposed to them all, were wet to the skin but we walked, nay marched, ourselves dry! We continued in this way for several days longer—near the British through the day—in the leaves and bushes at night.

On the seventh day from the commencement of the march of the detachment, I learned that our army had crossed over to the east bank of the Schuylkill. I inquired for the best ford on the river in that neighborhood as the late rains had raised the waters. We entered the river in platoons—the river was about two hundred yards wide. I now gave orders to link arm in arm, to keep close and in a compact form, and to go slow, keeping their ranks. We moved on—we found the river breast deep—it was now night as we gained the eastern shore all wet, but in safety. We got some fire from a neighboring cottage—made a fire in the woods—turned our feet to the fire—slept comfortably and found our clothes on our backs all dry in the morning.

This day—I think about the twenty-sixth of September, 1777—brought us safe to headquarters, being nine days out, during which time we never had our clothes off, lodged in no house, in a manner on half allowance of provisions and had to beg on the road.

3. PAOLI: "WE STABBED GREAT NUMBERS"

Journal of Major John André.

[Sept.] 20th. Intelligence having been received of the situation of General Wayne and his design of attacking our rear, a plan was concerted for surprising him, and the execution entrusted to Major General Grey. The troops for this service were the 40th and 55th Regiments, under Colonel Musgrave, and the 2d Battalion Light Infantry, the 42d and 44th Regiments under General Grey. General Grey's detachment marched at 10 o'clock at night, that under Colonel Musgrave at 11.

No soldier of either was suffered to load; those who could not draw their pieces took out the flints. We knew nearly the spot where the Rebel corps lay, but nothing of the disposition of their camp. It was represented to the men that firing discovered us to the enemy, hid them from us, killed our friends and produced a confusion favorable to the escape of the Rebels and perhaps productive of disgrace to ourselves. On the other hand, by not firing we knew the foe to be wherever fire appeared and a charge ensured his destruction; that amongst the enemy those in the rear would direct their fire against whoever fired in front, and they would destroy each other.

General Grey's detachment marched by the road leading to White Horse, and took every inhabitant with them as they passed along. About three miles from camp they turned to the left and proceeded to the Admiral Warren, where, having forced intelligence from a blacksmith, they came in upon the out sentries, piquet and camp of the Rebels. The sentries fired and ran off to the number of four at different intervals. The piquet was surprised and most of them killed in endeavoring to retreat. On approaching the right of the camp we perceived the line of fires, and the Light Infantry being ordered to form to the front, rushed along the line putting to the bayonet all they came up with, and overtaking the main herd of the fugitives, stabbed great numbers and pressed on their rear till it was thought prudent to order them to desist.

Near 200 must have been killed, and a great number wounded. Seventy-one prisoners were brought off; forty of them badly wounded were left at different houses on the road. A major, a captain and two lieutenants were amongst the prisoners. We lost Captain Wolfe killed and one or two private men; four or five were wounded, one an officer, Lieut. Hunter of the 52d Light Company.

It was about 1 o'clock in the morning when the attack was made, and the Rebels were then assembling to move towards us, with the design of attacking our baggage.

4. THE "PAOLI MASSACRE": "A SCENE OF BUTCHERY"

Major Samuel Hay of the Continental Army to Colonel William Irvine.

Camp at Trappe, September 29, 1777

Since I had the pleasure of seeing you, the division under the command of General Wayne has been surprised by the enemy, with considerable loss. We were ordered by his Excellency to march from the Yellow Springs down to where the enemy lay, near the Admiral Warren, there to annoy their rear. We marched early on the 17th instant, and got below the Paoli that night. On the next day fixed on a place for our camp.

We lay the 18th and 19th undisturbed, but, on the 20th, at 12 o'clock at night, the enemy marched out, and so unguarded was our camp that they were amongst us before we either formed in any manner for our safety, or attempted to retreat, notwithstanding the General had full intelligence of their designs two hours before they came out.

I will inform you in a few words of what happened. The annals of the age cannot produce such a scene of butchery. All was confusion. The enemy amongst us, and your regiment the most exposed, as the enemy came on the right wing. The 1st Regiment (which always takes the right) was taken off and posted in a strip of woods, stood only one fire and retreated. Then we were next the enemy, and, as we were amongst our fires, they had great advantage of us. I need not go on to give the particulars, but the enemy rushed on with fixed bayonets and made the use of them they intended. So you may figure to yourself what followed.

The party lost 300 privates in killed, wounded and missing, besides commissioned and non-commissioned officers. Our loss is Col. Grier, Captain Wilson and Lieutenant Irvine wounded (but none of them dangerously) and 61 non-commissioned and privates killed and wounded, which was just half the men we had on the ground fit for duty.

The 22d, I went to the ground to see the wounded. The scene was shocking—the poor men groaning under their wounds, which were all by stabs of bayonets and cuts of Light-Horsemen's swords. Col. Grier is wounded in the side by a bayonet, superficially slanting to the breast bone. Captain Wilson's stabbed in the side, but not dangerous, and it did not take the guts or belly. He got also a bad stroke on the head with the cock nail of the locks of a musket. Andrew Irvine was ran through the fleshy part of the thigh with a bayonet. They are all lying near David Jones' tavern. I left Captain McDowell with them to dress and take care of them, and they all are in a fair way of recovery. Major La Mar, of the 4th Regiment, was killed, and some other inferior officers. The enemy lost Captain Wolf, killed, and four or five Light-Horsemen, and about 20 privates, besides a number wounded.
